They share an interest in Darfur, where both Bush and Pelosi have called for an end to genocide. Pelosi briefed Bush when she returned from a trip to the Sudan last March -- but that was the last time she saw him until after Democrats won control of the House, Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said."When she was minority leader, he didn't fully engage her," said a Pelosi associate, who asked not to be named when discussing personal dynamics between the two leaders. "Now he's much more engaged."

Bush has also wooed conservative Democrats known as "Blue Dogs," who might be more willing than liberals to cross party lines. When he invited a small group of them to a December meeting in the Oval Office, Rep. Mike Ross, D-Ark., said he was encouraged by the attention. But he said he told Bush, "Mr. President, I regret it took six years to invite us over for this meeting. I hope it's the first meeting, not the last."

DOJ_NMG_0112578

Some lawmakers argue that Bush's best ambassadors to Democrats may be his Cabinet officers. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has been making the rounds among Capitol Hill committee leaders, including House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel Jr. of New York. The two recently had a long lunch at the Treasury to discuss common concerns.

Rangel is also hoping to improve relations between the parties on his committee, which was bitterly split in recent years under the chairmanship of Bill Thomas, R-Calif., who just retired from Congress. Rangel had an hourlong meeting with the new ranking Republican on the committee, Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., of the sort he said he never had with Thomas.

"I never had a conversation with Bill Thomas except at funerals," said Rangel. He added that it may be easier for Congress to craft compromises without a heavy hand from the president. "The best thing the president can do for us is to leave us alone," he said.

Democrats To 'issue Toughest Ethics Reform' (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

The Democratic party took full control of America's legislative branch on Thursday for the first time since 1994, promising to clean up US politics by introducing the "toughest ethics reform in [America's] history".

Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker of the House of Representatives and the first woman to hold that job, and Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, both said that tackling the congressional "culture of corruption" would be their chief priority during the next few days.

The proposals, which are aimed at weakening the notorious links between lawmakers and so-called "K Street" lobbyists that have ballooned in recent years, include a ban on accepting gifts or air tickets from lobby groups and forcing lawmakers to declare their names when they insert in legislation "earmarks" that are sponsored by special interest groups.

According to one widely cited poll, concern over corruption came second only to worry about the war in Iraq among voters at mid-term elections last November. The Democrats also plan to reintroduce the "pay-go" system of budgeting that would compel Congress to fund any tax cut or spending increase with offsetting measures.

"The American people told us that they expect us to work together for fiscal responsibility with the highest ethical standards and civility," Ms Pelosi told the new house, shortly after she was sworn in on Thursday.

"Let us join together in the first 100 [legislative] hours to make this Congress the most open and honest in history."

The two leaders also promised to extend the kind of bipartisan courtesies that they claim Republicans denied them during their 12 years in opposition.

Many commentators have labelled the outgoing Congress as one of the most bitter and divisive in history.

However, Republicans claimed Ms Pelosi had already breached that pledge by announcing she would short-circuit the committee process to push her party's six key electoral promises straight to a vote on the floor of the house within the next two weeks.

These include raising the minimum wage by $2.10 to $7.25 – the first increase since 1997 – and a bill to promote federal funding of stem cell research. They also plan to abolish recent tax breaks and subsidies for oil companies.

"If you look at the rules changes the Democratic leadership are proposing, they are mostly very positive and long overdue," said Scott Lilly at the Centre for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "But it is hard to understand why the leadership is by-passing normal procedures to push through its "100-hour" promises."

Both Democratic leaders also issued thinly veiled warnings to George W. Bush, US president, to desist from announcing a "surge" in the level of US forces in Iraq.

Mr Bush is expected to announce his "new way forward in Iraq" next week.

Ms Pelosi, whose party commands a 31-seat majority in the 435-strong house, called for a plan "that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces" out of Iraq.

Mr Reid, whose party holds a precariously narrow 51-49 seat majority in the Senate, said: "The president's new plan must ensure the Iraqis take responsibility for their own future, and it must remove our troops from a dangerous civil war.

"Completing the mission in Iraq is the president's job, and we will do everything in our power to ensure he fulfils it."

DOJ_NMG_0112579

Senate Feels Heat As House Cranks Up Ethics Overhaul (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Unexpectedly broad ethics rule changes that the House passed Thursday are putting new pressure on the Senate.

The House rules leave what lobbyists say are ample loopholes for those seeking to buy access to lawmakers, mainly through campaign fund-raising. But leaders of the new Democratic majority in the Senate said Thursday that they were reintroducing a much less extensive package of changes passed last year as the starting place for an intraparty debate next week over how much further the Senate should go.

Saying they were responding to voter backlash against Congressional corruption that helped them take control, House Democrats went beyond some of the ethics proposals on which they had campaigned.

The new House rules bar members from taking gifts, meals or trips paid for by lobbyists, or the organizations that employ them. The rules also ban lawmakers from using corporate jets and reimbursing the owners. A further proposal would also eliminate major loopholes from earlier drafts, in requirements for lawmakers to disclose sponsorship of pet spending projects, or earmarks, and tax breaks they hide in complex legislation.

The House Democrats said that in March they would take up the creation of an independent ethics watchdog to police their own conduct, something lawmakers in both chambers had steadfastly resisted.

In contrast, the initial Senate ethics bill would ban only gifts or meals and not trips paid for by lobbyists or their employers. It would not restrict the use of corporate jets. It would require disclosure of the sponsors of only a small fraction of spending earmarks, excluding those added to supplementary material, called Congressional reports, that explain legislative intent or that are directed through federal agencies like the Defense Department. Nor does the Senate bill propose any independent enforcement.

Some senior Democratic aides said the House rules had upped the ante for the Senate.

"They will be embarrassed" if they do not do more, said James A. Thurber, a professor of government at American University in Washington and an expert on Congressional ethics rules who has acted as a consultant to several lawmakers. "When we look at the election, it is a hot issue, so there will be a lot of focus on it in people's minds, and the heat will be on in the Senate."

Announcing his intention to reintroduce the Senate bill that passed last year, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, promissed to "improve that legislation and make additional reforms."

Senior aides in both parties said Mr. Reid was negotiating with Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, to try to work out a bipartisan package of changes. Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said the House actions had no bearing on what the Senate would do.

An overhaul is likely to face strong opposition from veteran senators who resent ethics rules as unnecessary, and helped bring back other changes. But aides to the Senate Rules Committee said they were preparing to match the House ban on meals, gifts and trips paid for by lobbyists or any organization that employs them.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who is chairwoman of the Rules Committee, has said she intends to close some of the loopholes in the current bill's earmark disclosure requirements. And despite personal doubts, she has also agreed to hold hearings on creating an independent enforcement watchdog.

Other Democrats, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, planned to push for a far more drastic overhaul.

The Feingold-Obama plan would make lawmakers reimburse corporations for use of their jets at the cost of a charter flight instead of the price of a first-class ticket — a step that stops short of the House rules. The bill would also create an independent watchdog as the House Democrats have discussed. And it would prohibit lobbyists or the organizations that employ them from holding lavish events for lawmakers at party conventions.

The Feingold-Obama bill would also require lobbyists to disclose any earmarks they are seeking for their clients, and require lobbyists to disclose any collecting and passing on of campaign contributions — a practice known as "bundling" that currently makes K Street the heart of campaign fund-raising for most lawmakers. Senator Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota, said she and many other newly elected Democrats were working with Mr. Obama, Mr. Feingold and Mr. Reid to pushing for stronger changes, in part because they felt the resonance of the issue on the campaign trail.

DOJ_NMG_0112580

"The House bill raises the bar," Ms. Klobuchar said, "but a number of senators have already been talking about their own efforts to strengthen the Senate bill."

Lobbyists, meanwhile, groused that the rules passed in the House would have the unintended consequence of encouraging them to do more fund-raising for House members. The new rules bar lobbyists from treating lawmakers to meals or trips. But the lobbyists can still raise money for lawmakers' campaigns and also join lawmakers at fund-raising events or on overnight trips paid for with those campaign funds. Lobbyists said people seeking access to lawmakers may now have even more incentive to attend fund-raisers because they can no longer simply buy dinner or lunch.

Lawrence W. Noble, a Washington lawyer specializing in political rules, said lobbyists could well feel obliged to attend more fund-raisers. "We still have a system of private financing of campaigns," Mr. Noble said.

Democrats Take Control On Hill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) was elected America's first female speaker of the House yesterday in a raucous, bipartisan celebration of a historic breakthrough, and hours later she presided over passage of the broadest ethics and lobbying revision since the Watergate era.

Democrats took control of the House and Senate after 12 years of nearly unbroken Republican rule, with resolute calls for bipartisan comity and a pledge to move quickly on an agenda of health-care, homeland security, education and energy proposals. Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the soft-spoken son of a hard-rock miner, took the helm of the Senate, after a closed-door session in the Capitol's stately Old Senate Chamber. But with the eyes of history riveted on her, it was Pelosi's day.

"This is an historic moment, for Congress, and for the women of this country. It is a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years," Pelosi proclaimed, to a roaring ovation in the packed House chamber. "For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling. To our daughters and our granddaughters, the sky is the limit."

For Pelosi, yesterday's election was not only the culmination of a long climb by women through the ranks of Congress but also the personal triumph of a hard-nosed partisan, a grandmother of six who methodically plotted the Democrats' return to power after more than a decade in the minority. A House floor where Democrats had been marginalized to the point of irrelevance in recent years was alive with handshakes, smiles, hugs and boisterous children on the Democratic side of the aisle. Republicans, once so confident in what many saw as a permanent majority, sat glumly watching the festivities.

As Pelosi entered the chamber before her formal, party-line election, the House erupted in bipartisan applause. Only Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Tex.), the outgoing chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, remained seated in stony silence. Pelosi's predecessor as speaker, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), sat quietly and unobtrusively in the rear of the chamber, except for one brief moment of recognition.

When House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) rose to present the gavel to the new speaker, he was magnanimous in acknowledging both the roots of Republican defeat last November and the historic import of the moment.

"In a few moments, I'll have the high privilege of handing the gavel of the House of Representatives to a woman for the first time in American history," he told his fellow lawmakers. "Whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, this is a cause for celebration."

He concluded with a warning for Democrats, gleaned from his party's pursuit of power and the lessons learned from defeat: "If there is one lesson that stands out from our party's time in the majority, it is this: A congressional majority is simply a means to an end. The value of a majority lies not in the chance to wield great power but in the chance to do great things."

In what must be another first, the gavel changed hands with a hug and a kiss.

In the Senate chamber, members lined up in groups of four to take their oaths with Vice President Cheney. Former senators, including Democrats John Breaux (La.), Charles S. Robb (Va.) and Jean Carnahan (Mo.), circulated on the floor to offer

DOJ_NMG_0112581

congratulations. Outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), now retired from the Senate, joked with Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) as the Democratic presidential prospect worked his way through the crowd. Family members crowded the surrounding corridors, including former president Bill Clinton. Democratic Sen. Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.) shouted "Praise Jesus!" during the opening prayer.

The Senate will plunge into its own ethics and lobbying overhaul package next week and then take up legislation to boost the federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade. But it was clear yesterday that the Senate would have no choice but to take a more deliberative approach to the issues the House plans to bulldoze through. Senate leaders pledged bipartisanship, and in a chamber divided 51 to 49 , they will have no choice.

"Now, I know that you're not accustomed, members of the press, to people getting along, working together," Reid told reporters after the closed-door Senate meeting in the morning. "But Senator McConnell and I believe this is a new day in Washington."

Reid nodded to his GOP counterpart, Sen. Mitch McConnell (Ky.). "I think Harry's got it right," McConnell said.

The Senate margin is even more tenuous because Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is sidelined after emergency brain surgery.

Republican leaders decided not to seek special language spelling out the terms of a transition in case of a power shift -- say, if Johnson vacates his post and his state's GOP governor appoints a Republican to replace him. Under that scenario, power would effectively shift to Republicans, because Vice President Cheney would provide the tiebreaking 51st vote. But for Republicans to take parliamentary control, the Senate would have to vote for new organizational rules, a move Democrats could filibuster.

A similar scenario unfolded in January 2001, when a 50-50 Senate convened. In 2001, Democrats demanded a "kick-out clause" in organizing negotiations that would automatically scrap agreements on committee ratios and funding levels and force new organizational rules. But Republicans decided this month against a confrontation that would come from demanding a similar clause.

"Nobody over here talked about that at all," said Don Stewart, spokesman for McConnell.

In the House, Democrats did not skip a beat between formally taking control and getting to work on what they have called their hundred-hours agenda. Last night, the House nearly unanimously approved a broad package of internal rules changes designed to sever the cozy links that have developed between lawmakers and lobbyists.

The changes would prohibit House members or employees from knowingly accepting gifts or travel from a registered lobbyist, foreign agent or lobbyist's client. Lawmakers could no longer fly on corporate jets. In addition, congressional travel financed by outside groups would have to be approved in advance by the House ethics committee and immediately disclosed to the public.

The measures were approved 430 to 1, with only Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) voting against it. This was a remarkable change considering that House Republicans could barely pass a far weaker measure last May and ultimately did not enact any measure because they could not reach agreement with the Senate. But voters in November identified corruption as one of their primary concerns, and the House responded yesterday.

"It's amazing what an election will do," said Rep. James P. McGovern (D-Mass.).

Today, Democrats hope to pass new rules to promote open deliberations in the House, rein in special-interest spending and lawmaker pet projects, and prohibit passage of spending or tax measures that increase the federal deficit.

Over the next two weeks, Democrats in the House plan to enact new homeland security measures, increase the minimum wage, allow federally funded stem cell research, permit the federal government to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, cut student-loan interest rates and fund alternative-energy research by rolling back tax breaks for oil companies.

But Pelosi herself acknowledged that her carefully constructed consensus agenda will not satisfy the angry electorate that swept the Democrats to power. Democrats will have to confront President Bush on the larger, more controversial issues of the day: the war in Iraq, military tribunals that suspend the legal rights of terrorism suspects, and warrantless wiretapping by the National Security Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0112582

Her call yesterday for a new direction in Iraq "that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces" elicited strong applause in her party while clearly splitting Republicans, many of whom joined the ovation.

Reid also saw Iraq as the issue of the day and a possible impediment to Democratic plans.

"Iraq is where it is," Reid said. He added: "We're not going to divert our attention from what needs to be accomplished for this country. There are a lot of things that need to be accomplished. And we're going to work on those, in spite of Iraq."

To make it clear that such issues will have to be addressed, Reps. Adam B. Schiff (D-Calif.) and Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) reintroduced legislation on the new Congress's first day to mandate that NSA surveillance once again involve a warrant from a secret federal court.

"There's a long list where Congress has been abdicating their responsibility, and I suspect the leadership and the chairs will have to quickly get to work," Schiff said.

Democrats are already having trouble reconciling their promises even for the initial hundred-hour blitz. Senior House Democratic aides said a promise to cut student-loan interest rates in half will have to be phased in over five years to comply with a pledge to offset any additional deficit spending with equal spending cuts or tax hikes. The loan pledge is proving just too expensive, and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and the committee's senior Republican, Charles E. Grassley (Iowa) introduced legislation yesterday to immediately repeal the alternative minimum tax, a proposal that would cost the Treasury hundreds of billions of dollars.

Pelosi Sets Aggressive Pace (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As the new, Democratic-controlled Congress convened, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi moved quickly to tighten her chamber's ethics and budget rules, putting pressure on the Senate to do the same.

Ms. Pelosi struck quickly on the ethics front rather than risk the kind of delays that undermined former Speaker Dennis Hastert's bid to tighten lobbying rules a year ago. The California Democrat's aggressive approach establishes what will be an important dynamic between the House and Senate in the opening weeks. On issues from raising the minimum wage to curbing oil subsidies, Democrats know they can't make law without the Senate, but they will use the House to lay down markers on initiatives they see appealing to independents and Republican moderates. 1

The ethics question is especially time sensitive, given the damage Republicans suffered in November for appearing too close to business lobbyists and the low public standing Congress continues to suffer. By using the rules process to make immediate changes, Ms. Pelosi is assured that her party can show progress in the House, whatever happens in the Senate. As a matter of practical politics, any diminishment of the business lobby, which did so much to help the Republican House majority, could make it easier for her party to challenge oil and drug companies, among others.

"This new Congress doesn't have two years or 200 days to renew itself," Ms. Pelosi said after her election as speaker.

Fred Wertheimer, a longstanding advocate of tougher ethics restrictions, said, "The House has laid down the gauntlet to the Senate to pass ethics-rules reforms at least as strong as the House reforms."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

2

House Minority leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) addresses Congress3 before Nancy Pelosi takes the gavel as the country's first female Speaker of the House.

WSJ senior special writer John Harwood discusses the agenda of the 110th Congress4, and notes that, despite recent bipartisan gestures, some thorny issues lay ahead.

Loopholes are sure to remain, but the proposed changes are seen as a major step toward drawing a brighter line between lobbyists and lawmakers. Meals, gifts and travel facilitated by lobbyists would be largely banned, and House members would be prohibited from using even their own funds or campaign donations to pay for below-cost travel on corporate jets -- a favorite perk offered by business lobbyists. Currently, lawmakers must reimburse a jet's owners only at the rate of a first-class ticket.

DOJ_NMG_0112583

Labor unions, with fewer planes to offer, have long resented this practice not because of the lower reimbursement but because company executives often accompany lawmakers on such flights and thereby gain valuable access.

As part of the same package, Democrats propose to tighten anti-deficit rules and require greater disclosure of narrow legislative amendments designed to benefit special interests and generate campaign funds from lobbyists. The sheer number of these so-called earmarks exploded under Republican rule. The House Democratic package goes beyond past Republican proposals by demanding greater transparency for spending provisions as well as for tariff exemptions and "rifle-shot" tax breaks, which benefit one interest group.

The new rules would broaden the definition of a spending earmark to include funds for contracts awarded by federal agencies. While the restrictions would apply only to the House, the language will bind House negotiators in future talks on even those earmarks generated by the Senate.

There are sure to be tensions when the Senate turns to the subject next week. New Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) is a frequent user of corporate jets, while the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W.Va.) is famous for his pork-barrel appetite.

Senate Democrats appear reluctant to be as bold as their House counterparts by trying to change rules unilaterally. Instead, the plan is to move with a hybrid package of rules and legislative changes. This strategy is driven ostensibly by Democratic fears of a filibuster, requiring a two-thirds majority to overcome in the case of a rules change.

Critics counter that the filibuster threat is exaggerated, given the popular support for some of the rule changes; the big question is whether the House action will put pressure on senators to move faster.

Republicans had the same House-Senate tensions, which often paralyzed the party in its final years in the majority. Flush with victory, Democrats are nowhere near such a divide. Yesterday, House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.) and Mr. Byrd announced plans to better align their committees in hopes of approving budget bills on time and preventing disruptions of government operations. The State Department budget now will be considered in both chambers as part of the foreign-aid bill; the Treasury Department and major regulators such as the Securities and Exchange Commission will be dealt with in their own bill.

As Ms. Pelosi is the first woman speaker, her opening day marked both a transition in power and historic moment for the House. "Whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, this is a cause for celebration," said Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio, turning over the gavel.

"This is the people's House...and most of the people don't care which party controls it; what they want is a government that is limited, honest, accountable and responsive to their needs," he said. "The moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

For Democrats, A Choice: Forward Or Reverse? (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Democrats realized their political and legislative dream Thursday. Now they must face reality.

As they take control of the House and Senate, members of the new majority must reconcile diverse ideological factions within their ranks and make a fundamental choice. They can spend their energy trying to reverse what they see as the flaws of the Bush administration and a dozen years in which conservative philosophy dominated Congress. Or they can accept the rightward tilt of that period and grudgingly concede that big tax cuts, deregulation, restrictions on abortion and other Republican-inspired changes are now a permanent part of the legislative framework.

The competing drives were on display amid the constitutional hoopla Thursday and the emotion surrounding Representative Nancy Pelosi's election as speaker, a position filled until now by the likes of Sam Rayburn, Joseph Cannon and Nicholas Longworth — men whose names adorn nearby House office buildings. "We have broken the marble ceiling," Mrs. Pelosi said after she was handed the gavel.

In a meeting with the Congressional Black Caucus earlier in the day, Mrs. Pelosi made her own allusions to the competing tugs on Democrats, noting the party was rooted in its traditions but not hostage to the past. She promised a new direction "for all the people, not just the privileged few," a reflection of the leadership's political and policy calculation that Democrats need to champion the average guy.

DOJ_NMG_0112584

"The agenda we have is about restoring economic security to a very vulnerable middle class," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Caucus. "The real activity will be in those areas."

Yet many Democrats contend that President Bush and the Republican-led Congress that was his partner moved the dial too far to the right in many cases. And they believe it will be the work of Democrats to make a significant course correction.

"I think there are a lot of things the people of America want changed," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee and a tough critic of some Bush policies.

Mr. Leahy and others made clear that the new direction had to begin with American policy in Iraq.

But their domestic legislative agenda suggests that they are picking selected fights rather than going for wholesale change. On the economy, they will move swiftly to increase the minimum wage. On social policy, they will challenge Mr. Bush by calling for expanded stem cell research. They will try to pass legislation increasing college aid for the middle class. All of those issues have the twin advantages of broad popular appeal tied to measurable economic impact on individuals.

But Democrats are in no rush to engage in a fight with Mr. Bush over the ideological centerpiece of his domestic policy, his tax cuts. And they have showed no inclination to wade back into the abortion issue, despite its potency among many of their supporters.

"We have to keep our eye on the average American family and sort of push aside the interest groups left, right and center," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "The world has changed, and it demands new solutions, not the old Democrat and Republican nostrums."

But there is no dispute that Mr. Bush's legislative and executive record will get a microscopic examination via a renewed emphasis on oversight, a Congressional function Democrats say was all but abandoned in recent years. And the results of those inquiries could determine what policies Democrats try to unravel if they uncover a strong case against them.

"The Bush administration has passed an entire architecture of laws that are going to be reviewed," said Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, one of the most liberal members of the House.

Republicans are waiting to see what develops, uncertain if Democrats sincerely want to join hands and produce some consensus on public policy. Or, as one senior Republican asked, will Democrats hostile to the Bush administration be more like the scorpion in the fable with the frog, unable to resist the urge to sting even if they hurt themselves?

Democrats acknowledge that with their minuscule majority in the Senate and one in the House that is not much larger, they lack the political muscle to go too far in reversing Bush policy even if that was their chief goal. And they already have their hands full with delivering on their own ambitious legislative agenda, following through on their pledges of bipartisanship and ethics overhaul and avoiding anything that costs the party its chance at the White House in 2008.

Leading Democrats say their best direction is forward, concentrating on establishing a new party legacy rather than obsessing with the perceived failings of Republican rule. The test for the party's newly empowered leadership and the Congressional membership will be whether they can stick to that path.

After The 100 Hours, A War Awaits (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

An unusual number of the people wandering through the tunnels that crisscross Capitol Hill on Wednesday had no earthly idea where they were going. "I think the Rayburn building is this way," one young woman announced to a colleague, as the two of them -- newly minted congressional staff members, I guessed -- strode away down a long corridor. I knew I'd run into them again, and soon, since actually they were just leaving the Rayburn building.

Wednesday was the last day of the "Where am I?" phase of the transition from Republican to Democratic rule on the Hill. Yesterday, with the swearing-in of new members of Congress, began the "Here we are, and now what?" phase, which means things are about to get interesting.

DOJ_NMG_0112585

Much history already has been made, starting with the election of Nancy Pelosi as the first female speaker of the House. Rep. Jim Clyburn of South Carolina, an African American, will serve as majority whip. The first Muslim congressman, Rep. Keith Ellison of Minnesota, took his ceremonial oath of office with his hand on a Koran once owned by Thomas Jefferson. Powerful House committees such as Ways and Means, Judiciary, and Intelligence will be led by minorities.

The Senate still looks like an exclusive country club that grudgingly decided to let in a few women and the occasional black guy, but the House looks a lot more like the complicated, diverse country its members are supposed to represent.

With all due respect to the chamber that calls itself the "world's greatest deliberative body," I wouldn't expect much initiative from the new Senate -- the Democrats' one-vote majority isn't enough to get much of anything done, especially with several senators moonlighting as presidential hopefuls. The action is in the House. And that's where the "interesting" part comes in. Pelosi's plan for a blitzkrieg of legislation in the first 100 hours of the new Congress is fine -- most Americans are in favor of a higher minimum wage, expanded stem-cell research, wider availability of student loans and fewer lobbyist-paid golfing trips to Scotland for our elected representatives. Pelosi could toss in a couple of bills supporting motherhood and apple pie while she's at it.

That's not to belittle the Democratic agenda, as far as it goes. But it tiptoes around the big, ugly monster of an issue sitting in the middle of the room -- the war in Iraq. The new Congress is going to have to stop temporizing and stand up to George W. Bush on the war.

"It's time to set aside politics and focus on the future," the president said Wednesday, dusting off the familiar call for bipartisanship that always comes from the losing side in an election. In the current context, it's really a threat to paint congressional pushback on Iraq as electoral gamesmanship. But the nation has made abundantly clear what it thinks of this tragic war. Challenging the president on Iraq isn't partisan politics, it's the new Democratic majority's patriotic and constitutional duty.

So far, we've heard promises that the new Congress will exercise vigorous oversight -- which Congress should have been doing all along. I can understand that Pelosi and her counterpart on the Senate side, Majority Leader Harry Reid, wouldn't want to start by making the ultimate threat: using the power of the purse to cut off funding for the war. But sooner or later, there's going to have to be a confrontation.

Not once has Bush given the slightest indication that he intends any significant change of course in Iraq. Quite the contrary: The expectation in Washington is that soon he will announce an escalation of the war -- increasing troop levels but calling the increase a "surge" and giving the impression that it's a short-term measure. Don't be fooled by the focus-group word "surge," because a two- or three-month increase in troop levels makes no military sense. If and when the president sends more troops to Iraq, they will not soon come home.

Given that the Democratic Party's fortunes keep rising as Bush sinks deeper into the Iraq quagmire, political expediency might tempt the new leadership in Congress to let the president have his way and reap the rewards in 2008. But that would be wrong. Democrats can't give speeches saying that sending more troops to Iraq without a viable mission is nothing more than a futile sacrifice of young American lives -- and then limit their dispute with Bush to whether he gets to send 3,000 more troops or 30,000.

Very soon, perhaps inconveniently soon, Democrats are going to have to take a stand.

Tax Cuts And The Minimum Wage (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

As the minimum wage moves to the top of the new Congress's agenda, some politicians — mainly President Bush and Senate Republicans — seem incapable of viewing the issue as anything other than a pretext for more tax cuts. This time the lucky recipients would be small-business owners, who the politicians contend will be unduly harmed by having to pay higher wages. So much for ringing in the new.

It has been more than nine years since the government last increased the federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour. During that period inflation has severely eroded the wage's value. Arguing that it is only fair to cut taxes on business owners when the minimum wage goes up is akin to arguing that taxes should have been raised as the wage fell because of inflation. Instead, as the minimum wage has eroded over the past decade, taxes have been cut sharply.

DOJ_NMG_0112586

It's even doubtful that the wage increase under discussion — a $2.10 increase over roughly two years, to $7.25 — would impair business. Eighty-six percent of small-business owners surveyed by the Wells Fargo/Gallup Small Business Index said the minimum wage had no effect on their businesses.

There's also no reason to believe that the proposed tax cuts would be aimed at employers of low-wage workers. In 2006, when Congress tried to link the minimum wage to tax cuts, the proposals included an estate-tax cut for America's wealthiest families. One proposal now being considered would allow small businesses to write off a larger part of their attorney fees when they go to court to challenge federal regulations. It sounds like a stretch to us that typical employers of minimum-wage workers — say, restaurants and small factories — are in any great need of relief from the high cost of federal litigation.

And then there's the probability that tax cuts would cost the government far more than a wage increase would ever cost employers, driving up the budget deficit. The Economic Policy Institute analyzed the tax cuts that were linked to an unsuccessful attempt to raise the minimum wage in 2000. Those cuts would have cost $123 billion over 10 years, versus $11.2 billion for the wage increase.

It's that sort of idiocy the new Congress was elected to stop. Chances are good the House of Representatives will eschew tax cuts and pass a clean bill to raise the minimum wage. The Senate should follow suit. And President Bush should sign it.

House Warming (WP)

By David Montgomery And J. Freedom Du Lac

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Despite the promised "new direction for America," getting the money out of politics and all of that, some facts of Washington life appear immutable and eternal.

"One hundred hours to make this the most honest and open Congress in history," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi declared at the beginning of a history-making day -- which ended last night with the Democrat from California presiding over a glitzy fundraiser open to anyone with $1,000 for a ticket.

A few folks in the block-long line of partygoers waiting to get into the National Building Museum -- social activists, feminists, union organizers, fat-cat liberals, Hollywood allies and not a few serious Deadheads -- did sense the cognitive dissonance. They promptly dismissed it in a tidal wave of idealism about the future under the nation's first female speaker of the House.

They had waited a long time for this night to party, nibble on goat cheese ravioli with pumpkin and truffle, wipe their lips with paper napkins embossed in gold with "Speaker Pelosi January 4, 2007," listen to former members of the Grateful Dead sing "Truckin' " and Tony Bennett sing "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

"Democrats are back!" Pelosi said in her remarks during the few minutes reporters were permitted inside. "We are ready to lead, prepared to govern and determined to make you proud."

(A dozen years ago, it must be recalled, Newt Gingrich and the Republicans celebrated their return to power with a $1,000-a-plate dinner. Reporters were allowed in.)

Organizers expected 1,000 to 1,500 guests, with checks to be made out to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Many complimentary tickets were given out, and DCCC spokeswoman Jen Psaki could not immediately say how much money was raised. She said fundraisers are usually closed to the news media, but arrangements were made to allow reporters to hear Pelosi's remarks.

Outside in the line to get in, their faces illuminated by cellphones and BlackBerrys, people had high hopes.

"I am personally such an admirer of Nancy," said Susan Levine, vice president of a private equity firm in Boston. "I'm a working mom; she raised five children before she went into politics. What she said today about breaking the marble ceiling, I feel like I'm trying to do that every day."

"We're feminists and we're celebrating!" exclaimed Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation, and Martha Burk, money editor of Ms. Magazine, almost in unison.

"The marble ceiling is certainly not broken, but it's nicely cracked," Burk added.

DOJ_NMG_0112587

A long column of leaders and organizers from several labor unions walked from nearby headquarters.

"We're celebrating a change in this country," said Larry Cohen, president of the Communication Workers of America, adding that Americans want a "commitment to economic justice" and are "fed up with their voices not being heard."

But how do those ideals jibe with a fancy affair too pricey for most working families?

"I think it's a good question, actually," Cohen said. "I do think getting the money out and getting the people in is what this is about for us."

Ahead in line, Arthur Fullerton, director of development for Covenant House California, pronounced it "a historic night. . . . I think the voices of everyone in the country get to be heard, not just the privileged few."

Like the few with $1,000 to drop?

"That's true," Fullerton said. But he got comped. "You do have folks like me who get invited."

Actor Joe Pantoliano was on the sidewalk marveling about how "stunning" it would be for his mother to have known an Italian American woman was becoming speaker. And actress Heather Thomas disclosed, "I'm 49, I'm not ashamed to say, so I never had those [female political] role models as a child. If you don't have that in your consciousness, you don't know you can do it."

Phil Angelides was in line, looking pleased, despite his recent loss to Arnold Schwarzenegger in the California governor's race.

And there came musician Wyclef Jean, one of the evening's entertainers, with a special composition in store. "I'm writing a freestyle rap on my BlackBerry," he said, whipping out the device to show his notes. Later, during his performance of "Hot Hot Hot," Pelosi would be inspired to dance, and the musician stepped into the velvet-roped area to dance with her.

The speaker, with a grandchild on her lap, also sang along to Carole King's performance of "(You Make Me Feel Like) A Natural Woman."

It didn't hurt turnout that the congresswoman from San Francisco invited members of one of her city's most famous rock bands to headline the affair.

"I am here to witness history in the making, the first woman speaker of the House, and to see members of the Grateful Dead perform," said Jersey City Councilman Steve Lipski.

Which was more important?

"I'll let readers be the judge," said Lipski, who also could recall the date of his first Dead show, 35 years ago.

Scott Orellana, 30, an insurance claims processor from Rockville, dressed in a gray suit with his long hair neatly pulled back, was walking up and down the line holding a cardboard sign that said, "I need a miracle," and holding up one finger -- universal parking-lot Dead code for seeking a ticket.

On the other side, his sign said, "Let me see Nancy Pelosi and the DCCC." "I'm excited about the new Congress. I'm excited about Nancy Pelosi being the first woman speaker of the House," Orellana said. "If I had $1,000 I'd definitely give a contribution, but I don't have $1,000."

At the last minute, just as the party was about to begin, a wired Democrat and fellow Dead fan -- who sheepishly would only be identified as a political consultant -- slipped Orellana a ticket.

The Deadhead got his miracle -- and maybe so have the Democrats gotten theirs.

Women Bask In New Speaker's Shining Moment (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

This was the visual they had dreamed about for years, for decades, for a lifetime. A woman standing on the wooden dais before the high-backed leather chair of the speaker of the House, the gavel in her hand, the American flag draped behind her.

And when Nancy Pelosi made American history yesterday and was formally elected speaker, the raucous cheers that rang through the House chamber came from young girls in Mary Janes, working women in business suits, elderly ladies carrying canes and more than a few men. For hours after the formal swearing-in, the ascension of Pelosi was the topic throughout the corridors of the Capitol. Several women said they looked forward to the State of the Union address later this month because Pelosi would be in the speaker's chair and a woman would share the television screen with the president.

DOJ_NMG_0112588

"For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling," Pelosi told cheering members of the House and their families who crowded into the chamber as the Democratic leader was formally elected speaker of the 110th Congress. "For our daughters and granddaughters today, the sky is the limit."

The day marked the Democrats' return to control of Congress after 12 years as the minority, and the celebrations started early and stretched late. Brunch plates clinked in the Library of Congress, party equipment rental trucks lined Constitution Avenue and bowls of shrimp and platters of finger sandwiches appeared in Capitol offices.

It felt like an inauguration and a homecoming, both at once.

"This is a woman's version of the presidential inaugural," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic consultant who ran Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000.

The historic aspect of the moment seemed to transcend party.

"For more than 200 years, the leaders of our government have been democratically elected. And from their ranks, our elected leaders have always selected a man for the responsibility and honor of serving as speaker of the House. Always, that is, until today," said Rep. John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican who was majority leader in the last Congress and who handed the gavel to Pelosi. "Whether you're a Republican, Democrat or independent, today is a cause for celebration."

Rep. Michael McCaul, a Texas Republican starting a second term, brought his son and four daughters to the floor for Pelosi's election and his oath of office. It didn't matter that the woman of the hour was a Democrat, he said. "It's a good role model for all women, and my daughters can see that they can get to the highest levels of government," McCaul said. The girls, ages 5 to 10 and dressed in identical black velvet and tartan dresses, displayed varying levels of understanding. "It's cool," said Caroline, 10.

Roz Wyman, the doyenne of California Democratic circles and a major backer of Pelosi, said it was hard to describe the importance of the day. "I don't think a lot of people grasp it," said Wyman, who watched the swearing-in from the visitor's gallery and had helped throw a women's tea for Pelosi on Wednesday that featured hundreds of female politicians, donors and activists. " I never thought I would see this day. . . . She's not George Washington, but she is at that seat and she got there because she had a lot of friends who cared, a great organization and she went out and worked for it."

It took nearly two hours for the members to elect Pelosi on a 232-202 party-line vote. They stood one by one, many delivering brief remarks along with their votes. "Just as the biblical Esther was called to save the nation, I cast my vote for another woman called for such times as these," said Rep. Bobby Rush, the Chicago Democrat and former Black Panther. Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.) announced her vote for Pelosi was "for the future of all of our grandchildren and for world peace."

Pelosi sat in the center right section of the House, surrounded by her grandchildren and holding the youngest, 6-week-old Paul Michael, in a white blanket in her arms. She hugged and squeezed any other children who came within range and stood up to kiss a steady stream of well-wishers, including Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.), former Colorado representative Pat Schroeder and former transportation secretary Norman Mineta.

While the Democrats on the House floor were busy shaking hands, rubbing backs and congratulating each other, the Republican members largely sat quietly. Boehner left the chamber for long periods and Rep. J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), the outgoing speaker, stood at the back of the chamber against a railing, hands in his pockets.

The visitor galleries above the House floor were laden with Democratic supporters, donors, lobbyists, women's rights activists and Californians. Sitting among the Pelosi family were several celebrities, including singers Carole King and Tony Bennett and actor Richard Gere, who also appeared at a Democratic fundraiser last night honoring Pelosi at the National Building Museum.

The accessory of the day seemed to be a baby or, if not available, a toddler. Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) carried her 2-year-old granddaughter, Rigby, who was sleeping. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York, one of the new House Democrats, toted her 2-year-old son, Theodore.

"This was a long road and we're finally here," said DeLauro, a Pelosi ally. "The barriers are gone."

DOJ_NMG_0112589

The role model herself stood on the dais to swear in the entire House amid a clutch of children, including several of her own grandchildren. She was calm enough to let one of the younger girls hold the newest grandbaby, and she was focused enough to do her work amid their antics, a talent she perfected years ago as a mother of five and grass-roots political activist.

Congress Reopens Under New Management (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Fredreka Schouten, Usa Today

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a new twist on an old tradition, the new speaker of the House kissed the minority leader as he handed her the gavel.

Congress convened Thursday for the 110th time in the nation's history, but for the first time with a woman heading one of the chambers, and with Democrats in control of both the House and Senate for the first time in 12 years.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California took the speaker's gavel in what she called "a historic moment for the women of America." Republicans, some members of the Senate and a few former lawmakers joined in the thunderous applause.

"Whether you are a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, today is a cause for celebration," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Among the revelry: Supporters wearing denim and cowboy hats hoisted beers in honor of new Sen. Jon Tester, a farmer and Democrat who defeated incumbent Conrad Burns in Montana. Celebrities including former president Bill Clinton and actor Richard Gere were on hand at the Capitol to see it all.

IN-DEPTH: Ethics in aims | Pelosi leads wave of women | Video | Muslim makes history

The 33 new or re-elected senators who took their oaths included seven women, bringing the total number of women in Congress' upper chamber to a record 16. There are a record 74 women in the House, including three non-voting delegates. Clinton watched as his wife, Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton, was sworn in for her second term as New York's junior senator.

In other developments:

•Vern Buchanan, a freshman Republican from Florida, took his seat despite lawsuits filed to overturn his election by his Democratic opponent, Christine Jennings. Jennings narrowly lost a race in which 18,000 votes were lost because of voting machine errors. Pelosi said the House would allow the trial to proceed and decide whether to let Jennings take Buchanan's place later.

•Senate Democrats convened with their majority narrowed because of the absence of Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., who remains hospitalized after suffering bleeding in his brain last month. Sean Grady, chief of the University of Pennsylvania medical department, told USA TODAY that the latest medical reports on Johnson are "good news" but added it will likely be months before doctors can determine the extent of Johnson's recovery.

Bipartisanship was the watchword. "Be nice," Boehner told members, but bickering surfaced quickly. House Republicans protested Democrats' refusal to allow them to offer alternatives and amendments to an ethics package poised to win House approval today.

"The much-ballyhooed commitment to minority rights is virtually non-existent," said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif.

House Democrats promised Republicans opportunities to amend bills, but now say that won't happen until the House approves six measures that the Democrats promised during the fall campaign to enact in the first 100 legislative hours. That time period is likely to stretch until late this month.

"We view the first 100 hours as essentially a mandate from the American people," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

In addition to the ethics package, which bans travel and gifts paid for by lobbyists, the Democratic bills would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, promote expanded research using embryonic stem cells, rescind tax breaks for the oil industry and cut interest rates on student loans. Other measures would enact recommendations from the 9/11 Commission and allow the government to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices.

The Senate won't act as fast. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., plan to introduce an ethics bill next week.

DOJ_NMG_0112590

Pelosi called the Democratic ethics package, formed as a response to recent scandals involving influence-buying by lobbyists, "the toughest ethics reform in history."

The legislation, however, didn't discourage lobbyists from turning out for the round of parties that ushered in the new term. Among them: a $1,000-a-ticket fundraiser for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee that featured Tony Bennett and members of the Grateful Dead.

Rick Carter, a lobbyist for PG&E Corp., a California-based energy company, was navigating a three-page list of receptions. "It's time to set agendas and strategies and see what we can get accomplished," he said.

Joyful Democrats Salute Speaker Pelosi (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

House Democrats unanimously picked Nancy Pelosi yesterday to be their leader and the first female speaker of the House in U.S. history.

"For our daughters and our granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling," Mrs. Pelosi told a cheering House chamber yesterday, moments after accepting the speaker's gavel. "For our daughters and our granddaughters now, the sky is the limit."

Democrats dedicated their votes to famous feminists, children everywhere and even world peace.

"In the name of Jesus," Rep. Jesse L. Jackson Jr. of Illinois said as he cast his vote for Mrs. Pelosi.

Rep. Jose E. Serrano of New York cast his vote for her in Spanish.

Even Rep. Gene Taylor, the conservative Democrat who had cast a protest vote against Mrs. Pelosi in past leadership elections, dutifully voted for her yesterday. With his vote, Mrs. Pelosi -- whose voting record is considerably more liberal than many fellow Democrats -- got her first unanimous leadership election

So, when Mr. Taylor cast his vote for her, Democrats jumped to their feet in thunderous applause, catching the fair-haired Mississippian a little off guard.

Rep. Maxine Waters of California cast her vote in honor of feminist icons Bella Abzug and Gloria Steinem.

Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, hailed Mrs. Pelosi -- the daughter of former Baltimore Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro -- as "Maryland's favorite daughter, California's pride."

Wearing a burgundy suit, pearls and a broad grin, Mrs. Pelosi sat at her seat waving thanks to those who voted for her. Surrounding her were her young grandchildren in various stages of behavior during the two-hour affair. Sitting in the balcony with the rest of her family was crooner Tony Bennett, who was to serenade her at a celebration concert later in the evening.

After the 233-202 vote was tallied and announced, Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said it was a "high privilege" to hand the gavel to the first female speaker in more than 200 years.

And though the federal government has expanded far beyond the hopes and expectations of the Founding Fathers, he said, they would view the selection "approvingly."

"My fellow Americans, whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, today is a cause for celebration," Mr. Boehner said.

When Mrs. Pelosi assumed the gavel, she promised "partnership, not partisanship," and paid tribute to the troops and former President Gerald R. Ford, who died the day after Christmas.

She also paid tribute to St. Francis of Assisi, the namesake of her hometown of San Francisco who robbed from his wealthy cloth-merchant father to give to the poor.

When Mrs. Pelosi called for a change of course in Iraq, there was jubilant applause from Democrats, while Republicans remained seated and virtually silent.

And she promised -- much as Republicans did when they took power 12 years ago -- to restore fiscal discipline.

"After years of historic deficits, this 110th Congress will commit itself to a higher standard: Pay as you go, no new deficit spending," she said. "Our new America will provide unlimited opportunity for future generations, not burden them with mountains of debt."

DOJ_NMG_0112591

Hours later, her caucus unanimously approved a package of new rules that allows Democratic leaders to waive the requirement that three-fifths support be required to raise federal taxes.

"It didn't take long for House Democrats to reveal their true intentions," said Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, Georgia Republican. "They've been in power for a matter of hours, and they immediately signal their plans to raise income taxes on American families. I hope Georgia voters will take a look at who voted against this effort to prevent tax increases."

Sitting quietly at the back of the chamber was outgoing Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, who at one point was recognized for his service. He slowly rose, gave a wide wave and dug his hands deep into his pants pockets to wait for the hearty, bipartisan applause to die down.

During the ceremony, Mr. Boehner also lingered for a moment on the 12 years of Republican rule that ended yesterday.

"There were some great achievements during those 12 years that followed," he said. "There were also some profound disappointments."

Then he offered a brief but sober analysis of Republican failures that caused their downfall. Most Americans, he said, don't care who controls Congress.

"What they want is a government that is limited, honest, accountable and responsive to their needs," he said. "And the moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

Forgive The Cynicism, But This Is Change? (WP)

By Greg Craig

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Forgive the cynicism, Mr. President, but if you were serious about cooperating and consulting with the new Congress, you wouldn't be parading your bipartisan bona fides through the op-ed pages of the Wall Street Journal. You wouldn't be holding news conferences in the Rose Garden telling the world how ready, willing and able you are -- we know you are not eager -- to work with the Democratic Congress. You would instead be meeting privately with Democratic leaders, identifying specific areas where progress can be made and joining with them to come up with a legislative agenda that is truly bipartisan.

To many of us, your post-November conversion to bipartisanship appears to be nothing but spin -- at least so far. You misunderestimate our capacity to remember the way you treated the Democrats when your party ran Congress. We will not soon forget your "my way or the highway" approach. You will forgive us if we pay more attention to what you do than to what you say.

Forgive the early criticism, Speaker Pelosi, but if you were serious about introducing and fostering a new atmosphere of bipartisanship in Washington, you might have waited a decent interval before shoving legislation down the throats of the minority party. You might have been more willing to give Republicans warning about what they would be voting on, and you might even have been willing to consult with them about the substance of those bills. Much of the country agreed with the Democrats' criticism of the highhanded way the Republicans ran the House, and much of the country voted for Democratic candidates in the hope that Democrats would make the legislative process fair and transparent.

Your plan to force members to vote with no opportunity to offer amendments is inconsistent with what Democrats said they would do and what American voters hoped they would do. This is a blindness that will come back to haunt you.

Forgive the gratuitous commentary about presidential politics, but couldn't the candidates do away with exploratory committees and reinstate the old-fashioned announcement? Couldn't they wait a while longer before taking the plunge? It is only five days into 2007, and 2008 seems to be upon us already -- at least in the eyes of the potential candidates. When someone leaks a secret memo showing that private citizen Giuliani is worried about possible scandal in his personal history, and when former Massachusetts governor Romney changes his position on same-sex unions so dramatically, you don't have to be a weathervane to know which way the wind is blowing. And if Sen. Clinton were truly unhappy about being forced to make an early decision on whether to be a serious senator or a serious presidential candidate, she'd take the easy way out of her dilemma: She could just tell the world that she won't make a decision until June or July -- and then live with it. No wringing of hands or whining required.

Forgive the cold water on an otherwise impressive event, candidate Edwards, but why couldn't you have simply announced your candidacy? Your announcement from New Orleans looked like a partisan gimmick, taking advantage of human misery to take a shot at the Republicans. Your genuine concern about the problem of poverty in America is well known. Shouldn't that issue be used to unite Americans, not to divide them?

DOJ_NMG_0112592

Forgive me for being hard-boiled, but from my perspective inside the Beltway, it looks like 2007 is business as usual.

In New Senate, The 'Candy Desk' Gets A Kiss-Off (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats back in control of Congress for the first time in years, much is changing in the nation's capital, including a longtime tradition in the U.S. Senate: the "candy desk."

For a decade until his defeat last year, Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican, stocked the desk with donations from home-state candy makers including Hershey Co. and Just Born Inc., maker of Hot Tamales and Peanut Chews.

With Mr. Santorum gone, the desk, which is dipped into by many members, has been turned over to Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican from Wyoming. But his state is better known for bison than bonbons -- and that's a big problem.

Ethics rules forbid members accepting gifts worth $100 or more a year from a single source. One exception covers items produced in a senator's home state -- so long as they're used primarily by people other than the senator or his staff. The provision was crafted to allow senators to offer visitors home-grown snacks, such as Florida orange juice or Georgia peanuts.

In Wyoming, some small outfits sell esoteric sweets, such as chocolates designed to look like moose droppings. But the state doesn't have any big, brand-name candy makers who could step into the breach. As a result, the candy-industry lobbying group, which coordinates stocking the desk, is cutting off the sweets, citing Wyoming's candy deficit and ethics rules.

"We're happy to provide candy if there are [association] members" in the home state of the senator who sits at the candy desk, says Susan Smith, a spokesman for the National Confectioners Association. "It would be difficult for us to do now."

Good Spirit

Hershey, of Hershey, Pa., is taking the kiss-off in good spirit. "We were pleased to be a small part of sweetening up congressional proceedings," says Kirk Saville, a company spokesman.

As it happens, relying on Pennsylvania wasn't an option. Mr. Santorum's successor, Bob Casey, is a Democrat, and the candy desk has by tradition always been located on the Republican side of the Senate chamber, in a heavily trafficked area near the exit to the elevators. The state's other senator, Arlen Specter, a Republican, already has a choice seat toward the front.

Before Mr. Thomas was tapped to take possession, the sweet-tooth crowd erroneously speculated that Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker, the only new Republican senator, would end up with the desk. That might have worked out fine since Tennessee is home to Brach's Confections Inc., which also has operations in Texas, as well as the Standard Candy Co., which makes GooGoo Clusters.

The Senate takes its furniture seriously. It is still using the 48 desks built in 1819 by a New York cabinetmaker to replace those burned by the British during the War of 1812. As new states joined the union, and the Senate grew, new desks of similar design were built. At the beginning of each Congress, desks are reapportioned among Republicans and Democrats and then senators get their choice, based on seniority.

The candy desk -- a tradition, not a rule -- dates to 1968, according to the Senate Historical Office. That's when Sen. George Murphy, the former actor and film executive, began sharing treats from the back row.

He left in 1971, and those who inherited the desk continued his largess. At times, senators asked for specific candy. Others left a few dollars to keep the desk stocked. Over time, the practice became more institutionalized, says Betty K. Koed, assistant historian in the Senate Historical Office. Eventually, the National Confectioners Association, along with the Chocolate Manufacturers Association, began to organize donations.

Because of its location in the back, the seat is generally occupied by junior senators. But Mr. Santorum made a point of keeping the desk even as he rose in seniority to highlight his state's prowess. Pennsylvania companies sent about 100 pounds of candy to Mr. Santorum's office each quarter, says Robert Traynham, the ex-senator's former spokesman. That's equivalent to about 38,000 Hershey's kisses a year.

Continuing the Tradition

DOJ_NMG_0112593

Mr. Thomas, who came to Washington in 1989 to take Dick Cheney's seat in the House and was elected to the Senate five years later, vows to continue the tradition -- somehow. "The candy desk has been my favorite for a while," he says. He admits to regularly dipping into Mr. Santorum's stash.

The senator's spokesman, Cameron Hardy, says his boss requested the seat because "he likes the idea of sharing with his colleagues." Yet Mr. Hardy concedes that Mr. Thomas and his staff initially weren't familiar with how the candy desk worked. "I don't think anyone realized it was a big undertaking," he says, or that candy companies played a role in supplying the goodies.

One option is to turn to mom-and-pop shops in Wyoming that make, or re-package, sweets with a frontier flair. Bessie Zeller has a family business, Queen Bee Gardens, in Lovell, Wyo., which produces caramel-like candies from honey. She already sends about 24 pounds of candy, worth about $185, every couple of months to members of the state's congressional delegation. She gets some payment for the goodies. "I don't think we can afford to donate it all," she says.

Mary Ann Kuschel of Cheyenne sells mostly re-packaged candy, such as "moose doodles" (chocolate covered almonds "shaped just like moose droppings") and "bison balls" (round Rice Krispies treats dipped in chocolate, sold in packages of two.) She says her home-based business is ill-equipped to make big donations to the U.S. Senate. "I don't think so," she says. "Not for free."

Senate ethics rules may give Mr. Thomas some wiggle room, allowing him to seek contributions from senators whose states are more richly endowed, something he says he is contemplating. Robert Kelner, who heads the election and political law practice at Covington & Burling LLP, says a candy company could "in theory" send less than $100 worth of candy to each senator over the course of the year and not violate gift limits.

Says Mr. Hardy, the senator's spokesman: "I'm sure we'll get through it somehow."

Miers Resigns As White House Counsel (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 5, 2007

Harriet Miers, President Bush's failed Supreme Court nominee and longtime adviser, on Thursday submitted her resignation as White House counsel.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the president reluctantly accepted her resignation, which takes effect Jan. 31. He said a search for a successor is under way.

Bush nominated Miers in October 2005 to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, but she dropped out under fire from conservatives who questioned her qualifications and would not support her.

Asked why she was leaving, Snow said: "Basically, she has been here six years."

He said Miers, 61, a loyal adviser to the president for years, has been having conversations with White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten about leaving for some time and both agreed that it was time for a change at the White House office of legal counsel.

At the White House, Miers is known as a diligent adviser, one of the first to arrive and one of the last to leave.

"Harriet is one of the most beloved people here at the White House," Snow said, adding that she was a scrupulous lawyer who aggressively defended the Constitution.

"As somebody said earlier today, 'She put 12 years of service into six years,'" Snow said.

Snow said Miers' departure did not signal the beginning of an exodus of senior officials after six bruising years at the White House. Asked if other officials were poised to go, Snow said, "I'm aware of none and anticipate none."

As White House counsel, Miers works behind-the-scenes overseeing a team of attorneys who provide legal advice to Bush on matters large and small. But when Bush picked her to fill an opening at the Supreme Court, she became a household name, albeit briefly. Her background and every word were scrutinized. Television cameras rolled as she walked up Capitol Hill to meet with lawmakers charged with confirming her as a justice.

She dropped out under fire from conservatives who criticized her for having thin credentials on constitutional law and no proven record as a judicial conservative. That forced Bush to scramble for a new Supreme Court nominee who could calm a conservative rebellion and walk sure-footedly through a Senate confirmation hearing. He turned to Samuel Alito, a federal appeals court judge from New Jersey, who was ultimately confirmed.

DOJ_NMG_0112594

Ironically, one of Miers' tasks as counsel was to vet potential nominees for openings on the federal bench — and the Supreme Court.

"Participating in the process to help identify the best nominees for the American people has been among the most rewarding of my experiences," Miers wrote Bush in a resignation letter dated Thursday. "Your commitment to nominating judges who will interpret the law and who know the proper role of a judge has made this nation stronger and our justice system fairer."

Miers, who grew up in Dallas and received her undergraduate and law degrees from Southern Methodist University, was the first woman hired by her law firm, in 1972; first woman president of the Dallas Bar Association, in 1985; first woman president of the Texas bar, in 1992; and first woman president of her law firm, in 1996.

The soft-spoken Miers has described herself as a "Texan through and through." White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove said she can be "tough as nails." Bush once called her "a pit bull in size 6 shoes."

She clerked for a federal judge there and then joined Locke Purnell Rain Harrell, rising to become its first female president. After the firm merged with another, she was co-managing partner of the 400-lawyer Locke Liddell & Sapp.

She was Bush's personal lawyer in Texas, took on the thankless job of cleaning up the Texas Lottery when he was governor, and followed him to Washington to serve as staff secretary until Bush appointed her White House counsel, succeeding Alberto Gonzales when he was named attorney general.

Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up For Battle (WP)

By Peter Baker And R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

President Bush accepted the resignation of White House counsel Harriet Miers yesterday as he remakes his legal team to prepare for what aides expect to be a sustained struggle with a new Democratic Congress eager to investigate various aspects of his administration.

Miers, a longtime Bush loyalist whose nomination to the Supreme Court was withdrawn in 2005 as a result of conservative opposition, led an office that will oversee legal clashes that could erupt if Democrats aggressively use their new subpoena power. Bush advisers inside and outside the White House concluded that she is not equipped for such a battle and that the president needs someone who can strongly defend his prerogatives.

The White House did not announce a replacement but has settled on someone to take on the assignment, according to several advisers who did not disclose the name. Four other lawyers have been hired as associate counsels in recent weeks to fill vacancies, and White House officials have discussed expanding the office, which -- with a dozen lawyers -- is far smaller than it was under President Bill Clinton, who faced legal battles on multiple fronts.

The effort to form a new legal team anticipates a spate of congressional demands for information on politically sensitive topics such as whether officials authorized the abuse of U.S. detainees, whether the administration turned a blind eye to profiteering by politically connected contractors in the Iraq war, how the White House responded to Hurricane Katrina, and whether senior officials complied with the law in ordering heightened domestic surveillance.

At the Justice Department, lawyers in the Office of Legal Counsel have been meeting with counterparts from other agencies to discuss potential points of conflict with Congress and to map out legal strategies for responding to demands for documents and testimony, according to several officials. The department has also held internal meetings on this topic in recent weeks with representatives from the FBI and from Justice's other major components, one official said.

"They face the question of, to what extent you cooperate or protect presidential prerogatives and withhold documents," said H. Christopher Bartolomucci, a former Bush White House lawyer. "Potentially, it could be a period of conflict with the Hill. . . . It's not necessarily going to be a bloodbath, but it's certainly possible."

Republican advisers have been telling the White House to be ready for war, and many cited Miers as the wrong general. "The White House knew they needed to get a tough street fighter -- that's what this is about," said one such adviser, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to preserve access to the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0112595

The advice, according to this person, could be summed up this way: "You guys better lawyer up, and lawyer up in the right way. You better understand the need and the peril and the urgency. . . . You need somebody as tough as [Clinton aides] Harold Ickes or Bruce Lindsey. Because they're coming for you."

Miers, Bush's personal lawyer in Texas, is popular in the West Wing and is admired for her hard work, loyalty and character. But since taking over last spring, White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten had privately expressed doubt that Miers, 61, was right for the job, current and former officials said.

When news reports at the time suggested that she might leave as part of Bolten's initial shakeup, Miers talked to Bush and kept her job, the sources said. After Democrats captured Congress in November, the issue was revisited and some Republicans were told before Thanksgiving that someone else would be brought in.

Miers had told colleagues that she planned to stay until the end of the administration, but after several conversations with Bolten in the past week, she agreed it was time to move on. "We're entering a new era here in the White House, and they both came to that conclusion," a senior administration official said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow praised Miers as "an extraordinarily wonderful human being" and a "ferocious defender of the Constitution" who is leaving because she has been in the White House for six years. In a letter to Bush released by the White House, Miers offered expansive praise for the president while never explaining her departure: "It is hard to leave the tasks at hand. They are gravely important, and I shall miss greatly the arena in which the battles of our times are being fought."

The White House plans to replace her with a lawyer from the outside. Speculation focused on former solicitor general Theodore B. Olson, but he said he had no intention of taking the job. "I'm not going to be replacing Harriet Miers," Olson said yesterday.

Sources said the White House hired a fourth new associate counsel just this week, Michael Scudder, a former federal prosecutor in New York who had been working at the Justice Department on national security issues.

The administration's decision to prepare for battle comes despite an effort by congressional Democrats to discourage public talk of an imminent clash. Mindful of their one-vote margin of control in the Senate and keen to retain the House and capture the presidency in 2008, Democrats say they are anxious to avoid appearing shrill or excessively partisan.

"I'm going to work on the assumption that there won't be a problem in getting information," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. "There has been [resistance] in the past, but we were in the minority. Now, if the committee requests information, [it] will be acting on behalf of the committee and they have a responsibility to respond. I'm not looking for a confrontation."

Talk of accommodation is undercut, however, by the fact that both parties have firm opposing positions on whether Congress has the right to peer closely into executive-branch deliberations and documents, especially on national security. Led by Vice President Cheney, the administration has long backed a legal theory that the Constitution gives the president considerably more authority than Congress and the judiciary.

In keeping with that view, the Justice Department on Dec. 22 spurned a request by then-incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) for a memo signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to create secret detention facilities overseas. It also rejected Leahy's request for a Justice Department memo detailing the interrogation methods the CIA could use. A letter to Leahy signed by acting Assistant Attorney General James H. Clinger explained that "we are not able to disclose" operational details of the CIA program and said that the interrogation memo constituted "confidential legal advice."

Leahy expressed disappointment on Tuesday that the administration had "squandered another opportunity to work cooperatively with Congress." But Leahy did not say what he would do next, other than promising that his committee "will continue its efforts to obtain the information that it needs" for oversight.

Other Democrats said his cautious approach is in keeping with admonitions to incoming committee chairmen by Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to avoid immediate confrontation. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has issued similar warnings.

However, one sign that relations will be bumpy is a decision by House leaders to give Waxman's committee special authority to force administration officials to sit for depositions, a tool it last had under Republicans in the late 1990s. Waxman said he has not set a firm agenda but intends to focus on "waste, fraud and abuse," the government's response to Katrina, and actions taken by U.S. contractors in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112596

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) is also interested in contracting waste in Iraq and plans to investigate what officials knew about the abuse of detainees, aides said. He has announced plans to hire three new investigators to examine these and other matters.

Staff writers Al Kamen and Dan Eggen contributed to this report.

Miers Steps Down As White House Counsel (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Harriet E. Miers, President Bush's longtime confidante and onetime Supreme Court nominee, has resigned as White House counsel, officials said Thursday.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that Mr. Bush had accepted Ms. Miers's resignation "reluctantly" and that she had tendered it after deciding she was ready for a change after six years in the job. The White House said that a search for a successor was under way and that Ms. Miers would remain at her post through this month.

Mr. Snow said her departure was not the beginning of another round of changes in the West Wing.

"For those who are speculating about any others within the White House proper, I am aware of none and expect none," Mr. Snow said.

Still, her announced resignation came with Mr. Bush poised to name a new director of national intelligence, J. Michael McConnell, a retired Navy vice admiral and director of the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996, and move his current director, John D. Negroponte, to the State Department as its second in command.

Rumors of Ms. Miers's departure date back to the White House shake-up last spring, when Joshua B. Bolten became Mr. Bush's chief of staff and undertook a review of all personnel. Mr. Bolten was said at the time to have raised the possibility of moving Ms. Miers out of the counsel's office, though White House officials denied it.

Mr. Snow said her decision to resign did come after a series of meetings with Mr. Bolten.

"She's been here for six years," Mr. Snow said. "It's hard duty."

Ms. Miers has worked with Mr. Bush since his days as Texas governor and has grown close to him and the first lady, Laura Bush.

Ms. Miers started at the White House as staff secretary after the 2000 campaign and became a deputy chief of staff before moving to the White House counsel's office.

Mr. Bush's decision to nominate her to the Supreme Court in 2005 provoked the ire of liberals and conservatives, who criticized her as a Bush crony who did not have the legal intellectual credentials or résumé the job required. She withdrew her name from consideration but returned to Mr. Bush's inner circle and remained one of his closest advisers.

In her resignation letter, Ms. Miers said her own role in helping Mr. Bush choose nominees for the federal bench was "among the most rewarding of my experiences."

Hers is the latest in a series of departures from the White House by longtime advisers to Mr. Bush. It came just weeks after the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Also last year, the former White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, and Mr. Bush's first chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., both stepped down.

In an interview on Thursday, Mr. Card said Ms. Miers had held three of the most demanding jobs at the White House. "She was in tremendously grueling roles," he said. "None of those responsibilities are 8 to 6, they're 5 to 11, all night long."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Text hereWinning Parties in More Ways Than One

DOJ_NMG_0112597

It was a big party for Nancy Pelosi at the stunning Kalorama home of Democratic fundraiser Esther Coopersmith Wednesday night -- it just didn't turn out to be a party with Nancy Pelosi.

The new speaker never managed to pry herself away from another dinner in her honor over at the Italian Embassy. But no matter: Everyone was all atwitter over the other newly ordained superstar who did stop by.

"Isn't it wonderful that Adrian Fenty was here!" gushed one doyenne.

The new mayor somehow made the scene all over town that night. First, the inaugural party for Ward 5 Council member Harry Thomas Jr. at Love nightclub in Northeast. Then a swearing-in reception for school board members at Sumner School downtown. Then the drop-by at Coopersmith's, a party hosted by California's congressional sister act Loretta and Linda Sanchez, and populated by some 250 people at its peak -- reps, diplomats and the Grateful Dead's Mickey Hart and Bob Weir (sporting a Jerry esque gray beard and having a meditative moment spinning an antique globe in the study). Fenty was caught up in the mingling throngs in the foyer but lingered for almost an hour, according to some guests. "In a room with legitimate rock stars, it added another rock star aura to the mix," noted Jim Dau, press secretary to Linda Sanchez.

And then Fenty was off again, this time to Foggy Bottom to catch the GWU men's basketball victory over Fordham, where he was introduced on the Jumbotron. "The only time in recorded history that a politician was not booed at an athletic event," said his host, WTOP political commentator Mark Plotkin. "But it is his first day on the job."

Hardly an unusual night, said spokeswoman Carrie Brooks-- he kept that pace over two years of campaigning and had at least three such events scheduled last night. Red Bull? "He's a Vitamin Water guy."

Meanwhile, who could blame Pelosi for lingering at the seated dinner her folks hosted for supporters at the packed Italian Embassy, where the 500-some guests included Chris Dodd, Madeleine Albright, Barbara Boxer and Charlie R angel. On the menu -- lamb, vegetables and risotto. On the mike -- James Taylor and Tony Bennett, who sang, of course, "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."Raven Goodwin, a Girl Who Has Her Act Together

Another local kid makes good! Fourteen-year-old actress Raven Goodwin has landed her first regular TV gig on Nickelodeon's new teen comedy "Just Jordan," which premieres Sunday night. The show stars 16-year-old comedian Lil' JJ, with Goodwin playing his wisecracking cousin Tangie. "I'm sooo excited," she told us yesterday. "Tangie is very sassy."

Goodwin caught the acting bug when she was 4 and spent the next decade beefing up her rÃ©sumÃ© with commercials and movies (she got raves for her roles in high-profile indie flicks "Lovely & Amazing" and "The Station Agent") while going to school at Lyndon Hill Elementary School in Prince George's County. The family moved to Los Angeles two years ago, where she did TV ("All of Us," "Everybody Hates Chris," "Malcolm in the Middle") between home schooling.

She's already shot 13 episodes of the Nick series, and will see the premiere with family and friends at a viewing party Sunday night. "I can't wait to see how everything came out," she said. "They should get ready to laugh because the first episode is hilarious."HEY, ISN'T THAT . . .

Wednesday night's full moon brought all sorts of VIPs out on the town:

Â· Laura Bush, Condi Rice, Mary Matalin, Margaret Spellings and Harriet Miers at Cactus Cantina for a surprise birthday party for Karen Hughes. A dozen Bush administration power babes gathered at the Tex-Mex restaurant for fajitas, enchiladas, quesadillas, margaritas and chocolate cake with a "classified" number of candles. (Hughes turned 50 on Dec. 27.) No word on how many hot chilies Miers ate, but she announced her resignation yesterday morning. Hmmmm.

Â· Ne wt Gingrich at DC Coast. The former House speaker and his wife were joined by former Virginia governor Mark Warner. No word on who's running for what.

Â· Pat Leahy and a small group at the Tabard Inn welcoming Vermont's newly minted Rep. Peter Welch.

Â· Jean Kennedy Smith, son William and his family at Nathans, sitting under the David Kennerly photograph of Bobby Kennedy.

First, Do Less Harm (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112598

Universal health care, much as we need it, won't happen until there's a change of management in the White House. In the meantime, however, Congress can take an important step toward making our health care system less wasteful, by fixing the Medicare Middleman Multiplication Act of 2003.

Officially, of course, it was the Medicare Modernization Act. But as we learned during the debate over Social Security, in Bushspeak "modernize" is a synonym for "privatize." And one of the main features of the legislation was an effort to bring private-sector fragmentation and inefficiency to one of America's most important public programs.

The process actually started in the 1990s, when Medicare began allowing recipients to replace traditional Medicare — in which the government pays doctors and hospitals — with private managed-care plans, in which the government pays a fee to an H.M.O. The magic of the marketplace was supposed to cut Medicare's costs.

The plan backfired. H.M.O.'s received fees reflecting the medical costs of the average Medicare recipient, but to maximize profits they selectively enrolled only healthier seniors, leaving sicker, more expensive people in traditional Medicare. Once Medicare became aware of this cream-skimming and started adjusting payments to reflect beneficiaries' health, the H.M.O.'s began dropping out: their extra layer of bureaucracy meant that they had higher costs than traditional Medicare and couldn't compete on a financially fair basis.

That should have been the end of the story. But for the Bush administration and its Congressional allies, privatization isn't a way to deliver better government services — it's an end in itself. So the 2003 legislation increased payments to Medicare-supported H.M.O.'s, which were renamed Medicare Advantage plans. These plans are now heavily subsidized.

According to the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, an independent federal body that advises Congress on Medicare issues, Medicare Advantage now costs 11 percent more per beneficiary than traditional Medicare. According to the Commonwealth Fund, which has a similar estimate of the excess cost, the subsidy to private H.M.O.'s cost Medicare $5.4 billion in 2005.

The inability of private middlemen to win a fair competition against traditional Medicare was embarrassing to those who sing the praises of privatization. Maybe that's why the Bush administration made sure that there is no competition at all in Part D, the drug program. There's no traditional Medicare version of Part D, in which the government pays drug costs directly. Instead, the elderly must get coverage from a private insurance company, which then receives a government subsidy.

As a result, Part D is highly confusing. It's also needlessly expensive, for two reasons: the insurance companies add an extra layer of bureaucracy, and they have limited ability to bargain with drug companies for lower prices (and Medicare is prohibited from bargaining on their behalf). One indicator of how much Medicare is overspending is the sharp rise in prices paid by millions of low-income seniors whose drug coverage has been switched from Medicaid, which doesn't rely on middlemen and does bargain over prices, to the new Medicare program.

The costs imposed on Medicare by gratuitous privatization are almost certainly higher than the cost of providing health insurance to the eight million children in the United States who lack coverage. But recent news analyses have suggested that Democrats may not be able to guarantee coverage to all children because this would conflict with their pledge to be fiscally responsible. Isn't it strange how fiscal responsibility is a big concern when Congress is trying to help children, but a non issue when Congress is subsidizing drug and insurance companies?

What should Congress do? The new Democratic majority is poised to reduce drug prices by allowing — and, probably, requiring — Medicare to negotiate prices on behalf of the private drug plans. But it should go further, and force Medicare to offer direct drug coverage that competes on a financially fair basis with the private plans. And it should end the subsidy to Medicare Advantage, forcing H.M.O.'s to engage in fair competition with traditional Medicare.

Conservatives will fight fiercely against these moves. They say they believe in competition — but they're against competition that might show the public sector doing a better job than the private sector. Progressives should support these moves for the same reason. Ending the subsidies to middlemen, in addition to saving a lot of money, would point the way to broader health care reform.

Medicare Drug Plan's 2nd Year Less Bumpy (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

DOJ_NMG_0112599

USA Today, January 5, 2007

Patient advocates and pharmacists are reporting fewer glitches as the Medicare drug benefit begins its second year, but they say problems could still crop up in the coming weeks.

Last year, as the drug plan rolled out for the first time, confusion was widespread as Medicare members grappled with the complex new program, facing long waits on telephone lines and computer glitches that kept some people from getting the drugs they needed.

This week, "We're seeing similar problems as we saw in January '06, but they're not as prolific," says Mike James, a Raleigh, N.C., pharmacist and member of the Association of Community Pharmacists Congressional Network, a lobbying group in Washington.

He says pharmacists are reporting hour-long telephone calls to resolve questions about patients' benefits. One popular plan, backed by the AARP, had computer glitches the first two days of the year that added to the backup, he says.

Deane Beebe of the Medicare Rights Center says the quiet first week may be partly a result of some rules put into place last year requiring insurers to provide a 30-day supply of any medication currently used by a member — even if it is not part of the insurer's list of covered drugs.

Insurers are required to notify patients that the supply is temporary and that they need to work with their doctors to switch to drugs that are covered or seek an exception to the coverage.

Beebe says her group has also heard that some lower-income patients eligible for government subsidies that eliminate deductibles and co-payments are being asked for those payments.

"The fact that they are eligible for extra help is not (always) registered in computers," she says.

Because many of the insurers have made changes to their policies since last year, new concerns could crop up in the coming weeks. "It's possible that people will end up trying to get drugs they took all through 2006, but are now not on the formulary and they didn't realize that," says Kelly Brantley at the Health Assistance Partnership, a group that helps support counseling and advocacy programs for senior citizens.

An analysis by Avalere Health, a private, for-profit research group in Washington, D.C., shows that most insurers did not significantly change the number of drugs covered, but many increased the co-payments patients will make for those drugs. It found:

First Muslim Lawmaker Takes Oath With Quran (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — On the same day Nancy Pelosi became the first female speaker of the House, freshman Rep. Keith Ellison got almost as much attention.

The Minnesota Democrat, the first Muslim elected to Congress, used a Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson rather than a Bible as he re-enacted his swearing-in with Pelosi.

The scene created a human traffic jam near the House floor. About 30 members of Ellison's extended family posed before about two dozen TV cameras, including one from the Arab network Al-Arabiya. James Billington, the librarian of Congress, walked the two-volume Quran, circa 1764, into the Capitol in a shoebox. Ellison's wife, Kim, held it.

Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., took exception last month to the 43-year-old Ellison's planned use of the Quran and said tougher immigration measures were needed to prevent the election of "many more Muslims." On Thursday, the two shook hands and agreed to have coffee.

"I congratulated him on being elected," Goode said, but added, "My concern is I do not want the United States to become a Muslim nation."

"I was glad to meet him," said Ellison, who was born in Detroit and converted to Islam. "The issue is, how can we knock down barriers of religion, color and culture?"

Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, helped engineer the meeting. "They're two good people," he said. "It's an opportunity for healing."

DOJ_NMG_0112600

The day's events were enjoyed by Ellison's mother Clida, a Catholic who told the Associated Press she attends Mass daily, and sons Isaiah, Elijah and Jeremiah. Daughter Amirah was "jazzed," Ellison said, "because the speaker is a girl, too. That's what she said."

Ellison Uses Thomas Jefferson's Quran (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, January 5, 2007

Keith Ellison made history Thursday, becoming the first Muslim member of Congress and punctuating the occasion by taking a ceremonial oath with a Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson.

"Look at that. That's something else," Ellison, D-Minn., said as officials from the Library of Congress showed him the two-volume Quran, which was published in London in 1764.

A few minutes later, Ellison took the ceremonial oath with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., at his side. So many of Ellison's family members attended the ceremony that it was done in two takes.

Ellison had already planned to be sworn in using a Quran, rather than a Bible. He learned last month about Jefferson's Quran, with its multicolored cover and brown leather binding, and made arrangements to borrow it.

Although the Library of Congress is right across the street from the Capitol, library officials took extra precautions in delivering the Quran for the ceremony. To protect it from the elements, they placed the Quran in a rectangular box, and handled it with a green felt wrapper once they got it inside the Capitol.

Instead of using surface streets, they walked it over via a series of winding, underground tunnels — a trip that took more than 15 minutes. Guards then ran the book through security x-ray machines at the Capitol.

The Quran was acquired in 1815 as part of a more than 6,400-volume collection that Jefferson sold for $24,000 to replace the congressional library that had been burned by British troops the year before, in the War of 1812. Jefferson, the nation's third president, was a collector of books in all topics and languages.

The book's leather binding was added in 1919. Inside, it reads, "The Koran, commonly called 'The Alcoran of Mohammed.'" Jefferson marked his ownership by writing the letter "J" next to the letter "T" that was already at the bottom of pages, according to Mark Dimunation, chief of the Library of Congress' rare book and special collections division.

Ellison, the first black member of Congress from Minnesota, was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college. He said earlier this week that he chose to use this Quran because it showed that a visionary like Jefferson believed that wisdom could be gleaned from many sources.

In a brief interview Thursday on his way to a vote, Ellison suggested he had tired of the whole issue of his using the Quran.

"It was good, we did it, it's over, and now it's time to get down to business," he said.

Asked if he was relieved to have it behind him, Ellison said, "Yeah, because maybe we don't have to talk about it so much anymore. Not that I'm complaining, but the pressing issues the country is facing are just a little bit more on my mind right now."

Ellison's mother, Clida Ellison, said in an interview that she thought any controversy over her son's choice was good, "because many people in America are going to learn what the diversity of America is all about."

She described herself as a practicing Catholic.

"I go to Mass every day," she said.

1st Muslim Elected To Congress Takes Office (MCT)

By Kevin Diaz

McClatchy Newspapers, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - A jubilant Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, was sworn in to office Thursday holding his left hand on a leather-bound volume of a Quran that Thomas Jefferson once owned.

In a day of firsts, the 43-year-old lawyer and former Minnesota state representative was sworn in by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., the first female speaker of the House of Representatives.

"It's a day of welcoming," said Ellison, accompanied by his wife, Kim, and their four children, including 12-year-old Elijah, wearing an African kente cloth draped over his suit. "It's a day of more people coming into the process."

DOJ_NMG_0112601

"You sure know how to attract a crowd," Pelosi said to Ellison as they prepared for his ceremonial swearing-in in a wood-paneled chamber of the Capitol before hundreds of journalists from around the world, including the Qatar-based TV channel Al-Jazeera.

Replied Ellison: "Maybe they're here for you."

Ellison then held his right hand in the air and placed his left hand on two brown leather-bound volumes of the Quran, which were held aloft by his wife, a teacher at an alternative school in St. Paul, Minn.

Moments earlier, the 110th Congress had been sworn in en masse on the House floor, where Ellison shook hands with Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., who'd criticized Ellison for planning to use the Quran.

Ellison said he followed through with his plan to suggest coffee with Goode, whose district includes Jefferson's historic home of Monticello. He said Goode had accepted.

"I don't anticipate we're going to have any problems," Ellison said. "We're not holding any grudges."

Ellison, characterizing his faith as mainstream American, tried to minimize the media hype over Goode and the Quran.

He challenged an Arab journalists' contention that Americans dislike Muslims and struck a matter-of-fact tone in describing his feelings about making history by swearing on the Quran.

"I haven't really thought about the historical significance of it," he said. "I'm a Muslim. It's my faith."

Ellison's ceremonial swearing-in took place in silence, apart from the sounds of hundreds of camera clicks. The two Qurans, published in London in 1764, then were placed in a white cardboard box and returned to Librarian of Congress James Billington, who walked them through a maze of underground tunnels to the Library of Congress across the street.

"They have to be handled lightly," Billington said. "I'm liable for them."

Ellison, introducing his family to the press, gave a thumbs-up sign and said, "We're here to work for the American people."

Jefferson's Koran Used In Ceremony (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Rep. Keith Ellison, who became the first Muslim in Congress yesterday, said he was proud to take a ceremonial oath of office using the Koran once owned by Thomas Jefferson -- a plan that had triggered criticism.

"The very foundation of our nation, the authors of our Constitution impressed, is religious freedom, and the use of Jefferson's Koran shows that the founders not only knew of the Koran but also used it," said the Minnesota Democrat, who used the historic volume during a ceremonial swearing-in of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican, said, "It was much ado about nothing. All 435 members just took the oath, en masse, without anyone putting their hand on any book."

Congress members often use the Bible in the numerous ceremonial swearing-ins on the first day of a new session, but the official version is conducted in unison in the House chamber.

Mr. Ellison's plan to use of the Koran drew criticism from Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican, who sent an e-mail to his constituents saying that the use of the Koran was improper.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies," Mr. Goode said earlier last month.

The debate intensified throughout the Christmas season.

Mr. Goode, who represents Thomas Jefferson's ancestral hometown of Charlottesville, settled the matter yesterday. He congratulated Mr. Ellison on his election victory shortly before the two were sworn in and said he valued freedom of religion.

But he stood by his position.

"While tolerance is a hallmark of our Judeo-Christian nation, it is Islamic fundamentalism that predominates in nations such as Iran and even among many Sunnis and Shi'ites in Iraq, where it can hardly be said that tolerance is the order of the day," Mr. Goode said. "Our country is, has been and will be better off rooted in Judeo-Christian principles."

Mr. Ellison, the first black member of Congress from Minnesota, was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college.

DOJ_NMG_0112602

The Library of Congress provided the Koran, which was published in London in 1764, that Mr. Ellison used in a ceremonial oath with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi at his side. So many of Mr. Ellison's family members attended the ceremony that it was performed in two takes.

"Today we are swearing in the largest number of African-Americans in the House of Representatives, and we are so pleased that the first Muslim elected is among them, Keith Ellison," said Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat.

In the Congress there are 155 Catholics, 67 Baptists, 61 Methodists, 44 Presbyterians, 43 Jews, 37 Episcopalians, 26 nondenominational Protestants, 18 nondenominational Christians, 17 Lutherans, 15 Mormons and 47 members of other religions and denominations of Christianity.

Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, Michigan Democrat and chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said, "It was absolutely unfair for [Mr. Ellison] to have to go through this; we all raise our hands to the Lord here," after the CBC leadership was sworn in earlier in the day at the Library of Congress.

Administrator Is Dismissed From Nuclear Security Post (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — The Energy Secretary fired the head of the department's nuclear weapons program on Thursday, citing a series of security failures at national laboratories, including the discovery of a computer device containing thousands of classified documents in the home of a former worker during a drug raid by the police.

The official who was dismissed, Linton F. Brooks, had been administrator of the National Nuclear Security Agency since May 2003. The agency was established in 2000 because of chronic security problems in the weapons program.

The problems continued during Mr. Brooks's service. On Wednesday, the latest in a string of reports by the Energy Department's inspector general criticizing the agency, dated Nov. 27, 2006, was released.

Describing the gaps revealed by the drug raid, in New Mexico, the new report on the Los Alamos laboratory, a center for nuclear weapons research, concluded, "In a number of key areas, security policy was nonexistent, applied inconsistently, or not followed."

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said in a statement on Thursday that lax security "can have serious implications for the security of the United States." Under Mr. Brooks, the agency "has done its best to address these concerns," Mr. Bodman said. But he added, "I do not believe that progress in correcting these issues has been adequate."

Mr. Brooks said in a letter to employees that he would leave "shortly." He recounted how the agency was formed to improve security, and acknowledged: "We have not yet done so in over five years. For much of that time I was in charge of the N.N.S.A."

On Capitol Hill and at the Energy Department, officials said that the department was concerned about oversight hearings planned by the new Democratic leadership of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, said in a statement on Thursday evening, "While it may be appropriate to begin to address the incessant string of security, safety and management lapses at Department of Energy nuclear weapons facilities with the removal of high-level managers, I am afraid that it will take more than a new boss to fix the problems, which are far more systemic and pervasive in nature."

Mr. Markey, long a critic of nuclear programs, promised a vigorous inquiry.

Among the issues to be investigated was how a computer hacker stole Social Security numbers, birth dates and other sensitive information on 1,500 people at the nuclear weapons agency and why neither those people nor top officials were notified of the problem for nine months.

At the Project on Government Oversight, a nonprofit group based in Washington that has issued a series of reports on nuclear security and that first revealed the drug raid, Danielle Brian, the executive director, said, "We applaud Secretary Bodman's decision to force accountability at N.N.S.A., especially since it has been failing in its mission for years."

But a former subordinate, Gerald E. Marsh, a physicist who recently retired from the Energy Department's Argonne National Laboratory, said he was appalled at the dismissal. Speaking of the weapons complex, Mr. Marsh said, "I thought he was trying to do what he could to keep a declining operation functioning as well as he could."

DOJ_NMG_0112603

Mr. Brooks was previously deputy administrator for nonproliferation. He was the United States' chief negotiator for the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty with the Soviet Union, a role in which he had the rank of ambassador. He is a retired Navy officer.

After Breaches, Head Of U.S. Nuclear Program Is Ousted (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman has fired the head of the nation's nuclear weapons program, Linton F. Brooks, because of security breaches last year at weapons facilities, including Los Alamos National Laboratory.

Declaring that it was "time for new leadership," Bodman said in a written statement yesterday that he had asked Brooks to leave his post as administrator of the National Nuclear Security Administration by the end of the month.

The dismissal comes after embarrassing security lapses, including the Oct. 17 discovery of drug paraphernalia and computer flash drives containing highly classified information in the trailer home of a contractor. The items were found by Los Alamos County, N.M., police officers responding to a domestic dispute call.

That led to a harshly critical report in late November by the Energy Department's inspector general, Gregory H. Friedman, who said that security procedures in key areas at Los Alamos were "nonexistent, applied inconsistently, or not followed."

While Bodman refused to elaborate on his statement, the removal of Brooks also comes as Democrats, determined to hold oversight hearings on the nuclear laboratories' security problems, take control of Congress.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said in a written statement yesterday he was "afraid that it will take more than a new boss to fix the problems, which are far more systemic and pervasive in nature." He added that "the new Democratic Congress will exercise the oversight responsibility . . . to get to the bottom of the dysfunctional nuclear weapons complex's problems."

Brooks, the top nuclear security official since mid-2002, is not an expert on computer security. But he has spent four decades working on national security issues, starting as an officer in the Navy and later dealing with nuclear weapons issues at the Pentagon, National Security Council, Navy, State Department and Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in three Republican administrations.

Brooks said in a statement yesterday, "This is not a decision that I would have preferred, but it was made by a thoughtful and honorable man and is based on the principle of accountability that should govern all public service."

In the Bush administration, Brooks has been an advocate of building a new generation of nuclear weapons over the next decade, devising post-Cold War missions for nuclear weapons and modernizing U.S. nuclear weapons facilities, some of which date to the 1940s.

"He was a very intelligent public servant with a great deal of integrity," said Joseph Cirincione, vice president for national security issues at the Center for American Progress, a liberal Washington research group. Cirincione, who strongly disagreed with Brooks, said the security lapses had done little actual harm. "I would feel better if Brooks were being dismissed on policy grounds rather than security grounds."

But the October incident was only the latest of a string of security lapses. Earlier, Brooks had failed to tell Bodman when a computer hacker managed to steal the personnel records and Social Security numbers of 1,500 Energy Department contractors.

The breaches also angered Republican lawmakers. Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, the ranking Republican on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said yesterday that when the Social Security numbers were stolen "it was critical not only that Brooks move swiftly to counteract this sort of security breach but also that he immediately notify the top officials in his department and the people whose data was lost. Instead, he sat on his hands."

In October, Freidman, the Energy Department inspector general, said that the weaknesses in security procedures were "especially troubling since the department and the National Nuclear Security Administration have expended tens of millions of dollars upgrading various components of the laboratory's security apparatus, including vast expenditures on cyber security."

Bodman had named a department task force to review the inspector general's recommendations and report by Feb. 28.

Nuclear Weapons Administrator Ousted (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

The nation's nuclear weapons chief was fired Thursday, after a long series of security breaches at Los Alamos National Laboratory and other weapons sites had prompted strong criticism of his performance.

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman issued an unusual public statement Thursday saying he had asked for the resignation of Linton F. Brooks, chief of the National Nuclear Security Administration, which operates eight major bomb facilities across the nation.

Late last year, law enforcement agents began investigating classified weapons data that were found along with drug paraphernalia during a police search at a trailer park in Los Alamos, N.M.

That incident was the latest in more than half a dozen breakdowns, including the loss of computer drives, the mishandling of Social Security numbers and financial fraud at the agency.

As the problems mounted, criticism of Brooks sharpened. Last year, Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas), then chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Brooks should be fired. Others in Congress also began to question the agency's performance, particularly multibillion-dollar cost overruns and technical setbacks on new weapons research facilities.

In dismissing Brooks, Bodman acknowledged that too many problems had been mishandled.

"I do not believe progress in correcting these issues has been adequate," Bodman said in the statement. "I have decided that it is time for new leadership." He said Brooks would depart this month and an acting administrator would replace him.

The tough handling of Brooks appeared intended to make a strong statement, particularly coming on the first day of Democratic control of House and Senate committees that have oversight of the nuclear weapons complex. In a statement distributed by the Energy Department, Brooks acknowledged that he had failed to head off the problems.

"One reason for forming NNSA was to prevent such management problems from occurring," he said. "We have not done so in over five years. For much of that time, I was in charge of NNSA."

The dismissal was "not a decision I would have preferred," Brooks said, but he praised Bodman's motives. Brooks, 68, has had a distinguished federal career: former Navy nuclear submarine commander, director of nuclear warfare for the Navy, and chief arms reduction negotiator during the Reagan administration. He led the team that achieved the first major treaty with the Soviet Union to reduce nuclear arms.

Barton, among other critics, said Brooks' departure was "long overdue." Barton was particularly incensed over Brooks' failure during a nine-month period to notify superiors that the personnel records and Social Security numbers of 1,500 Energy Department contract employees had been stolen by a computer hacker.

In 2004, most of the Los Alamos lab was shut down for nearly six months at a cost of $370 million when officials thought classified computer drives were missing. Investigators later concluded that the drives never existed. A few years earlier, a major investigation was conducted when two classified drives were discovered hidden behind an office copying machine.

Marylia Kelley, executive director of Tri-Valley Communities Against a Radioactive Environment, a watchdog group in Livermore, Calif., said Brooks was allowing storage of weapons-grade plutonium and uranium in facilities at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory that could not be adequately protected.

"The security deficiencies at Livermore and Los Alamos are systemic and deserve a higher level of attention than NNSA has given them," she said.

Because the No. 2 person at NNSA, Principal Deputy Administrator Jerry Paul, recently left, there is something of a leadership vacuum. Agency officials could not say Thursday who would be running the operation after Brooks' departure.

Nuclear Agency Head Dismissed For Lapses (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Thursday dismissed the chief of the country's nuclear weapons program because of security breakdowns at the Los Alamos, N.M., laboratory and other facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0112605

Linton Brooks said he would leave in two weeks to three weeks as head of the National Nuclear Security Administration, a post he held since May 2003.

Bodman said the nuclear agency under Brooks, a former ambassador and arms control negotiator, had not adequately fixed security problems. "I have decided it is time for new leadership at the NNSA," Bodman said.

Brooks told agency workers in a statement, "This is not a decision that I would have preferred ... (but) I accept the decision and you need to do likewise."

He characterized the demand for his resignation as "based on the principle of accountability that should govern all public service."

Brooks was reprimanded in June for failing to report to Bodman a security breach of computers at an agency facility in Albuquerque, N.M., that resulted in the theft of files containing Social Security numbers and other personal data for 1,500 workers.

The theft did not become generally known, nor was Bodman made aware of it, for eight months.

Last fall, security at Los Alamos came into question anew. During a drug raid, authorities found classified nuclear-related documents at the home of a woman with top secret clearance who worked at the lab.

That security breach was especially troubling, the department's internal watchdog said, because tens of millions of dollars had been spent to upgrade computer security at Los Alamos. The lab is part of the nuclear weapons complex that Brooks' agency oversees.

"These management and security issues can have serious implications for the security of the United States," Bodman in a statement announcing Brooks' departure.

While the agency's management "has done its best to address these concerns, I do not believe that progress in correcting these issues has been adequate," Bodman said.

"Therefore, and after careful consideration, I have decided that it is time for new leadership at the NNSA," said Bodman

Bodman said an acting head of the agency will be named soon.

Brooks has more than 40 years of experience in national security and nuclear nonproliferation issues. He led the negotiating team that worked on the START arms reduction treaty signed with Russia in 1991.

Widely respected for his knowledge of nuclear weapons and nonproliferation issues, Brooks nevertheless has been a target of some members of Congress.

When it was learned that Brooks did not inform his superiors for eight months about the computer theft of data on 1,500 employees, Rep. Joe Barton last year sought Brooks' immediate dismissal.

"His departure is long overdue," Barton, R-Texas, said Thursday.

With Democrats now in charge of the House and Senate, there has been talk of hearings into the administration's response to security breaches at the labs.

"It will take more than a new boss to fix the problems, which are far more systemic and pervasive in nature," said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which is considering hearings.

Some lawmakers have criticized Brooks' pursuit of a bunker-buster bomb, a project promoted by Brooks but abandoned last year because of congressional opposition. Others have questioned whether Brooks' agency made a clear enough argument on behalf of the weapon.

At the same time, Brooks' agency has come under criticism for not making enough progress in working out an agreement with Russia for the disposal of tons of weapons-grade plutonium.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said he has been concerned "about the effectiveness" of the agency for some time and that Bodman now "has sent a clear message" that operations need to be improved.

In his message to employees, Brooks bemoaned the lack of progress in solving security problems at Los Alamos, saying the agency was formed "to prevent such management problems from occurring.

"We have not yet done so in over five years," he said.

The agency is responsible for managing the nuclear weapons complex that includes the Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore nuclear weapons research labs. The agency has more than 37,000 employees, most of them contractor personnel.

DOJ_NMG_0112606

Congress created the agency within the Energy Department in response to the uproar over the Wen Ho Lee security lapses at Los Alamos in the late 1990s. The belief was that security would improve by putting all nuclear weapons programs under a semiautonomous agency.

But since then, there have been repeated security problems _ most of them at Los Alamos _ from misplaced and lost computer disks containing classified information to alleged misuse of credit cards, and last October's discovery of classified documents in a drug raid.

Agencies Bid Farewell To Retiring "Elders" (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The start of the new year is when the village elders say their farewells across the government. Agencies lose valued, experienced hands; the retirees take on new pursuits.

Doris Hausser, a senior policy adviser at the Office of Personnel Management, used the term "village elder" this week in an interview about her retirement, and it's an apt description of many career public servants as they end their federal journeys.

Many federal employees retire around the turn of the year because provisions in federal retirement and leave laws make it advantageous. Most senior employees are covered by the older of two retirement systems that permits them to receive a pension payment in February if they leave the federal payroll in early January.

Many also retire at this time of the year because it seems the best time to make a break and step aside. Most agencies slow down for the holidays, and that seems to make it easier to say goodbyes and find the time to sort through files and pack boxes.

Their careers underscore the range of occupations in the government and the services provided to the public.

TakeMax Mayfield. The director of the National Hurricane Center in Miami retired Wednesday after 34 years as a government meteorologist. He started his career as an intern and rose through the ranks to become the government's face on television during the hurricane season.

Mayfield's last day included a farewell breakfast where he delivered, as he has for much of the past decade, an appeal for hurricane preparedness. "You may think that you've seen the worst of the hurricanes, but I assure you that you have not," he said. "We have a lot of work to do."

Out West,Louis Dellamonica, an engineer at the Hawthorne Army Depot in Nevada, retired Tuesday after 65 years with the Defense Department. He began his federal career one week after the bombing of Pearl Harbor and has been described by Defense officials as the department's longest-serving civil service employee.

Dellamonica was interviewed in 2002 for an Army oral-history project, and the report summed up his personal philosophy by using his words: "Pride means do-it-yourself to the best of your ability, disregarding whether you are a big wheel, little log, keystone or cobblestone."

Closer to home,Mary Garrett, a secretary for the Food and Drug Administration, retired Wednesday after 44 years of federal service.

Garrett said that during her career, she "had the privilege of working with many wonderful people." She added, "For anyone coming to work for the government today, I would say to dedicate themselves to their job so that it will be rewarding and fulfilling for them."

Her colleague,Wayne Amchin, said Garrett "is loved by lots of people" in the FDA's Parklawn building in Rockville. Garrett took the stairs each day to her 13th floor-office, served as a free notary for co-workers, and brought in bags of cookies on some Mondays when she figured the snack bar had not been restocked.

There are many more retirees, includingJoan S. Williams, an intelligence analyst at the FBI, who retired Wednesday after more than 42 years of service. She began her career as a clerk-stenographer and spent more than 12 years overseas for the bureau.Paul Kaplanlogged more than 39 years with the government. He retired Wednesday from the OPM, where he was a program analyst in workforce planning and policy.

DOJ_NMG_0112607

James F. Decker, principal deputy director in the Energy Department's office of science, also retired Wednesday after 33 years of public service. He helped make the Energy office one of the premier science organizations in the world and has been a leading advocate of international scientific cooperation.

Hausser, the OPM's village elder, completed 30 years of federal service Monday. She began at the old Civil Service Commission, which was restructured as the OPM in the late 1970s, and worked in offices focused on research, training and development and performance management.

She became chief policy adviser to the OPM director in 2002 and has been a leading advocate for modernizing federal personnel rules and creating performance-based pay systems -- ambitious goals that she thinks can be achieved without sacrificing the ideals that shaped the civil service.

Hausser, who got a doctorate in organizational psychology and mastered the twists and turns of federal personnel law, said she has no plans for retirement, except to become an "Olie Kolziggroupie," a reference to the Washington Capitals goaltender. It's a natural transition, she said, because she grew up rooting for the Detroit Red Wings and the legendaryGordieHowe.Talk Shows

Craig W. Floyd, chairman and executive director of the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, andBruce Mendelsohn, the fund's acting director of communications, will be the guests on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Michael Ryan, vice president for administration and finance at the Millennium Challenge, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Good Times Or Good Governance (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Now that the Democrats have taken control of Congress, President Bush has decided it's time for fiscal discipline and a balanced budget. That's shameless, even by local standards. Who does Bush think was in power when the big deficits of the past six years were created?

A good way for the Democrats to start the new congressional season is to examine just how it happened that the federal government moved from budget surplus to deficit during the Bush presidency. If Democrats can be clear about what went wrong, then maybe (maybe) they can begin to fix it.

An honest budget discussion should start with an admission that the projected surpluses of the post-Clinton years were largely illusory -- in the sense that they were predicated on overly upbeat assumptions about the economy. That's not to diminish the importance of what Clinton and the Democrats did during the 1990s to impose some fiscal discipline. But it was unrealistic to assume that the boom years would continue indefinitely, piling up ever-greater budget surpluses.

The Congressional Budget Office examined the mirage of endless surpluses in a report last year. The CBO studied the gap between the surpluses that were forecast back in January 2001 and the actual deficits that occurred. Profligate tax and spending decisions were part of the story. But the biggest factor was that revenue didn't match the projections that had been made by Washington's favorite economist, Dr. Rosy Scenario. In 2002, the shortfall of revenue for economic reasons was $308 billion; in 2003, it was $381 billion; in 2004, it was $307 billion.

But Rosy Scenario wasn't the only villain in the budget mess. The Bush administration and the GOP Congress made a bad situation much worse -- by enacting tax and spending programs that shredded any semblance of fiscal responsibility.

The Bush tax cuts enacted in 2001 started the process. By CBO estimates, they reduced government revenue from projected levels by $31 billion in 2002, $84 billion in 2003, $100 billion in 2004, $100 billion in 2005 and $126 billion in 2006. Republicans argue that those tax cuts were "pro-growth" and were justified by economic weakness after Sept. 11, 2001. I disagree with that economic analysis, but even if it were right, it doesn't justify the spending binge that accompanied the tax cuts.

The year Bush really busted the budget was 2003, when he embarked on a costly war in Iraq that wasn't funded by a tax increase. Worse, he added a major new welfare program, the prescription drug benefit, that also wasn't funded. The inevitable result was a spending bubble.

DOJ_NMG_0112608

CBO numbers show that discretionary spending (which is largely military-related) jumped over projected levels by $120 billion in 2003, $171 billion in 2004, $221 billion in 2005 and $245 billion in 2006. As for the prescription drug benefit, its bite is only now being felt, with the CBO forecasting that it will add $27 billion to projected Medicare spending in 2006 and $40 billion in 2007.

"The lesson of 2003 is that fighting a war, cutting taxes and funding a major new entitlement program all at the same time doesn't work," says Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a bipartisan group that favors balanced budgets. He provided me with the CBO numbers used in this analysis.

After the budget-busting policies of Bush's first six years, the vexing question for the Democrats is whether to clean up the mess by moving the budget back toward balance. President Bush said this week that he has a plan to balance the budget by 2012, but since he simultaneously rejected any tax increases and isn't likely to reduce war spending, it's hard to imagine how that plan could work.

The Democrats have to decide whether on economics, they want to be (forgive the sexist term) the "Daddy Party" of fiscal responsibility. Unless politicians find the courage to trim entitlement spending to what the country can afford, the projections are scary. A 2006 study by the Government Accountability Office noted that if current fiscal policy continues, interest costs on the national debt will rise to 20 percent of gross domestic product by 2045 and overall government spending to nearly 50 percent. That's a recipe for an economic crackup.

The Democrats face the essential political decision as they take their seats: Do they want to make people happy by postponing tough decisions or do they want to get serious about restoring fiscal sanity? Are they the party of good times or good governance? The Bush administration has argued for six years that you can have it both ways, but that's demonstrably not true. So the Democratic moment arrives.

Lagging Judicial Pay (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. is embracing with gusto a cause championed by his predecessor, William Rehnquist: the need for a substantial pay raise for federal judges. Justice Roberts devoted his second annual year-end report to this issue, and it should be required reading in Congress.

Getting Congress to act promptly on judicial salaries may not be easy, if history is any guide. But Mr. Roberts is right to note the link between maintaining an adequate standard of judicial compensation and preserving the quality and independence of the judiciary, and to prod Congress on this issue.

For starters, an immediate increase in the neighborhood of 30 percent would help make up for dual blows of inflation and Congress's periodic withholding of cost-of-living adjustments. The last time federal judges received a substantial pay raise was 1989.

By statute, a sitting federal trial judge makes $165,200 a year. That's a lot of money, the same pay as a member of Congress. But as the chief justice notes in his report, judges have fallen well behind the American labor force as a whole in keeping up with inflation. Since 1969, a judge's pay has declined by 23.9 percent, adjusted for inflation, while the national average for all wages rose by 17.8 percent.

Federal judges at every level earn significantly less than law school deans, senior law school professors, and even junior associates at some big-time law firms. There is no definitive study, but it cannot be just coincidental that federal judges are leaving the bench at an increasing rate, thereby "threatening the viability of life tenure," as Justice Roberts put it. Considering the impact on a future job could make judges less willing to issue unpopular rulings upholding important rights.

It is tempting to dismiss as hyperbole the chief justice's characterization of this issue as a "constitutional crisis." But the salary issue is a serious one, touching as it does on the two constitutional provisions designed to ensure an independent judiciary — the one granting life tenure, and the other ensuring no reduction in judicial pay.

The chief justice's focus on judicial pay has drawn praise from Senator Patrick Leahy, the new Judiciary Committee chairman and a longtime champion of improved judicial salaries. The nation would be well-served by a comprehensive bipartisan package that grants federal judges a sizable raise, ends the linkage between judicial and Congressional salaries, and requires judges to forgo privately financed junkets that cast an ethical cloud on the courts.

DOJ_NMG_0112609

Tax As You Go (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

January 5, 2007; Page Congressional Democrats are dashing out of the gates to establish their fiscal conservative credentials. And as early as today House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will push through so-called "pay-as-you-go" budget rules for Congress. Keep an eye on your wallet.

"Paygo," as Washington insiders call it, sounds like a fiscally prudent budget practice: If government spends more on program A, it has to spend less money on program B, and thus budget deficits will be restrained. We're all for that. But when Republicans proposed exactly that budget rule in recent years, House Democrats voted it down.

Ms. Pelosi has something different in mind. Under her paygo plan, new entitlement programs and all new tax cuts would have to be offset by either cutbacks in other entitlement programs or tax increases. This version of paygo is a budget trapdoor, designed not to control expenditures but to make it easier to raise taxes while blocking future tax cuts.

Supporters of paygo claim it will help restrain entitlement spending. It won't. Paygo doesn't apply to current entitlements that will grow automatically over the next several decades. Ms. Pelosi's version of paygo applies only to new entitlements or changes in law that expand current programs. And on present trajectory, Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security, food stamps and the like are scheduled to increase federal spending to almost 38% of GDP by 2050, up from 21% today. Paygo won't stop a dime of that increase. This may explain why one of the leading supporters of paygo is the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal outfit that favors far more social spending.

Paygo enthusiasts also claim that when these rules were in effect in the 1990s the budget deficit disappeared and by 2001 the budget recorded a $121 billion surplus. Sorry. The budget improvement in the late 1990s was a result of three events wholly unrelated to paygo: the initial spending restraint under the Republican Congress in 1995 and 1996 as part of their pledge to balance the budget; a huge reduction in military spending, totaling nearly 2% of GDP, over the decade; and rapid economic growth, which always causes a bounce in revenues. Paygo didn't expire until 2002, but by the late-1990s politicians in both parties were already re-stoking the domestic spending fires.

What paygo does restrain are tax cuts, by requiring that any tax cut be offset dollar-for-dollar with some entitlement reduction. Congressional budgeteers always overestimate the revenue losses from tax cuts, which under paygo would require onerous budget cuts to "pay for" the tax cuts. As a political matter, those spending cuts will never happen.

First on the chopping block, therefore, would be the investment tax cuts of 2003 that are set to expire in 2010. Last year Democrat David Obey of Wisconsin, the new Appropriations Committee chairman and a prodigious spender, gave this strategy away when he urged paygo rules so he could enact new social spending and pay for it by canceling the Bush tax cuts for those who make more than $1 million.

Never mind that, in the wake of those capital gains and dividend tax-rate cuts, federal revenues climbed by a record $550 billion over the past two fiscal years. Incidentally, thanks to the current economic expansion and the surge in tax revenues, the budget deficit has fallen by $165 billion in just two years -- without paygo.

Given all of this, it's especially puzzling that even some conservatives seem tempted by paygo's fiscal illusions. Our friends at the Heritage Foundation have of late become obsessed with future entitlement forecasts and have advised Ms. Pelosi to enact paygo rules to stop it. But Heritage notably did not insist that tax increases be excluded from any paygo rule. Had such logic prevailed in 1980 or 2003, it's possible that neither the Reagan nor Bush tax cuts would ever have become law. As a political matter, paygo is about returning Republicans to their historical minority role as tax collectors for the welfare state.

That's not to say that new budget rules aren't highly desirable. The line-item veto, a new Grace Commission to identify and eliminate the billions of dollars of waste and failed programs, and an automatic spending sequester if the budget rises above agreed baselines would all help to restore spending discipline. But it is precisely because these rules would restrain spending that they are not on the Democratic agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0112610

Paygo, by contrast, gives the appearance of spending discipline while making it all but impossible to let taxpayers keep more of their money. It should really be called "spend and tax as you go."

OTHER NEWS:

Warm Weather Weighs On Price Of Oil (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Crude oil prices fell Thursday to the lowest level since mid-2005, pressured by warm weather, faltering demand and government data showing inventories at healthy levels.

"We're running out of winter," says Kevin Lindemer, managing director of energy for economic consulting firm Global Insight. "We are very well supplied for what's remaining. … We have very high heating oil inventories."

Crude oil for February delivery closed at $55.59 a barrel in New York trading, a 4.7% drop. That followed a 4.5% decline on Wednesday. The price is down from a peak of $77.03 a barrel on July 14.

Whether the lower prices will have staying power, helping consumers, is unclear.

Lindemer says weather will be a key factor in price moves in coming days, as will possible efforts by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to adjust output to keep prices from falling. The bulk of heating oil demand is in the Northeast and Midwest.

"If oil prices stay as low as they are right now, it's going to bring gasoline prices down, no doubt about it. … The big question is how long will it stay down here? And we won't know that for several days," says Phil Flynn, energy analyst at Alaron Trading, noting that prices have previously dipped near the mid-50s, only to bounce back.

Gasoline prices fell last week for the first time in three weeks, the federal Energy Information Administration (EIA) reported Wednesday. The average price for regular gasoline was $2.334 a gallon, down from $2.341 the previous week.

Flynn said this week's oil price decline was also partially caused by technical trading. In addition, the EIA reported, inventories were higher than anticipated.

The EIA said domestic inventories of crude oil fell last week by 1.3 million barrels to 319.7 million. But distillate stocks, including diesel fuel and heating oil, rose by 2 million barrels to 135.6 million barrels. U.S. gasoline inventories also rose, helping prompt a 6-cent drop in wholesale gasoline prices to $1.487 a gallon.

"It's warm out, so demand is down. There is concern about U.S. and global growth (slowing)," says Jason Schenker, energy analyst for Wachovia. Schenker predicts volatility ahead with "both up and down swings."

On average, Wachovia expects oil to run about $60 a barrel in 2007. He notes that while prices have been trending lower, they're still well above historical averages, because oil was selling for about $25 a barrel for decades.

Lindemer said the price drop could help consumers who have flexible home heating oil contracts, though adding: "When it's 60 degrees on Jan. 4 in Boston, a tank full of heating oil goes a long way."

Energy, Mining Firms Take Hit (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree, Paul Glader And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

Energy and copper prices continued their tumble yesterday, punishing shares of companies from oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp. to mining magnate Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc.

There is no one factor behind the sharp declines in some key commodities. Warm winter weather has depressed oil prices, more than offsetting recent production cutbacks by OPEC. Copper prices, meanwhile, are dropping because of concerns about a housing slump in the U.S., rising inventories and easing labor problems at copper mines.

Whether commodity prices continue to slide long term will depend in no small part on the world economy. Explosive growth in developing countries like China -- along with solid economic growth in the U.S. -- had spurred demand for everything from natural gas to copper wire and pipes in recent years. If the world economy shows resilience, commodity prices are likely to rebound.

DOJ_NMG_0112611

Just the same, prices for basic materials are unlikely to make the kind of gains they rang up in recent years. Oil, for example, surged more than 30% in both 2004 and 2005, but ended flat in 2006 despite closing above $77 a barrel in July. Yesterday, oil closed at $55.59 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, down $2.73 for the day. It is now more than a dollar below its level in October, when the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries decided to trim output to prop up prices.

Copper hasn't been doing any better. After surging 88% from Dec. 30, 2005, through May 23, 2006, to $4.055 a pound on the Comex Division of Nymex, it tumbled 36% from that May peak to yesterday's close of $2.5885 a pound.

For now, investors are bidding down the prices of several key commodities along with the companies that produce them. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange yesterday, Exxon Mobil shares fell 1.9% to $72.72, and Marathon Oil Corp. shed 3.6% to $84.24.

Mining companies also are getting dusted up. New Orleans-based Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold has a large copper-mining operation in Indonesia and has launched a bid to acquire Phoenix-based copper miner Phelps Dodge Corp. Freeport's share price on the New York Stock Exchange has dropped 29% to about $51 yesterday from a 52-week high of $72 in April. Meanwhile, Phelps Dodge, which has seen its stock price rise in recent months because it is a takeover target, has seen its share price decline to about $116, down 7% from a 52-week high of $125 in December.

How quickly commodity prices will recover is unclear. The winter months in the Northern Hemisphere are the peak time for oil use because of heating needs. Typically, oil producers increase their output and consumers draw on oil inventories to meet peak demand. However, this winter's warm weather in the U.S. Northeast -- the source of 80% of the nation's heating-oil demand -- has, for example, undercut the price of crude-oil contracts on the New York Mercantile Exchange. OPEC can't tighten its oil taps fast enough to balance the market and shore up prices.

OPEC might be forced to further trim output, according to Larry Goldstein, an analyst at the Energy Policy Research Foundation. "The impact of warmer weather globally has fully negated November and December [output] cuts," he said.

For its part, the copper market has lost much of the labor-fear factor that had been buoying prices. A series of labor negotiations during 2006 had been "keeping a premium into prices," said Catherine Virga, a base metals research analyst with CPM Group in New York. Workers at copper mines in Mexico, Chile and elsewhere have gone on strike in the past year as three-year contracts are up for negotiations and workers want better pay and benefits during a commodity boom that is bringing greater profits to mining companies world-wide.

As labor negotiations at various mines have been settled, prices have come back down. Ms. Virga predicts copper prices may climb short term as traders see the recent drop as a buying opportunity. But, overall, her firm predicts copper prices declining in 2007.

The First Energy President (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

Now that President Gerald Ford has been buried with all the honors he deserved, it is time to discuss a proper memorial. I would suggest the Gerald Ford Energy Independence Act.

Few people remember today, but “Gerald Ford was the first U.S. president to really use the levers of the presidency to try to break our addiction to oil,” said the energy economist Philip Verleger Jr. “He was way ahead of his time.”

Well, his time has come again — and then some.

The greatest thing George Bush could do — for President Ford’s legacy and his own — would be to dedicate his coming State of the Union address to completing the energy independence agenda that Mr. Ford initiated 32 years ago in the wake of the 1973 Arab oil embargo and energy shock.

As the page titled “Energy” from the Ford presidential library Web site reminds us: “Early in his administration, President Ford said that he would not sit by and watch the nation continue to talk about an energy crisis and do nothing about it. Nor, he said, would he accept halfway measures which failed to change the direction that has made our nation so vulnerable to foreign economic interests. The president proposed firm but necessary measures designed to achieve energy independence for the U.S. by 1985, and to regain our position of world leadership in energy."

DOJ_NMG_0112612

In his 1975 State of the Union speech, President Ford laid out his vision: "I have a very deep belief in America's capabilities. Within the next 10 years, my program envisions: 200 major nuclear power plants; 250 major new coal mines; 150 major coal-fired power plants; 30 major new [oil] refineries; 20 major new synthetic fuel plants; the drilling of many thousands of new oil wells; the insulation of 18 million homes; and the manufacturing and the sale of millions of new automobiles, trucks and buses that use much less fuel. ... In another crisis — the one in 1942 — President Franklin D. Roosevelt said this country would build 60,000 military aircraft. By 1943, production in that program had reached 125,000 aircraft annually. They did it then. We can do it now."

Obviously, President Ford's emphasis on coal and domestic oil came in age when most people were unaware of climate change. Still, Mr. Ford wasn't just all talk on energy. He used his presidential powers to impose a $3-a-barrel fee on imported oil to reduce consumption. That was a big deal, noted Mr. Verleger, because the average cost of imported crude at the time was only $10.76 a barrel.

Yes, you read that right. A Republican president actually imposed an import fee on oil to curb consumption! Yes, President Bush, it can be done! The republic survived!

Thanks to the Energy Policy Conservation Act of 1975 and other measures, Mr. Ford's energy legacy includes: the creation of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve for use in an emergency; the phasing out of domestic price controls on oil to encourage more exploration; major investment in alternative energy research; assistance to states in developing energy conservation programs; and, most important, the creation of the first compulsory mileage standards for U.S. automobiles.

Those mileage standards have barely been tightened since 1975 — because some idiotic congressmen from Michigan, who thought they were protecting Detroit, have blocked efforts to raise them. So, Japanese automakers innovated more in that area, and the rest is history — or in the case of Detroit, obituary.

Every 10 years we say to ourselves, "If only we had done the right thing 10 years ago." Well, President Bush has a chance in his State of the Union to call on Americans to honor Mr. Ford by completing his vision. But it means asking Americans to do some hard things: accepting a gasoline or carbon tax; inducing Detroit to make more fuel-efficient cars, trucks and plug-in hybrids; setting a national requirement for utilities to provide 20 percent of their electricity from renewable wind, solar, hydro or nuclear power by 2015; and, finally, making large-scale investments in mass transit.

It is stunning that since 9/11 the Bush team has never mounted a campaign to get Americans to conserve energy.

"Ford called for zero oil imports by 1985," said Mr. Verleger. "Instead, we imported five million barrels a day then. In 2006, imports will average almost 14 million barrels a day. Had we achieved everything Ford proposed, the price of oil today would be $20 a barrel, not $60, the polar ice caps might not be melting, the polar bear might still have a chance, and our children would have a future."

Rise In Ethanol Raises Concerns About Corn As A Food (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

New York Times, January 5, 2007

CHICAGO, Jan. 4 — Renewing concerns about whether there will be enough corn to support the demand for both fuel and food, a new study has found that ethanol plants could use as much as half of America's corn crop next year.

Dozens of new ethanol plants are being built by farmers and investors in a furious gold rush, spurred by a call last year from the Bush administration and politicians from farm states to produce more renewable fuels to curb America's reliance on oil. But the new study by the Earth Policy Institute, an environmental group, found that the number of ethanol plants coming on line has been underreported by more than 25 percent by both the Agriculture Department and the Renewable Fuels Association, the ethanol industry's main lobbying group.

DOJ_NMG_0112613

The Earth Policy Institute says that 79 ethanol plants are under construction, which would more than double ethanol production capacity to 11 billion gallons by 2008. Yet late last month, the Renewable Fuels Association said there were 62 plants under construction.

The lower tally has led to an underestimate of the grain that would be needed for ethanol, clouding the debate over the priorities of allocating corn for food and fuel, said Lester R. Brown, who has written more than a dozen books on environmental issues and is the president of the Earth Policy Institute. "This unprecedented diversion of corn to fuel production will affect food prices everywhere," Mr. Brown said.

Bob Dinneen, the president of the Renewable Fuels Association, said the group had not intentionally tried to play down the number of plants under construction. "It has been a moving target," Mr. Dinneen said in an interview on Thursday. "We are not trying to hide the ball. We are trying to keep up with a growing and dynamic industry as best we can."

The Renewable Fuels Association has generally played down concerns in the food versus fuel debate over ethanol, saying that estimates showed there would be plenty of corn to meet the demand for both. "We can absolutely do that without having a deleterious impact on consumer food prices," Mr. Dinneen said.

The National Corn Growers Association said Thursday that farmers were keeping up, noting that growers produced their third-largest crop in 2006 of 10.7 billion bushels. "All demands for corn — food, feed, fuel and exports — are being met," Rick Tolman, chief executive of the corn growers, said in a statement. "Farmers have always responded to price signals from the marketplace and, historically, we have had much more challenge with overproduction than shortage."

With spot prices of corn soaring to record highs of nearly $4 a bushel last month, farmers are expected to plant some 85 million acres of corn this year, an increase of 8 percent over 2006 and what would be the largest corn-seeding in the country since 1985, said Dan Basse, president of AgResource, an agricultural research company in Chicago.

Ethanol has raised the incomes of farmers and given new hope to flagging rural economies. But the reliance on corn to produce ethanol in the United States has drawn concerns from some economists, who question whether the drive to corn-based fuel will push up the prices of livestock and retail prices of meat, poultry and dairy products.

Mr. Brown is among those who believe the ethanol industry is growing too quickly. He called for a federal moratorium on the licensing of new distilleries. "We need a time out, a chance to catch our breath and decide how much corn can be used for ethanol without raising food prices," he said Thursday.

Like many other experts, he advocates moving past corn-based ethanol into cellulosic ethanol, produced from plant waste and nonfood crops like switch grass.

For now, however, in the anticipation of high potential returns, ethanol plants that rely on corn are being built by everyone from farmers to Bill Gates of Microsoft to a mix of Wall Street investors. In addition to the 116 ethanol plants in production, and the 79 under construction, at least 200 more ethanol plants, with a capacity of 3 billion gallons a year, are in the planning stages.

In all, ethanol distilleries now running or in the works will pull an estimated 139 million tons of corn from the 2008 corn harvest, according to the Earth Policy Institute. That is about double the demand projected by the Agriculture Department and will require over half of the projected 2008 corn harvest of about 11 billion bushels.

Keith Collins, the Agriculture Department's chief economist, did not respond to requests for comment. One reason for the department's projection of just 60 million tons of corn used for ethanol is that it was released last February, before surging oil prices set off investor interest in ethanol plants. The Agriculture Department will release its new projections next month.

But the pace of plant construction may be slowing. Shortages of galvanized steel and backlogs for special tanks for the distilleries have pushed construction time back from 18 months to as much as 28 months for some plants, Mr. Basse said.

Some towns are also demanding environmental studies to better understand the impact ethanol plants can have on water supplies and quality of the groundwater, which has delayed permits for new processing plants.

New Prospect For US: Glut Of Ethanol Plants (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112614

Like at least four others building new ethanol plants in Illinois, Mike Smith expects his new biorefinery to begin pumping out fuel from corn by summer.

Unlike the other plants, Mr. Smith's Canton, Ill., facility is nowhere to be found on a key industry tally, which the US government and Wall Street analysts use to track ethanol plants under construction. A study released Thursday reports that at least 14 new biorefineries - representing nearly 1 billion gallons of extra fuel - are not on that tally. That oversight could mean problems ahead for the food supply and the "green fuel" industry, some analysts say.

• Ethanol production could pull so much corn out of the food supply by 2008 that US corn exports could plummet.

• The food-fuel competition could push corn prices so high that some ethanol producers in the fledgling industry, which many deem vital to US energy security, would merely break even - or, if corn gets pricey enough, actually lose money.

Even before Thursday's report, some analysts had warned of a future glut of ethanol production capacity.

The immediate concern of the Earth Policy Institute (EPI), which released the new report, is the impact on the global food supply.

"We're worried there will be less to feed the world if we're using too much corn to make fuel," says Lester Brown, EPI's president. "The US ... supplies 70 percent of the world's corn exports. These previously unidentified distilleries could have a big negative impact."

Wall Street investment banks and farm cooperatives continue to pour billions of dollars into building ethanol plants, basing their decisions in part on predictions of future capacity by the Renewable Fuels Association. The RFA lists 65 plants under construction. But EPI, which put together its own tally using several industry lists, has found 79 such plants.

That extra capacity has major implications for agriculture and the ethanol industry. Using the RFA's lower estimate, the US Department of Agriculture has forecast that ethanol biorefineries - also called distilleries - will need about 60 million tons of corn from the 2008 harvest. But if EPI's higher estimate for plants is correct, then up to 139 million tons of corn will be needed.

For its part, the RFA defends its more conservative estimate. "Our list is a pretty accurate snapshot - about the best you can get in an industry that changes as quickly as this one," says spokesman Matt Hartwig. "If we were to do our list based on announcements, it would be much longer. But that would be misleading because not all those come to fruition. Those on our list we believe will be built and up and running."

Last month, the RFA added about a dozen new facilities to its list, which suggests about 11.4 billion gallons in capacity by 2008, which is still lower than the EPI's range of 12 billion to 15 billion gallons.

Besides the potential impact on food exports, the glut in capacity could throw the ethanol industry into turmoil. The problem isn't demand for ethanol. The energy industry could use far more than what's currently produced. The real challenge is that competition for corn could drive its price so high that profits evaporate, some analysts warn.

"We see significant overcapacity in the short term, 2007-2010," warned a Deutsche Bank analysis last month. That analysis, based in part on RFA data, sees capacity of only about 8.3 billion gallons a year by 2008 - similar to a Citibank analysis in September.

Factor in the EPI numbers and the crunch gets worse.

"We've got to come up with enough corn acres to meet the demand," says Jerry Gidel, grains analyst for North America Risk Management in Chicago. "We're chasing a kite right now that keeps on rising." He predicts that capacity could reach 11 billion gallons a year by early 2008. The 1.7 billion gallons of capacity RFA added late last year was "totally unexpected and has me a little worried," he says.

Ethanol prices fluctuate with gasoline prices. So when gas prices go up, profits for ethanol plants are good even if corn costs more. When gas prices dip, ethanol profits can get pinched by rising corn prices. With oil at $60 dollars a barrel, ethanolmakers can make money.

"I would feel very uncomfortable, extremely uncomfortable, planning a new ethanol biorefinery at this time," says Robert Wisner, an economist at Iowa State University. "The RFA numbers are clearly at the low end of the capacity scale. We have a substantial number of plants out there that are very close to breaking ground right now that are not part of that list."

If oil prices were to drop below $60 a barrel, a further boost in corn prices could slash profit margins for ethanol manufacturers, some say.

DOJ_NMG_0112615

"Right now we're getting by on $60 a barrel oil and still making money in ethanol," Mr. Gidel says. "But if all of a sudden we're going to stay at $60 and see demand for corn for ethanol rise for the 2008 harvest, well that would be a very ... challenging year for ethanol."

Wall Street has cooled somewhat to the industry's initial public offerings (IPOs) - privately held ethanol firms going public, analysts say.

"It's going to be a tough year because there's so much capacity," says a Deutsche Bank analyst, who asked not to be named because he did not have permission to speak to the press. "I don't really see Wall Street wanting to do a lot less [investment] with ethanol. We have had some pull back on a couple of IPOs by ethanol companies. Now the environment is tougher, but I don't think that's going to stop anybody."

Data Indicate Growth Softened During December (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby And Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK -- The latest readings on the service sector and labor market suggested that the U.S. economy softened a bit in December.

The Institute for Supply Management said its nonmanufacturing index, which surveys mostly service-related companies, slipped to 57.1 last month from 58.9 in November but was unchanged from the October reading.

Challenger, Gray & Christmas CEO John Challenger discusses his firm's December job cuts report2, which he says suggest an "ideal" soft landing for the economy.

Monster Worldwide International Group President Steve Pogorzelski discusses the state of the economy3 as seen via online job postings

Readings over 50 indicate expanding activity, but economists had looked for December's performance to be slightly stronger. The service sector is the single largest source of U.S. economic output.

The service-index reading came a day after the institute reported that its index of manufacturing activity showed modest growth last month after a mild contraction in November.

Despite a gradual cooling, survey respondents remained upbeat about the service sector: "Members' comments in December are generally positive concerning current business conditions," said Anthony Nieves, who compiles the report. "The overall indication in December is continued economic growth in the [service] sector."

The report said inflationary pressures faced by service-sector firms edged up, with the December price index settling at 59.1, up from 55.6 a month earlier. The group's employment index hit 53.3, up from 51.6 in November, while the new-orders index fell to 54.4 from November's 57.1.

Meanwhile, the U.S. job market also showed some softening based on data released by the Department of Labor. Initial claims for unemployment insurance rose to a seasonally adjusted 329,000 for the week ended Dec. 30, up 10,000 from a week earlier, an increase that may be holiday related.

Economists said yesterday that the increase may be due to seasonal adjustment volatility related to the holidays. The government today will release its employment report for December.

The Commerce Department said U.S. factory orders bounced back during November from a big drop in October. Orders rose 0.9% to $394.3 billion, buoyed by a rise in orders for durable goods.

Holiday Sales Look Happier Than Expected (USAT)

By Jayne O'donnell

USA Today, January 5, 2007

December sales were disappointing for several retailers, but upscale stores and most discounters continued to do well, results out Thursday show.

Despite a somewhat gloomy picture, the National Retail Federation continues to predict that holiday season sales will be up 5% for 2006, thanks in large part to a strong November. The federation will release its final numbers next Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0112616

Experts also caution that because gift cards are counted toward sales when they are redeemed, January could help retailers make up for lost sales earlier in the holiday season.

Darrell Rigby, head of management consulting firm Bain's global retail practice, questions those who say it's been a bad holiday retail season. He thinks sales will meet his company's prediction of up to 5.5% growth, which he notes will be well above the historical average of 4.3% growth for holiday seasons and "is comparable to the strong 5.4% that thrilled analysts last year."

"A host of high-end retailers all have done fairly well, and very price-sensitive retailers seemed to have done fairly well, too," says Carl Steidtmann, chief economist for Deloitte Research.

Still, there were some clear losers, especially Gap — which owns the Gap, Old Navy and Banana Republic stores. Gap same-store sales were down 9%, and Old Navy's dropped 10%.

Sabrina Simmons, Gap's senior vice president of corporate finance, said slow sales meant the company had to take big markdowns at Gap and Old Navy and warned that profits will continue to suffer as merchandise is cleared out this month.

Winners continue to be Target, which saw a sales increase of 4.1%, and Nordstrom, where sales were up 9%. And things aren't looking as bad at Wal-Mart as expected. The biggest retailer warned earlier that its sales would be up less than 1%, but it managed to beat 2005's December sales by 1.6%.

Sales for Federated Department Stores, which owns Macy's and Bloomingdale's, were up 4.4% and may have taken a bite out of some smaller retailers' business.

"The specialty apparel stores really seemed to struggle, which reflects the weakness of the apparel cycle," Steidtmann says.

He says the problems reflect how much discounting retailers needed to do to move merchandise. At both extremes, weather was a problem, he notes. There were store closings in some parts of the West before Christmas because of blizzards, while many other areas had record high temperatures that made cold-weather clothing a less likely purchase.

November retail sales were up 6.3%, NRF spokeswoman Ellen Davis says, so even with December sales likely coming in below 5%, NRF isn't worried.

"We still have wiggle room to make our forecast," she says.

Holiday-Sales Figures Leave Big Gaps (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

Holiday retail sales, once considered a barometer of the health of the economy, are no longer a crystal ball.

The same-store sales figures dozens of retailers reported yesterday don't reflect two big shifts in the way consumers shop these days. Gift cards have grown in popularity, but they aren't logged as sales until they are redeemed. Online sales, another booming category, also aren't included in the widely watched numbers.

BUILD YOUR OWN CHART

• Take a look1 at how a dozen major retailers, including Wal-Mart and Gap, have done over the past year, and use tools to build your own charts.

• See a sortable chart of results from about 20 retailers.2

Overall, retailers reported a 3.1% increase in December in sales at stores open at least a year, according to an index of 55 chains compiled by the International Council of Shopping Centers. That fell short of the 3.5% gain recorded a year earlier as well as the 3.6% increase in same-store sales the chains logged for the year as a whole.

But redemptions of gift cards could give retailers a lift in January, when roughly half of gift cards are typically used, often to buy full-price merchandise. Retailers could also get a boost later on if recipients fail to redeem the full value of the cards; in many states, retailers are allowed to book the unused value of gift cards as revenue if it isn't redeemed after a year or so. More than 10% of the value of gift cards purchased this year will go unused, according to Brian Riley, an analyst at Tower Group Inc., a Needham, Mass., research firm.

DOJ_NMG_0112617

Both effects could be magnified by the sharp rise in gift-card sales. The National Retail Federation estimates that gift-card sales this holiday season totaled nearly $25 billion, up 34% from a year earlier and accounting for nearly a fifth of holiday gift spending.

HOLIDAY SALES NEWS TRACKER

A regularly updated look at holiday-sales news and trends3, including how stores are performing, what products are moving and how consumers are faring.

Despite the inconclusive nature of yesterday's reports, the numbers did show what a mixed bag retailing has become. Luxury stores continued to ride the boom in high-end fashion and accessories, while many mall-based specialty chains, including Gap Inc., AnnTaylor Stores Corp. and Chico's FAS Inc., rang up disappointing results. Department stores generally reported modest gains.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the nation's largest retailer, reported a 1.6% gain, stronger than the flat sales or gain of as much as 1% that the Bentonville, Ark., retailer had predicted a month earlier.

The December figure was Wal-Mart's strongest monthly showing since August and reversed a same-store sales decline in November. The retailer said that shoppers armed with gift cards have snatched up postholiday deals on electronics and fitness equipment, contributing to the likelihood of a 1% to 2% gain this month in sales at stores open at least a year.

One standout in December was Saks Inc., where same-store sales surged 11%, in a sign of a turnaround at the chain, which had struggled with fashions that were too young to suit its core customers.

More broadly, luxury sales are being fueled by an increase in foreign tourism. Nordstrom Inc.'s same-store sales rose a stronger-than-expected 9%, while Neiman Marcus Group Inc. posted a 7.1% gain.

"Some of the strength on the high end is well above the trend for the year," said Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, who notes that the luxury boom is now in its fourth year.

But economists are talking about the possibility of a broad slowdown in spending this year amid a shaky housing market, rising consumer debt, high energy prices and a slowdown in job and wage growth. "We're getting a very mixed picture," Mr. Niemira said, noting that a number of retailers yesterday warned that profits will be lower than expected.

Gap, in fact, cut its earnings forecast for the fiscal year for the third time in six months and announced that management and its board are now reviewing the strategies of the retailer's Gap and Old Navy brands.

The San Francisco company said it now expects to earn just 83 cents to 87 cents a share for the fiscal year ending this month, roughly a third less than its original forecast of $1.23 to $1.27 a share. It will likely be the company's worst full-year performance under Chief Executive Paul Pressler, who joined Gap in September 2002.

Before yesterday's announcement, company executives had said that they were confident about their Gap and Old Navy strategies and that customers were just proving slow in adjusting to changes they had made. Gap has been trying to upgrade the quality and design of its merchandise, while remodeling its stores and adding "clean" departments that stock classics like wool pants and turtlenecks.

Old Navy, hurt by competition from discounters such as Target Corp., has a new president and has been trying to regain its fashion footing. Its women's merchandise is now outperforming its men's and kids' products, but the chain continues to lose customers.

Another disappointment: Federated Department Stores Inc., parent of Macy's and Bloomingdale's. Its 4.4% same-store sales increase fell short of its Nov. 30 forecast for a 5% to 8% increase. And the numbers don't include results from former May department stores that it acquired last year, but which have lagged since being converted to Macy's in September.

The Cincinnati company said it expects January same-store sales to grow 1.5% to 3% and fiscal fourth-quarter sales to be at the low end of expectations.

Warm weather in much of the country, which hurt sales of winter gear, appeared to keep a lid on sales at midtier department stores. J.C. Penney Co. posted a 2.6% gain -- roughly in line with estimates -- while archrival Kohl's Corp. reported a 3% increase. Dillard's Inc., of Little Rock, Ark., reported a sharper-than-expected 5% drop.

Department stores nevertheless continue to steal customers from struggling specialty apparel chains, said Dan Hess, chief executive of Merchant Forecast LLC, a New York consulting firm.

DOJ_NMG_0112618

"The simple fact is that department stores are making changes -- the kind that specialty stores were making 10 years ago," he said. "They're making shopping environments more exciting, they're offering better customer service, and more newness and a wider variety in fashion."

Markets Finish Higher Despite Unease (USAT/AP)

By Joe Bel Bruno

USA Today, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK — Wall Street struggled but ultimately closed higher Thursday as a bounce in technology stocks and sharply lower oil prices helped investors brush off concerns about sluggish consumer spending.

Retailers' lackluster holiday sales reports initially sent major stock indexes significantly lower. Stocks climbed back after a drop in crude oil prices to below $56 a barrel raised hopes that cheaper gasoline might be on the way.

A broad advance from chipmaker stocks supported the market. Leading the way was Intel, which surged to its highest level in two weeks after Banc of America Securities said it expects fourth-quarter results will come in higher than expected.

The market's performance Thursday showed that investors remain uneasy about any economic data, especially after minutes from the Federal Reserve's last meeting indicated policymakers were in no hurry to cut interest rates. Mixed data on Thursday included disappointing housing and service-sector reports.

"People are thinking now that energy prices are coming down, and that gives a chance for technology and other sectors to perform better," said Scott Fullman, director of investment strategy for Hapoalim Securities USA. "The broader picture is that the economy continues to show signs of slowing, and that will continue through the first quarter."

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 6.17 points to 12,480.69. Broader stock indicators were higher. The Standard & Poor's 500 index edged up 1.74 points to 1418.34. The tech-dominated Nasdaq composite added 30.27 points to 2453.43.

Bonds moved higher, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.61% from 4.66% late Wednesday. Also sending bond yields lower was the Institute for Supply Management's services sector index for December, which showed growth slowed from November.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners 3-to-2 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Highlights:

ExxonMobil was among the biggest decliners on the Dow, falling $1.39 to $72.72.

•Intel, the second-biggest advancer in the S&P 500, rose 82 cents, or 4%, to $21.17. Banc of America Securities raised the company's fourth-quarter earnings estimate, saying the chipmaker will likely gain market share.

Rates On 30-Year Mortgages Unchanged (AP)

Associated Press, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Rates on 30-year mortgages were unchanged in the first week of the new year after posting three consecutive increases to close out 2006.

Mortgage giant Freddie Mac reported Thursday that 30-year, fixed-rate mortgages averaged 6.18 percent this week, the same as last week.

Analysts said the markets in recent days have gotten some confusing messages about how serious the current economic slowdown will be.

"Currently, the market is waiting for a clearer signal on the direction in which the economy is headed," said Frank Nothaft, Freddie Mac's chief economist.

For 2006, 30-year mortgages peaked at 6.80 percent in late July with rates trending lower for most of the rest of the year. That decline was welcomed by the embattled housing industry, which is in the grips of a severe downturn after five boom years.

The Freddie Mac survey showed that other types of mortgage rates were mixed this week.

Rates on 15-year, fixed-rate mortgages, a popular choice for refinancing, edged up slightly to 5.94 percent, compared to 5.93 percent last week.

Five-year adjustable rate mortgages rose to 6.02 percent, up from 5.98 percent, but one-year adjustable rate mortgages fell to 5.42 percent, down from 5.47 percent last week.

DOJ_NMG_0112619

The mortgage rates do not include add-on fees known as points. Thirty-year, 15-year and five-year mortgages each carried a nationwide average fee of 0.4 point. One-year ARMs carried a fee of 0.6 point.

A year ago, rates on 30-year mortgages stood at 6.21 percent while 15-year mortgages were at 5.76 percent, five-year ARMs averaged 5.78 percent and one-year ARMs were at 5.16 percent.

Pending Sales Of Existing Homes In U.S. Fell 0.5% (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, January 5, 2007

Jan. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Fewer Americans signed contracts to buy previously owned homes in November, suggesting weakness in the real-estate market may extend into the new year.

An index of signed purchase agreements fell 0.5 percent, a third consecutive decline, to 107 from 107.5 in October, the National Association of Realtors said today in Washington. The index was down 11.4 percent from November 2005.

The decline from the previous year has been narrowing since July, suggesting sales may be stabilizing, the group said. The improvement may also stem a weakening in home prices that threatens to check consumer spending, which accounts for more than two-thirds of the economy.

``Data over the past few months strongly suggest that home sales have stabilized and are possibly rising at a modest pace," said Abiel Reinhart, an economist at JPMorgan Chase Corp. in New York.

The year-over-year decline is down from a 16 percent drop registered in July.

Economists expected the index to rise 0.7 percent in November, according to the median of 17 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey, after a decline of 1.7 percent the month before. Estimates ranged from a drop of 1 percent to an increase of 2.1 percent.

``The index is pointing toward fairly stable home sales in the near future," David Lereah, the group's chief economist said in a statement. ``This is another indication that home sales likely bottomed out in September."

Back-to-Back Sales Gain

The Realtors' group reported last week that sales of previously owned homes unexpectedly rose 0.6 percent in November after rising 0.5 percent a month earlier. It was the first back- to-back increase gain since March 2005 and followed declines in the previous six month.

The index of pending home resales is considered a leading indicator of sales because it tracks contract signings. The Realtors' sales report tracks closings, which typically occur a month or two later.

Purchases of new homes, which are also based on signings, rose a greater-than-forecast 3.4 percent in November to an annual sales pace of 1.047 million, the Commerce Department also reported last week.

The existing-home sales report is based on a sample of about 40 percent of transactions in the multiple listing service used by real estate agents, while the pending-sales index covers about 20 percent.

Regional Declines

Pending resales decreased in three of four regions, today's report showed today. They fell 2.8 percent in the Northeast, 2.6 percent in the West and 1.1 percent in the South. Pending resales rose 4.8 percent in the Midwest.

Lower mortgage rates have boosted sales. The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage fell to 6.14 percent last month, the lowest since October 2005, from 6.27 percent in November, according to figures from Freddie Mac.

The sales gains are barely starting to make a dent in inventories. The number of previously owned homes for sale decreased 1 percent to 3.82 million last month, last week's sales report from the Realtors showed. The supply was just less than the record 3.861 million reached in July.

Figures from the Commerce Department showed the number of new homes completed and waiting to be sold were at a record 169,000 in November.

Lennar Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0112620

Faced with a glut of unsold properties, builders are retrenching. Lennar Corp., the fourth-largest U.S. homebuilder, this week said it had its first quarterly loss in at least a decade after writing down property investments. Miami-based Lennar said it took the charge to write down land it now doesn't intend to purchase.

``Market conditions continued to weaken during the fourth quarter and we have not yet seen tangible evidence of a market recovery," Chief Executive Officer Stuart Miller said in a statement.

The Federal Reserve is doing its part to prevent the housing slump from deepening by keeping its interest-rate target steady. Fed policy makers left the benchmark rate target at 5.25 percent at the past four meetings, after raising it 17 straight times since June 2004.

``Economic growth has slowed over the course of the year, partly reflecting a substantial cooling of the housing market," Fed policy makers said in a statement following their Dec. 12 meeting. ``The economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace on balance over coming quarters."

The economy is likely to grow 2.5 percent this year after expanding at an annual pace of 2 percent in the last three months of 2006, according to the median estimate of economists surveyed early last month by Bloomberg News. The economy grew 3.3 percent a year on average in the last decade.

``While the housing cycle is far from complete, the probability it will cause a major decline in total economic activity is steadily falling," Douglas Lee, president of Economics From Washington, in Potomac, Maryland, said before the report.

Court Weighs Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 5, 2007

A case before the Kansas Supreme Court has become a key test of the rights of sperm donors who want to be involved with their offspring over the objection of the children's mothers.

The dispute, which has drawn national attention, involves a single woman, identified in court papers only as S.H., who gave birth to twins in May 2005 after being inseminated with the sperm of a friend, identified as D.H.

After the mother made it clear that she did not intend to share parenting, D.H. sued to establish paternity. He lost in a trial court because of a Kansas law that says the donor of sperm provided for artificial insemination is not the legal father of the child unless the donor and mother agree to it in writing.

The major question in the case is whether requiring such written agreements in cases involving sperm donors known to the mother, not anonymous donors from sperm banks, violates the donor's constitutional rights as a parent. Like Kansas, many states have legal hurdles for donors seeking parental status.

The case arises at a time of increasing advances in reproductive technology. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the numbers of women being impregnated with eggs fertilized outside the womb is significantly on the rise. There are no reliable statistics on methods of conception with donated sperm.

"It's clearly a broadening phenomenon," New York University sociology professor Judith Stacey says of artificial insemination with donor sperm. "All of this is tied to changes in the family, including women choosing to marry later and the gay and lesbian movement. What hasn't changed is women's desire to have children."

Most sperm donors are anonymous and waive parental rights. The move typically shields donors from demands for child support and protects mothers' privacy.

However, when the donor and the mother know each other, different expectations and legal complications can arise, as is the Kansas case and others in recent years from California to Pennsylvania. The cases reflect the lack of uniformity in laws regarding sperm donors, says American University law professor Nancy Polikoff, one of 20 family law professors who filed a brief in support of the Kansas mother. They say states traditionally have had broad latitude to define parentage on factors other than biology, such as marriage.

"Most of the time, even with a known donor, there is not an intention to be a parent," Polikoff says.

Among those backing the donor in the Kansas case is Linda Henry Elrod, director of the Children and Family Law Center at Washburn University law school in Topeka.

DOJ_NMG_0112621

Elrod said the Kansas law should not treat anonymous and known donors the same: "A man who is the known genetic father and who steps forward to accept parental responsibility for his children automatically has those rights as a matter of constitutional law."

The Kansas Supreme Court is expected to rule by February.

First Black Governor Of Mass. Sworn In (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 5, 2007

Deval Laurdine Patrick was sworn in Thursday as the 71st governor of Massachusetts, the culmination of a longshot political campaign that also saw him become the state's first black chief executive and only the second elected in the nation.

Amid springlike weather that embraced the state's first outdoor inaugural, Patrick placed his hand on a Bible once given to John Quincy Adams by "Amistad" slaves he helped free and repeated the oath recited to him by Senate President Robert Travaglini.

"We meet today on a singular occasion, more than the passing of title and honor, more than the ritual transfer of the power of government," Patrick, 50, told a crowd of thousands that stretched into Boston Common. "This is the occasion when the people charge new leadership to steward the public trust. It is a profound responsibility and I accept it humbly."

Worcester Mayor Timothy Murray also was sworn in as lieutenant governor by House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi. Murray will continue to hold both titles until Jan. 9, when he steps down as mayor.

Among those looking on were thousands of supporters who helped propel the political neophyte to a 21-point victory on Election Day. Seated in chairs at the base of the Statehouse steps were members of the Legislature and four past governors: Michael S. Dukakis, William F. Weld, Paul Cellucci and Jane M. Swift.

Also observing was L. Douglas Wilder, who became the nation's first black elected governor in 1990 when he was similarly inaugurated in Virginia. He now serves as mayor of the state's capital city, Richmond.

With his installation, Patrick ended a 16-year run of Republican rule that began in 1991, when Weld replaced Dukakis in the Corner Office. Former Gov. Mitt Romney, who decided against seeking a second term, did not attend the ceremonies, having left the building Wednesday night after taking a tradition-laden "lone walk" down the Statehouse steps.

Romney, who filed papers Wednesday to form a presidential exploratory committee, stayed at his Belmont home before heading into his new headquarters in the North End to work on his campaign for the 2008 GOP nomination.

The governor-elect started his day before dawn, continuing to work on his inaugural speech before making an unpublicized visit to Children's Hospital to visit ailing patients and their families.

"The governor-elect is very big on symbolism, just as he was on Election Day, when he finally spread the ashes of his late mother," said Patrick spokesman Steve Crawford.

Afterward, Patrick was whisked off in a motorcade escorted by State Police motorcycles to an interfaith service at the Old South Meeting House. The multidenominational service featured readings by ministers of various faiths, as well as a variety of music.

"I hope you can feel both the joy in this room and the sense of expectation that accompanies it," said the Rev. Peter J. Gomes, a religion professor at Harvard University, Patrick's alma mater. "You can't do what you are about to do on your own. You will need a lot of help."

Gomes also celebrated Patrick for heading up to the Statehouse earlier this week in an unsuccessful effort to lobby legislators not to hold a vote — and essentially kill — a 2008 ballot question proposing to ban gay marriage in Massachusetts.

"That was a great sign of things to come," Gomes said. "There is more to be done; this is why you have four years."

During a pre-inaugural reception at Union Station in Worcester on Wednesday night, the incoming governor urged Massachusetts citizens to retain the political energy that propelled him from first-time candidate to a 21-point winner on Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0112622

"Tonight and tomorrow, under what are predicated to be glorious and uncommonly fair skies, we will feel the energy and the satisfaction of what we built from nearly nothing over the course of two years," the governor-elect told a crowd of several thousand.

"But I ask you above all, to take a morsel of that feeling and tuck it away, because there will be tough times ahead. Change doesn't come easily to many, but change is what we are about and must be about," added the tuxedo-clad Patrick, who was joined on stage by his wife, Diane, and his running mate, Lt. Gov-elect Timothy Murray.

Murray drew a chuckle from his hometown audience when he presented a key to the city to his new boss.

"He has inspired us during the course of this campaign, and I say without reservation he will inspire us as governor," Murray said to cheers.

Patrick took the oath of office on a Bible given to John Quincy Adams by kidnapped Africans whom Adams helped free in the Amistad slave ship case he argued before the U.S. Supreme Court in 1841.

The governor-elect insisted on the outdoor venue both to accommodate more people than could fit inside the building, and to emphasize the inclusiveness of his new administration. It will be the 71st in the history of the commonwealth.

Afterward, Patrick scheduled a "youth inaugural" at the Shubert Theatre before capping the day with a tuxedo-optional ball at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. The featured musical performer was renowned cellist Yo-Yo Ma.

Over the weekend, Patrick planned to attend five regional receptions or inaugural balls, beginning Friday night in North Andover.

On Wednesday, Romney literally handed over the keys to the Corner Office.

In keeping with the trappings of transferring power, Romney gave Patrick a pewter key to the governor's inner office as well as an 1884 Holy Bible, a set of Massachusetts General Laws and gavel in a box made from timbers from the USS Constitution.

"To serve another person is an honor. To serve a great people has been a great honor. To help another person is rewarding. To help many thousands of people has been immeasurably rewarding," Romney wrote in the Bible. "May God continue to bless the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

On his way out of the building, he paused to say goodbye to Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, whom Patrick beat in the gubernatorial election.

Massachusetts Swears In A Black Democrat As Governor (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 4 — In a ceremony rich with gestures of openness and symbols of conquering adversity, Deval L. Patrick, the first black governor of Massachusetts, took his oath of office on Thursday. He promised far-reaching changes in attitude and policy and asked people to “see our stake in each others’ dreams and struggles as well as our own, and act on that.”

In the state’s first outdoor inauguration, part of four days of events intended to include people across the state, Mr. Patrick, the first Democratic governor here in 16 years, said, “For a very long time now we have been told that government is bad, that it exists only to serve the powerful and well-connected, that its job is not important enough to be done by anyone competent, let alone committed, and that all of us are on our own.”

“Today we join together in common cause,” he said, “to lay that fallacy to rest.”

Mr. Patrick takes over from Mitt Romney, a Republican, who is planning to run for the presidency, and already Mr. Patrick has revealed many positions that oppose Mr. Romney’s. The former governor did not attend the inauguration.

Mr. Patrick has said that he will restore $383.6 million in budget cuts made by Mr. Romney to social services and other programs, that he will reverse the former governor’s agreement authorizing the state police to arrest illegal immigrants, and that a Romney-endorsed effort to remove some Massachusetts Turnpike tolls is unrealistic.

Mr. Patrick also said he might revoke some of the 200 11th-hour appointments Mr. Romney made to boards and commissions.

And, while Mr. Romney strongly backed a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, Mr. Patrick spoke out strongly against it this week, even as the legislature gave it first-round approval.

DOJ_NMG_0112623

While the legislature is heavily Democratic in this heavily Roman Catholic state, many Democrats are more conservative than Mr. Patrick on issues like same-sex marriage. He also faces a budget deficit of about $1 billion. And it will not be easy to put into effect the state's new health insurance reform.

"I've never seen a governor who has such high expectations on him as Deval Patrick," said Jeffrey Berry, a political scientist at Tufts University. "Democrats regard him as something of a demigod. They expect him to be able to leap tall buildings in a single bound and pay for social services."

Paul Watanabe, a political scientist at the University of Massachusetts-Boston, said: "I think he's going to find that governing is a lot more challenging than being a candidate. And that the demands placed upon him by large numbers of individuals — a record number of people that voted for him — are going to be difficult to meet."

Mr. Patrick also faces criticism over his inauguration celebrations. While much was inclusive — the open-air ceremony, a town-meeting-like "youth inaugural" for students, and upcoming ceremonies in five other cities — there was also a gala whose cost was paid for largely by corporate donors, who were allowed to give up to $50,000 each.

At the inauguration itself, however, on one of the balmiest January days in memory, the tone was full of possibility, pride and humility. In a state where the legacy of busing and segregation still stings, Mr. Patrick, reared in poverty on the South Side of Chicago, took the oath on a Bible given to John Quincy Adams by Africans from the Amistad slave ship whom Adams had helped free.

Four previous Massachusetts governors were present, as was L. Douglas Wilder, the former governor of Virginia and the only other black since Reconstruction to have been a governor.

The populist timbre, and the high expectations of Mr. Patrick, were sounded early, with a benediction by Rabbi Jonah Pesner describing the multicultural electorate and the problems of poverty, violence and discrimination.

"Behind every face hides so many secrets — painful secrets of suffering," Rabbi Pesner said, urging the governor and the people to create "a commonwealth rebuilt, repaired and redeemed."

Among the crowd was Derward Jacobs, 60, who is disabled and who drove his scooter to the State House because "I felt like I should be here."

George Greenidge Jr., 35, leader of an alliance of black colleges, said, "Today is a beacon of hope."

Mr. Greenidge added that Mr. Patrick had "re-engaged a constituency that really never was involved in state politics, especially people from lower economic backgrounds."

Beth Gilbert, 52, of Norfolk, Mass., acknowledged the steep demands that confront Mr. Patrick, saying, "When you elect a Republican governor, part of their bargain is they don't really believe that government can solve the people's problems. That's probably what's led to higher expectations here."

Mr. Patrick signaled he was aware of the difficulties.

"I am an optimist, but not a foolish one," he said. "I see clearly the challenges before us."

He added: "Change is not always comfortable or convenient or welcome. But it is what we hoped for, what we have worked for, what you voted for, and what you shall have."

Four Stars Lead Early GOP Race (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

Could Mitt Romney, ex-governor of Massachusetts and not well known nationally, end up winning the Republican nomination for president in 2008?

In a word, yes - despite prospects that don't look particularly strong on paper, analysts say. The latest polling out of states with the earliest nominating contests, which begin in a year, shows Mr. Romney in single digits. Even in neighboring New Hampshire, he comes in fourth, behind Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who won the New Hampshire primary in 2000, former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

DOJ_NMG_0112624

But in a week that saw Romney launch his presidential exploratory committee, allowing him to enter the all-important money race, the Republican field is fluid. Religious conservatives, a key GOP constituency, remain skeptical of Senator McCain. And his advocacy for a stepped-up US presence in Iraq has thrown his political future squarely in line with a war that few believe is going well.

Mr. Giuliani, well known for his 9/11 leadership, remains untested on the national political stage and holds liberal positions on social issues that put him at odds with many GOP primary voters (as well as a colorful personal life).

Speaker Gingrich has, for now, become a repository of support among conservatives, though his short tenure as speaker and his three marriages could cause him to wilt under the klieg lights.

Enter Romney: successful businessman, savior of the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics, with an attractive family. Having won the governorship of liberal Massachusetts as a moderate Republican in 2002, he then sought to remake his national image by adopting conservative positions on abortion, gay rights, and stem cells. But many Republicans remain leery. And among Evangelical conservatives, Romney's Mormon faith can also be a hurdle.

Still, in the end, political analysts can see a clear path by which Romney becomes the GOP nominee, almost by default. Republicans "want to win in November [2008]," says Ed Sarpolus, an independent pollster in Michigan who dismisses Gingrich's and Giuliani's chances. "If McCain self-destructs because of Iraq, even in New Hampshire they'll hold their nose and vote for Mitt Romney." Push to sell the Romney brand

Romney's single-digit numbers among Iowa and South Carolina Republicans can be attributed to low name recognition; he's just getting started in earnest. But New Hampshirites know Romney. Among GOP activists there, he is well-organized and has secured some big names, such as Tom Rath, who is stepping down as a national GOP committeeman to join Romney's campaign. But among regular folk, particularly those in the well-populated southern tier who consume Boston media, anti-Romney coverage has become a staple.

As a red governor of a solidly blue state with an eye on national office, Romney was caught in a tough place.

"Republicans are suspicious of what kind of Republican that makes him," says Dick Bennett, head of American Research Group, a nonpartisan polling firm. "I don't know what Republicans will end up wanting to have. He's in the hunt, but [among Republicans in New Hampshire] there isn't any loyalty to Massachusetts."

That's bad news for Romney.

Next January, Romney will be expected to perform respectably in New Hampshire - if not winning the primary, at least coming close.

"He's got to do well; it's right next door," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville. "There's no excuse for him."

If Romney can achieve that, he may find safe harbor in Michigan - his native state, where his late father remains a beloved former governor - and home to an early primary contest that will come soon after the first wave. Already, Michigan political analysts are assuming that their GOP primary will boil down to McCain versus Romney, with the usual caveats. And if Iraq remains the No. 1 issue on voters' minds a year from now, McCain may be in serious trouble.

The question, though, is whether the Michigan primary will come in time for Romney. That ol' McCain magic

His first hurdle - doing well in New Hampshire - is a big one. McCain remains a rock star in the state, having kept alive his strong political machine from the 2000 primaries.

For Romney, local analysts don't see the Mormon issue hurting him much in New Hampshire, but they do see a problem in the drumbeat of negative Boston media about his tenure as governor.

"The media and the voters have a beef with him, because he pretty much abandoned ship a half year ago," says Tobe Berkovitz, a communications professor at Boston University and sometime Democratic political consultant. "My guess is that he saw himself as a lame duck no matter what, so why bang his head against the wall. ... He was trying to run for president, but it's also a pretty hopeless state for most Republicans to get their agenda achieved."

Mr. Sabato does not see Romney's challenges as insurmountable, including the need to get over his image as a flip-flopper on social issues.

DOJ_NMG_0112625

"Opponents will criticize him and cite this memo and that memo," he says. "That's detail stuff. As long as people believe him when he says, 'Here's where I stand on "fill in the blank," ' and it's simple and to the point, they'll buy it."

Mr. Berkovitz says that, with time, Massachusetts's new, Democratic governor, Deval Patrick, could actually help Romney among Republicans in New Hampshire.

"If the people of New Hampshire see Massachusetts, with a Democratic governor going back to its old ways, Romney's stock could rise a little," he says.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Taking the pledge

Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, both Republicans and presidential hopefuls, have pledged not to raise taxes should they reach the White House.

The Taxpayer Protection Pledge, sponsored by Americans for Tax Reform, commits signers to "oppose any and all efforts to increase the marginal income tax rates for individuals and/or businesses ... and oppose any net reduction or elimination of deductions and credits, unless matched dollar for dollar by further reducing tax rates."

Mr. Romney signed on Sunday and Mr. Brownback signed on Monday, according to the tax reform group, which has offered the pledge to all candidates for federal office since 1987. To date, President Bush, 43 U.S. senators and 197 members of the U.S. House have signed the pledge, the group said.

Seven governors and more than 1,100 state legislators have signed the pledge as well.

"America needs leaders who are committed to protecting taxpayers, and signing our pledge demonstrates that kind of leadership," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. "By signing the pledge, Sam Brownback and Mitt Romney demonstrate allegiance to hardworking taxpayers nationwide. It is now up to the other candidates in the race to stand up to the challenge."

Provisional seating

Just because Rep. Vern Buchanan, Florida Republican, was sworn in yesterday doesn't mean that the Democrat-controlled House is on his side in his contested election.

Rep. Rush D. Holt, New Jersey Democrat, formally asked the House to recognize the court challenge in Florida's 13th Congressional District in the Sarasota area. Mr. Buchanan won by just 369 votes, but Democrat Christine Jennings contends that the electronic voting machines didn't work correctly because 18,000 people who voted in other elections did not vote in the House race.

On the House floor, Mr. Holt asked Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, whether a notice of contest had been filed with the clerk on behalf of Miss Jennings.

Mrs. Pelosi said the notice had been filed with the clerk.

"The House remains the judge of the elections of its members," Mrs. Pelosi said. "The seating of this member-elect is entirely without prejudice to the contest over the final right to that seat."

Mrs. Pelosi added that the Committee on House Administration is reviewing the contest.

Ralph G. Neas, president of People For the American Way Foundation, applauded the House leadership for making clear that Mr. Buchanan's time in Congress is provisional until the matter is resolved, the Associated Press reports.

"Only after court proceedings and a congressional investigation seeking answers about the Sarasota undervote have run their course, and only after Sarasota's election problems have been remedied, should someone be permanently seated," Mr. Neas said.

Next ambition

Mark Dayton ended his one term as a U.S. senator yesterday, but the Minneapolis-St. Paul Star Tribune reports that the Minnesota Democrat is considering a run for governor in 2010.

DOJ_NMG_0112626

The announcement was made as Mr. Dayton recounted his frustration with Congress, acknowledging that he had not been "as effective as I hoped to be when I arrived." For that, he blamed what he called the seniority-driven politics of the Senate, where he was in the minority party for the past four years.

"The Senate or the Legislature is a very reactive institution, and I think I'm much more effective personally and professionally being more proactive," he said.

Republicans reacted to a potential run for governor with incredulity, noting that Mr. Dayton recently gave himself an "F" for his Senate performance.

Patrick sworn in

Four former Massachusetts governors — Republicans and Democrats — attended the history-making inauguration of Gov. Deval Patrick, the nation's second black elected governor. Noticeably absent was former Gov. Mitt Romney.

Mr. Romney, who a day earlier took the first step in his run for president, said he watched the ceremony on television at his home in Belmont, a suburb about eight miles west of Boston. The Republican hopeful said he followed tradition by not attending the inaugural.

"My understanding is that the tradition in Massachusetts is that the outgoing governor does not attend the inauguration of the new governor," Mr. Romney said as he opened his presidential exploratory committee campaign headquarters in Boston's North End. "That's the way it was when I was sworn in, and my understanding is that's the case, and so I simply have followed tradition."

Attending the inauguration of the state's first black governor were former Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, the 1988 Democratic presidential nominee, and three former Republican governors: William Weld, Paul Cellucci and Jane Swift.

Former Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, who in 1990 became the first black elected to lead a state, also attended. Mr. Wilder is the mayor of Richmond.

Hip replacement

Hours after attending Gerald R. Ford's funeral, former President George Bush underwent surgery to replace his right hip, the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., announced yesterday, a day after the procedure.

The surgery, completed by 7 a.m. Wednesday, was a success, said Mayo Clinic spokesman Adam Brase. He said the 82-year-old was undergoing physical therapy and was expected to be released no later than tomorrow.

Mr. Bush traveled to the clinic late Tuesday after attending the Washington funeral of Mr. Ford, where he delivered a eulogy.

Mr. Bush had his left hip replaced at the Mayo Clinic in 2000. His wife, Barbara, had successful hip replacement surgery there in 1997.

At long last

"Two actions [Tuesday] in the Massachusetts state legislature increase the likelihood that voters in the Bay State will have the chance, in 2008, to vote on an amendment to the state constitution banning gay marriage," the New York Sun says in an editorial.

"Whatever one's view of gay marriage, it is something to behold that such a vote would take place fully five years, to the month, after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that gays have a right to marry in Massachusetts and more than four years after local officials in Massachusetts started granting marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Senator Kerry's position has been that he supports amending the constitution of Massachusetts to ban gay marriage but allow civil unions. 'I believe marriage is between a man and a woman,' Senator Kerry said in one of the 2004 presidential debates.

"When even a Democratic left-wing senator from Massachusetts doesn't side with the court's ruling, one gets the sense that proponents of gay marriage have yet to fully convince the public of the righteousness of their cause and that the court is out ahead of public sentiment on the issue."

The Anti-Clinton (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112627

John Edwards so wants to be President that he has spent the past four years campaigning for the job nonstop, practically living in Iowa since the 2004 election. He starts his second run for the Oval Office with a solid foundation: polls show him as one of the top Democratic contenders in the Hawkeye State, where voters liked his relaxed, guy-next-door manner and optimistic message in 2004 and have appreciated his many visits since. So what is the ex--North Carolina Senator and former vice-presidential nominee doing dumping the centrism that was key to putting the past two Democrats in the White House? Why is he tacking sharply to the left? As Jesse Jackson, Bill Bradley and Howard Dean could tell you, the most liberal of the Democratic contenders hasn't even won the nomination since 1972.

Although in 2004 he spoke eloquently of the "Two Americas"--rich and poor--if you looked at the fine print, Edwards backed ideas that originated in the centrist group that created much of Bill Clinton's agenda, the Democratic Leadership Council. Not this time. Many of the proposals for middle-class tax cuts from Edwards' first run won't be on his platform. Edwards says the country can't afford them and the bigger goals he wants to pursue. He says the problems in the U.S. are too pressing for the incremental solutions he proposed last time. So on the day he announced his presidential candidacy, Edwards boldly declared that reducing the deficit, a hallmark of the Clinton Administration, was less important to him than spending government money on, among other things, creating a universal health-care system and stopping global warming. His call to end poverty in the U.S. over the next 30 years by spending more than $15 billion each year sounds like a plan ripped straight from Lyndon Johnson's Great Society, the kind of Big Government liberalism Clinton shunned. Clinton did all kinds of things to show he was pro-business, while last August in Pittsburgh at a rally sponsored by an anti--Wal-Mart group, Edwards blasted the company for not paying its workers enough. Although Edwards got much of his advice in 2004 from centrists like Bruce Reed, Clinton's ex-- policy guru, the Edwards '08 campaign is being run by David Bonior, a former Michigan Congressman who strongly opposed Clinton's welfare reform and free-trade deals in the 1990s.

The economic populism Edwards talked about in 2004 and has now fully embraced was a winning formula in 2006 for many Democratic congressional candidates--even after Republicans depicted them as big spenders. But presidential candidates are judged by different criteria. Moving to the left doesn't answer one of the main critiques of Edwards in the last campaign: his lack of foreign policy experience. And taking up liberalism may be particularly dangerous for Edwards now that Democrats control Congress, since a G.O.P. opponent could argue that voters would have no check on spending if Edwards were elected.

But Edwards has to win his party's nomination first. If Hillary Clinton runs, she could immediately become the front runner, picking up much of the money and endorsements from the party establishment. The remaining energy, activism and cash that any rival would need to challenge her are on the left, not the center, as Edwards discovered in 2004, when Dean badly outraised him. That's why Edwards has spent the past two years actively courting the liberal netroots, even hiring Dean's old blogger, and wooing top union bosses. Edwards' attacks on Wal-Mart, which has discouraged its workers from forming unions, and his calls for universal health care are beloved by labor leaders, who could give Edwards a major lift in the early primaries in Iowa and Nevada, where their organizations are influential in Democratic politics.

The Edwards strategy would be complicated by a presidential run by Senator Barack Obama, which is why Edwards aides have watched Obama's rise with trepidation. Obama too is very well liked by the left. But both Obama and Hillary Clinton act like front runners: cautiously. They often deploy platitudes (witness Obama's speeches about hope) and look for easy targets (note Clinton's sermonizing on violent video games). That leaves room to emerge as the candidate who connects with Democratic voters by saying bold things that appeal to liberals, as when Edwards wrote "I was wrong" in voting for the Iraq war in an Op-Ed in the Washington Post in the fall of 2005. Dean employed this aggressive strategy in 2004 but couldn't win the nomination because he was viewed as too feisty and angry to be President. But if you're going to take your party in a new direction, it helps to be like Edwards, a smooth-talking Southern charmer with a light drawl whom Bill Clinton himself described as being able to "talk an owl out of a tree." That's where the ex-President's model may suit Edwards just fine.

Bill Clinton Turns Heads In The Senate (MACT)

By Mary-clare Jalonick

The Macon Telegraph, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112628

WASHINGTON - The Clinton who turned heads in the Senate Thursday was not Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, notwithstanding all the speculation about her running for president.

Former President Clinton cheerfully called out, "Hi, everybody!" as he strolled through the Senate Press Gallery past correspondents for The Associated Press, The Washington Post and the Wall Street Journal.

He was surrounded by a security entourage, but wasn't really seeking publicity. Something more mundane, actually. A bathroom, and then the swearing in of his wife for the new 110th Congress.

Then he headed for the men's room - followed by his Secret Service agents and a cadre of reporters. The questions were obvious:

"Do you want to live in the White House again?

"I would like not to talk about it today," he said.

"Is Mrs. Clinton going to run for president?

"Ask her."

"All I know is, this is a happy day," Clinton added. "It's a great day for the largest number of women we've ever had in the Congress, a lot of new people coming in, I think it will be good. I'll be surprised if we don't see a lot of interesting, bipartisan things happening over the next six months."

And with that, Clinton made his way around to the visitors' gallery and sat down next to daughter, Chelsea. After a quick call on his cell phone - which is against Senate rules - he watched his wife as she chatted with her colleagues on the Senate floor.

Mrs. Clinton pointed to them and waved when she appeared on the Senate floor. In turn, they led a standing ovation when she took her oath.

---_

The galleries and the Senate floor constituted a who's who of politically active celebrities and former members gathered to watch Democrats take control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years.

Besides the former president, squished into the theater-style gallery seats were actor Richard Gere and singers Carole King and Tony Bennett.

The Senate floor was a big reunion of giddy Senate Democrats past and present. Former Sen. John Glenn of Ohio snickered about something with Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy. Chuck Robb, the Virginia Democrat ousted in 2000 by Republican George Allen, hung out in the center aisle with the Democrat who bumped Allen from power this year, Sen. Jim Webb.

And retired Sen. John Breaux of Louisiana, playfully hugged Mrs. Clinton as they both waved to her husband the former president and Chelsea.

Challengers Join Hands To Unseat Texas Speaker (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

DALLAS -- Two conservative Republicans from the Dallas area joined forces yesterday in a move to oust Texas House Speaker Tom Craddick.

But Mr. Craddick, a Republican legislator from Midland in western Texas, said he still had enough votes to win re-election to the post on Tuesday.

Rep. Brian McCall of Plano stunned his supporters yesterday by endorsing fellow Republican Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie at a press conference in Austin.

In their brief appearance, the two challengers vowed Mr. Pitts would win the speakership, but they refused to list their backers.

They said they did not want to expose the supporters to intense pressure before the vote.

"But I guarantee you," Mr. Pitts said, "the race is over."

Mr. Craddick's press secretary, Alexis DeLee, downplayed the development, calling it "just another version of the same story." She said Mr. Craddick remained "confident" of victory when the House convenes next week in Austin.

DOJ_NMG_0112629

"Our numbers are continuing to grow," she added.

Mr. McCall, backed by many Democrats, was publicly criticized for having so many opposition-party supporters, which some Craddick allies cited as a strong reason to re-elect the speaker. The Democrats trail the Republicans by an 80-69 margin in the Texas House.

Mr. Craddick, who served 34 years before he was named the first Republican House speaker in January 2003, was easily re-elected in 2005.

Mr. Pitts said he would not release his list of backers because "they would risk retribution for being on that list."

He added, "That is why I am running for speaker of the House."

"We deserve a speaker who will lead by consensus, not by edicts," he said.

The head of the conservative Texas Eagle Forum warned Tuesday that to unseat Mr. Craddick would be to return power to Democrats.

"Our conservative agenda would be [dead on arrival]," said Cathie Adams. "We've worked too hard for too many years to win a Republican majority in the House just to hand it over to the Democrats."

Democratic caucus leader Jim Dunnam of Waco said the Republicans will control the House no matter who is speaker.

"The fact is: They have the majority and we're in the minority," Mr. Dunnam said.

Virginia's Moment Of Clarity (WP)

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

VIRGINIA Republicans ought to try getting out more often. They might get a bracing dose of voter sentiment.

That's what happened to Del. John J. Welch III, longtime stalwart of the fundamentalist, anti-tax wing of the state GOP that controls the Virginia House of Delegates. Until now, Mr. Welch, of Virginia Beach, has helped impede common sense by opposing all new funding proposals involving taxes to improve the state's crumbling, jampacked transportation network.

Mr. Welch was mugged by reality on Election Day, appropriately enough. That's when he discovered -- brace yourself -- that voters are furious about traffic, furious about the legislative stalemate on transportation funding in Richmond and furious enough to do something about it in state legislative elections this fall. "I worked the polls for 13 hours," Mr. Welch told reporters, "and people told me they want something done. They don't like taxes, but they want action."

Now Mr. Welch wants to add a dime per gallon to Virginia's gas tax, which was last raised in 1986 and ranks among the lowest in the nation. His proposed increase, to 27.5 cents a gallon from the current rate of 17.5 cents, would yield about $522 million a year in road and rail funding -- about half of what's needed to make a dent in the problem.

Well, better late than never. Unfortunately, Mr. Welch's clear-eyed proposal was met with icy silence from his stay-at-home Republican colleagues in the House, many of whom have signed no-new-taxes pledges. That proves they lack any serious, long-term plan to pay for the billions of dollars in transportation improvements needed around the state.

By contrast, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) proposed a package yesterday that meets the state's transportation problem head-on. It would, for starters, broaden the powers of localities to reject development proposals and slow growth if local roads are too crowded. And it would yield $5.25 billion in new revenue over the next six years -- the first fresh funding for the state's beleaguered roads in a generation.

The governor's package, similar to but slightly smaller than one he offered a year ago, was mocked by the GOP's anti-tax ideologues as "deja vu all over again." It is probably dead on arrival in the House, which would rather posture than fix that state's most urgent problem.

Still, the impasse between Mr. Kaine and the House Republicans provides a useful moment of clarity. The governor, who understands that no transportation gain is possible without the pain of new taxes, is determined to expose the House Republicans for the obstructionists they are. And the House Republicans give every indication that they are willing to oblige him. That should make for a stark, and easy, choice for voters come November.

Rice Announces $16M In Aid For Somalia (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112630

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday the U.S. will provide $16 million in aid to Somalia and said the installation of a new government there gives Somalis a chance to move beyond two decades of chaos.

Rice announced $11.5 million in food aid for the country on the Horn of Africa, $1.5 million in nonfood assistance and $3.5 million to help refugees.

In a written statement, she said creation of a U.N.-backed government represents a "historic opportunity" for Somalis to end their recent spate of "warlordism, extreme violence and humanitarian suffering."

Rice has dispatched her top aide for African affairs, Jendayi Frazer, to the region for discussions on promoting a peacekeeping force for Somalia and to urge a political dialogue leading to national reconciliation.

State Department spokesmwan Sean McCormack said Frazer held talks with Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni and Ethiopian president Meles Zenawi.

Frazer will meet with diplomats from Europe, Africa and international organizations to coordinate future steps in Somalia.

McCormack said Frazer has no plans to visit Somalia, but he raised the possibility that she could be part of an international delegation that would travel there.

Troops Fight Militiamen In The South (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 4 -- Somali government troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers battled about 600 Islamic militiamen Thursday on the southern tip of this Horn of Africa country, and U.S. Navy forces prevented the Islamic fighters from fleeing by sea, authorities said.

Somalia's interior minister, Hussein Farah Aideed, said thousands of Islamic fighters were still hiding in the capital.

"There are 3,500 Islamists hiding in Mogadishu and in the surrounding areas, and they are likely to destabilize the security of the city," he said.

Kenya has closed its border because of concerns that the militiamen might slip across. That has prevented thousands of Somali refugees from seeking safety in Kenya, U.N. officials said.

Somali gunmen also attacked an oil tank truck near Mogadishu, wounding three people, and a hand grenade was thrown at Ethiopian troops backing the interim government in the capital, a resident said, according to [a] news agency. No one was hurt in the latter incident.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that the United States will provide $16 million in aid to Somalia and that the installation of a new government there gives Somalis a chance to move beyond two decades of chaos.

Rice has dispatched her top aide for African affairs, Jendayi E. Frazer, to the region for discussions on promoting a peacekeeping force for Somalia and to urge a political dialogue leading to national reconciliation.

US Helps Contain Somalia's Islamist Forces (FT)

By Stephen Fidler And William Wallis

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

A US-led naval task force off the Somali coast has been boarding ships in recent days as part of efforts to prevent Islamist militants fleeing the country.

The task force is taking part in a broader US military effort to stop Islamist fighters in Somalia moving into neighbouring countries following a rout by Ethiopian forces. Kenya has officially closed its border with Somalia on in an effort to stem the transit of militants, officials said.

The US has offered tacit support to the Ethiopian-led offensive in support of Somalia's transitional government and Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, hailed the military victory as a "historic opportunity" for the war-ravaged country.

The US has also said that it is determined to prevent terrorists escaping from the aftermath of the fighting.

"We...are going to be working closely with states in the region to ensure that these individuals aren't able to transit those borders and exit Somalia," Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman, said on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0112631

Officials from Europe, the US, Africa and the Middle East are due to meet in Nairobi on Friday to discuss deployment of a peacekeeping force for the region.

Yoweri Museveni, the Ugandan president said on Thursday at a joint news conference in Addis Ababa with Meles Zenawi, Ethiopian prime minister, that Uganda is ready to provide peacekeepers for the force. “The troops are ready but I have to consult the speaker of parliament. As soon as parliament approves, they will be sent to Somalia,” he said.

Earlier Jendayi Frazer, the US assistant secretary of state who was also visiting Ethiopia, said Mr Museveni had promised to provide between 1,000 and 2,000 soldiers. She hoped a peacekeeping force could be ready by the end of the month.

Mr Zenawi has pressed for the rapid deployment of peacekeepers, seen by international and regional diplomats as providing an exit strategy for Ethiopia.

Ethiopian officials said fighting with Islamists continued in Somalia’s southern tip on Thursday, near the Kenyan border. The US ships are operating in international waters off the Somali coast. A spokeswoman for US Central Command said that while a number of boardings had taken place she could not confirm that any individuals had been apprehended.

A Kenyan official was quoted by AFP saying that four Ethiopian helicopters, op-erating on information from a US satellite, had at-tacked three vehicles possibly carrying Islamist leaders close to the Kenyan border. The individuals apparently escaped, and US officials could not be reached to confirm any American role.

A separate US-led task force has been operating out of Djibouti since 2003 with more than 1,500 military and civilian personnel aimed at helping countries in the Horn of Africa to deal with terrorism. The force has provided military help to Ethiopia to bolster its ability to protect its border and ports.

However, a spokeswoman said that the “internationally recognised” transitional government of Somalia had not invited US forces into the country and no US troops were operating there.

U.S. Ships Hunt For Al Qaeda Off Somalia (WT/LDT)

By Mike Pflanz, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya -- U.S. Navy warships yesterday stepped up patrols off Somalia, boarding fishing boats and oil tankers to search for al Qaeda agents who fled after their Islamist allies were chased into hiding.

At the same time, the State Department's chief Africa diplomat, Jendayi Frazer, met with Ethiopia's prime minister for the first time since Ethiopian troops led the advance that crushed the fundamentalist Islamic Courts Union that had ruled much of Somalia until a few weeks ago.

Miss Frazer hoped peacekeepers drawn from African nations would be deployed in Somalia "by the end of January."

Uganda responded yesterday, saying it was ready to send peacekeepers as soon as its parliament approves the plan, [a] news agency reported.

Offshore, the USS Ramage, a guided-missile destroyer, and the USS Bunker Hill, both from the U.S. 5th Fleet, were among several vessels dispatched from the British-led Combined Task Force 150, based in Bahrain, to waters off Somalia.

"Coalition forces will continue routine operations in this unstable area as long as the need exists for our presence," said the task force's commander, Commodore Bruce Williams of Britain's Royal Navy.

Meanwhile, a reported audio tape message by al Qaeda's No. 2 leader surfaced today, urging Somali Islamists to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla campaign of suicide and other forms of attacks against Ethiopian forces in Somalia, [a] news agency reported from Dubai, United Arab Emirates.

"As happened in Iraq and Afghanistan, when the world's strongest power was defeated by the campaigns of the mujahedeen troops going to heaven, so its slaves shall be defeated on the Muslim lands of Somalia," said Ayman al-Zawahri, deputy to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

"You must ambush, mine, raid and [carry out] martyrdom campaigns so that you can wipe them out," he said.

The tape was posted on a Web site used by militant Islamist groups.

The United States reportedly has played a key role behind the scenes in the recent clashes in Somalia. Analysts say this contributed to the sudden, complete routing of the Islamic Courts Union.

DOJ_NMG_0112632

"All of us in the international community were quite surprised how fast the [Islamist movement] melted away and lost support," said Miss Frazer, assistant secretary of state for Africa.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced that the U.S. government would provide an initial $16 million package of humanitarian aid to Somalia for food, relief supplies and help for refugees.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States would be open to more short- and medium-term assistance for Somalia, saying Islamist militia forces still could prove a threat to the shaky government in Mogadishu.

Miss Frazer said U.S. intelligence suspected the Islamist leaders had been hiding in Mogadishu, the Somali capital, but that they may have fled and their whereabouts were unknown.

Islamist leaders are being hunted near Somalia's border with Kenya. Kenya has closed its side of the border to stop the militias from fleeing, but said it was not blocking refugees from Somalia. However, aid agencies have complained that closing the border leaves 1.8 million Somalis without access to humanitarian assistance.

Security sources in Nairobi said intelligence from U.S. spy satellites had been passed to Ethiopian defense forces ahead of an attack Tuesday on a convoy in southern Somalia, which was said to include Islamic Courts leaders.

Four Ethiopian helicopters dropped six bombs on the position, Kenyan police said, but failed to destroy the convoy. U.S. military officials declined to comment.

Ethiopian forces helped Somalia's internationally recognized interim government drive out the Islamists from Mogadishu last week. The Islamists have vowed to carry out guerrilla attacks across Somalia and in Ethiopia.

Somali Government Seeks To Tighten Its Grip Amid Chaos (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 4 — A hand grenade was tossed into a government army compound on Thursday night in Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, in yet another sign of growing chaos in the country.

Just days after Ethiopian-led troops helped rout once powerful Islamist forces in Somalia and install a new government in the capital, security seemed to be unraveling across the country.

The violence is surging on two fronts: antigovernment attacks and increased banditry, both of which were virtually unheard of during the Islamists' short-lived reign.

Witnesses said that shortly after nightfall, a man in a pickup truck flung a grenade over a wall and into a compound that housed Ethiopian and government soldiers. Apparently, no one was seriously hurt and the pickup truck escaped in a blaze of gunfire.

In northern Mogadishu, residents said that four people were killed Wednesday night after bandits fired a bazooka at a truck whose driver refused to pay an extortion tax. Unauthorized checkpoints have popped up all over the city, reminiscent of the years of anarchy when clan-based militias carved up Mogadishu — and much of the rest of Somalia, for that matter.

In Dhagtur, in central Somalia, Shabelle radio reported Thursday that five people, including two children, were killed by a tribal militia during a gun battle. A dispute over a well was cited as the possible cause.

But despite the worsening violence, Somalia's transitional government is moving to consolidate its tenuous grip on power. On Thursday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, the veterinarian who is now prime minister, appointed more than 30 new judges, including two women.

"Quite soon, the police stations in Mogadishu will be operational," Mr. Gedi said. "If a criminal is arrested, the police will have the access to put the criminal on trial."

Since Somalia's central government collapsed in 1991, the wheels of justice have rusted over, leaving few functioning police stations, jails or courts.

Mr. Gedi also pushed ahead with his disarmament plan, extending until Saturday a deadline for turning in guns and threatening house-to-house searches if the guns were not surrendered.

In Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, the president of Uganda, Yoweri Museveni, announced Thursday that Uganda was ready to volunteer a battalion of around 800 soldiers to serve as peacekeepers in Somalia. The African Union is trying to cobble together a peacekeeping force to take the place of Ethiopian troops and lend much-needed muscle to the transitional government.

DOJ_NMG_0112633

The transitional government is still battling the last remnants of the Islamist forces, who have fled to a remote, heavily forested area in southern Somalia along the Kenyan border. Somali officials said that several hundred Islamist fighters were cornered, and that it was only a matter of days until the Islamist movement, which had ruled much of Somalia for the past six months until Ethiopian forces intervened, was finished for good.

Somalis Adapt Warily, Pragmatically To New Order In Capital (WP)

By Stephanie Mccrummen

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 4 -- Among the first things Mohamed Abtidon did when the Islamic Courts movement came to town in June was to buy a fancy cellphone, a slim $360 Motorola. Streets once ruled by thieving, bribing warlords finally felt safe, he said, and he walked around chatting with abandon.

Since the Islamic movement was swept from power last week, men draped with AK-47s have appeared once again along the sandy lanes in his neighborhood, and with them a feeling of menace, to which Abtidon has adapted almost instinctively. He put the fancy phone away and is now using an old battered one that he keeps shoved deep in his pocket.

"I switched back to the one I used when the warlords were here," he said. "And I put it on vibrate, because I don't want to let them know I have a phone."

Mogadishu is a consummately unpredictable city, a place where trust in the future is gauged by the ups and downs of the local gun market. In the past 15 years, it has experienced the fall of a dictator, brutal civil war, the rise of a coalition of warlords and the warlords' overthrow by the Islamic Courts movement. Last week, all was undone again when the Islamic fighters were run out by Ethiopian troops backing a fragile, secular government that is now racing to establish itself before the old thuggish militias return.

For ordinary Somalis caught in the flux, day-to-day life has been driven less by ideological allegiance than sheer pragmatism and constant recalibrations.

"However things are going, we just adapt to it," said Mohamed Dere, who works for a telecommunications company in the city and is also an artist. "The reality is we need peace only, however we get it. With the Islamic Courts, the practical side was they gave us peace, so that was the wager."

Like many Somalis, he protected himself with a gun when the warlords were in power, stowed it away when the Islamic Courts took over and brought it out again when the new government pushed the Islamic side out. And like many, he was uncomfortable with the social restrictions the Islamic leaders imposed. For example, they had frowned upon, though did not police, secular music and dancing. But Dere said he feels far more oppressed at the moment by insecurity.

"We are hostages right now," he said. "We have no freedom."

In one way, people here said, Mogadishu was liberated by the Islamic Courts movement, which managed to rid the city of the militias and roadblocks that had functioned like a hundred Berlin Walls. Movement was so restricted that some residents had not seen friends and relatives in years, and children living only minutes from the crashing Indian Ocean had never laid eyes on the turquoise water.

So when the Islamic movement took power in June, Bile Dirie, 36, packed up his family in a Land Cruiser on a few glorious Fridays, drove the entire length of the city's coast and swam in the ocean. He moved out of his apartment in the Baraka neighborhood of Mogadishu, the only place he had felt safe under the warlords' rule, and followed his fancy to a more expansive area called Medina, where he got a bigger house for less money.

When the Courts movement was pushed out last week, however, he feared the return of the warlords' militias and went back to his old neighborhood, an area that appears to have been disassembled and reassembled dozens of times, with its stick-and-tarp markets and loosely hinged doors, spirals of barbed wire and tangled nests of phone lines. Only herds of goats seem to roam Mogadishu freely these days, wandering the sandy streets past trees and rusted hulls of tanks.

"I don't drive around now," Dirie said, sitting in his office. "The militias are still shy, but that's fading."

DOJ_NMG_0112634

Mogadishu is a place where, quite literally, the center has not held. Since 1991 there has been no central government in the capital, whose approximate middle is a bombed-out spectacle of ruin -- crumbling Italian buildings, broken colonnades and 800-year-old mosques blasted to abstraction.

On Thursday, Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi officially opened a district court near the seaside wasteland. Around noon, workers were hauling wooden benches into a whitewashed building and dusting off its tiled floors. The Islamic movement had rehabilitated the court, which is near the city's crumbling ruins, and kicked out most of the clerks, such as Duale Mohamed, who was among those taking up their posts again. He said that less desirable things were coming back, too.

While the Islamic Courts had imposed some discipline on electricity access and prices in his neighborhood, for instance, Duale said that prices were reverting to the whims of clan leaders who "can charge you whatever they like."

Gedi reiterated on Thursday that his top priority is disarmament, but the process has gone badly, with certain warlords wondering why they should trust a government they consider dominated by rival clans, and businessmen wondering who will protect them. Gedi said the government will start forcibly taking weapons Friday.

As that deadline approached, another layer of unease settled on an uneasy city. In one market, a money-changer said he was again hiring gunmen to escort him home from work. "Most people, they are afraid there will be no security," he said.

Besides getting rid of the flashy cellphone, Mohamed Abtidon has lately replaced his gold Rolex with a cheap plastic watch to avoid being mugged by the thugs Somalis call moryan. If he takes a taxi, he said, he takes an old rusty one instead of a newer car.

When the Islamic Courts were in control, Abtidon, 26, who consults for a relief group, dressed more conservatively, tucking in his shirt, wearing a nice belt and leather loafers. These days, though, "you have to dress like them," he said, referring to the moryan. So he wears his shirt untucked.

"And I have started wearing these shoes," he said, showing his old rubber sandals.

"When the Courts left, it has become a new life," he said, in a manner more grim than enthusiastic. "Now has come a problem bigger than not being able to watch a film. Now, you could lose your life."

Somalia's Chance (WP)

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

AN UNEXPECTED turn of events in Somalia has given the Bush administration a rare opportunity to help stabilize a failed state that has been a harbor and breeding ground for al-Qaeda. In less than two weeks of fighting, troops from neighboring Ethiopia appear to have decimated the Islamic Courts movement, which had controlled most of the southern half of Somalia during the past six months. Foreign jihadists, including some al-Qaeda members, have fled the capital, while many of their Somali allies have melted back into the population. A U.N.-sanctioned transitional government has taken up residence in Mogadishu, marking the first time the country has had a recognized and unchallenged government since 1991.

The development has confounded -- at least temporarily -- the numerous Western "experts" who predicted that Ethiopia's intervention would trigger a regional war or an Iraq-style quagmire and who blamed the United States for tacitly supporting an attack on a Taliban-style regime. In fact, many Somalis seemed to welcome the end of the Islamic Courts' stringently fundamentalist rule. But no one -- least of all Western outsiders -- can predict how long the relative quiet will last. The remaining jihadists may be planning an insurgency; warlords driven out by the Islamists are said to have reappeared in Mogadishu. The transitional government, an unwieldy coalition of clan leaders, is weak, and troops sent by Ethiopia's predominately Christian government are unlikely to be tolerated long in Somalia, given longstanding animosity between the two countries.

Frequently slow or stumbling in its response to developments in Somalia, the administration appears to recognize the chance for an advance in the global war with al-Qaeda: Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi E. Frazer, who has conducted recent U.S. diplomacy, was in Ethiopia yesterday and is expected to chair an international contact group meeting today in Nairobi. U.S. and European policy is aimed at mobilizing a peacekeeping force, composed primarily of Africans, that could deploy in southern Somalia in place of Ethiopian troops and prop up the transitional government. That government would, in turn, be pushed to negotiate with Somali clans that supported the Islamic Courts.

DOJ_NMG_0112635

An immediate problem will be finding sufficient troops, funding their deployment and backing them up. Uganda has volunteered 1,000 soldiers, and Nigeria and South Africa expressed interest, but those commitments need to be firmed up and others secured. Western governments are reluctant to send their own troops to Somalia, given the disastrous end to a U.S.-led nation-building effort in the early 1990s. But the Bush administration, which by yesterday had not made any specific commitment to the mission, needs to be ready to quickly provide funding and logistical backing for an African force. If NATO airlift and supply assets can be mobilized, they should be. It may be that the prospect of stabilizing Somalia and eliminating it as a harbor for al-Qaeda will prove to be a mirage, but the administration must seize on the possibility that it is real.

Pentagon To Train A Sharper Eye On Africa (CSM)

By Richard Whittle

The Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

Africa, long beset by war, famine, disease, and ethnic tensions, has generally taken a backseat in Pentagon planning - but US officials say that is about to change.

One of Donald Rumsfeld's last acts before Robert Gates replaced him last month as Defense secretary was to urge President Bush to let the Pentagon create a new Africa Command to pay more attention to the troubled continent. Mr. Bush is said to have agreed to the idea and is expected announce it early this year.

The creation of the new command will be more than an exercise in shuffling bureaucratic boxes, experts say. The US government's motives include countering Al Qaeda's known presence in Africa, safeguarding future oil supplies, and competing with China, which has been courting African governments in its own quest for petroleum, they suggest.

The expected new command "speaks to the fact that Africa now matters to the US government as it never has in the past," says Melvin Foote, chief executive officer of Constituency for Africa, a nonprofit group devoted to strengthening US relations with African governments.

The idea of an Africa Command has been discussed for years, but Mr. Foote says it has taken on new urgency in light of recent events.

• Islamists took over Somalia last June and ruled until this week, when Ethiopian troops drove them out of power.

• China hosted a conference of African presidents in Beijing last year - and made about $5 billion in deals to build infrastructure in Africa for oil. A source of oil

The US gets about 10 percent of its oil from Africa, notes Foote. Some experts say it may need to rely on the continent for as much as 25 percent by 2010. "With all the instability in the Middle East, there's some thought that we had better build partnerships in Africa," he says.

A senior Pentagon official, who requested anonymity because announcing the decision is the president's prerogative, said current events have less to do with the move than does Africa's instability. "Africa's a place with a lot of crises," this official says. Bush is "on record saying he doesn't want another genocide on his watch. This is a way of ensuring that there's a military command, a four-star, paying attention."

Currently, responsibility for Africa is divided among three of the Pentagon's five regional "unified commands," each headed by a four-star general or admiral who reports to the president.

The European Command, responsible for Europe and Russia, oversees US defense activities for most of continental Africa. The Central Command covers largely Arab northeast Africa as part of its oversight of the Middle East and sections of Central and Southwest Asia. The Pacific Command is responsible for Madagascar and the waters off southeast Africa. Need for a 'streamlined' strategy

Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter, a Pentagon spokesman, says the division of labor "causes some difficulty in trying to ... execute a more streamlined and comprehensive strategy when it comes to Africa."

The Pentagon official who requested anonymity says the new command will exclude Egypt, a major player in Middle East politics. And Central Command will retain responsibility for the Horn of Africa for about 18 months while the Africa Command gets set up, the official says.

DOJ_NMG_0112636

After the 9/11 attacks, the Pentagon created a Horn of Africa joint task force under Central Command that is headquartered in Djibouti, but the senior official said the Africa Command's headquarters will be in Stuttgart, Germany, where the European Command is based, for the time being.

The Horn of Africa task force includes about 1,500 troops whose mission is to detect and defeat transnational terrorism, primarily through offering military training and humanitarian aid to friendly governments. Those troops constitute the bulk of the US military presence in Africa.

African countries won't see much difference in the US military presence on the ground under the new command, says Herman Cohen, assistant secretary of State for African affairs under the first President Bush. "They're already getting a lot of attention from the US military," he says. The Defense Intelligence Agency "has built up its offices throughout Africa in US embassies. Right after the cold war, they reduced a lot, but they've built back up."

The new Africa Command is "long overdue," says Susan Rice, assistant secretary of State for African affairs under President Bill Clinton. Sept. 11 "did what common sense should have done earlier, which is to elevate the understanding ... in the Pentagon of our strategic stake in Africa," she says. "Africa has the preponderance of the world's weak and failed states, and we ignore it at our peril."

No Breakthrough After Israel-Egypt Talks (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi And Steve Weizman

AP, January 5, 2007

A summit between the leaders of Israel and Egypt on Thursday fell short of its goal of igniting a new round of Mideast peace efforts, highlighting the significant disagreements between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

Speaking at a news conference after the meeting, Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak pushed Israel to hold talks with Syria and pursue peace with the Palestinians, despite the rise of the Islamic militant group Hamas. He also condemned an Israeli raid in the West Bank on Thursday that killed four Palestinian civilians and wounded 20 others.

Mubarak, a key mediator between the Palestinians and Israel, stressed that "Israel's and the region's security would be achieved only by serious endeavors toward peace."

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert apologized for civilian casualties in the raid, which began when undercover troops seized four fugitive Palestinians in a Ramallah vegetable market, sparking a ferocious gunbattle with militants.

"Things developed in a way that could not have been predicted in advance. If innocent people were hurt, this was not our intention," he said.

The summit came amid international calls for Israel and the Palestinians to make a renewed effort to end their dispute in the interest of stabilizing the Middle East, particularly Iraq. It also comes ahead of an expected Mideast visit by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this month.

Egypt is eager to broker peace between the Palestinians and Israel, and Mubarak on Thursday said he would welcome a meeting bringing together himself, Olmert, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Jordan's King Abdullah II.

"After the situation is crystalized, there is no objection for a quartet meeting," he said.

But significant obstacles are blocking a new peace process, including the continued captivity of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-linked militants in June. Egypt has been trying to broker a deal for Cpl. Gilad Shalit's release, and many in Israel were hoping for a breakthrough at the summit.

A Hamas official on Sunday claimed progress was made toward an agreement to exchange Shalit for some of the 9,100 Palestinians in Israeli prisons. A senior Hamas official in Syria, Moussa Abu Marzouk, said Thursday that his group was also ready to give Israel a video of Shalit if it agreed to release women prisoners and other detainees. He said in a phone interview that Shalit is alive.

Olmert thanked Mubarak for his efforts to secure Shalit's freedom, and said Israel was ready to meet with Abbas. However, he rejected having any dealings with Hamas, which controls the Palestinian Cabinet and calls for Israel's destruction.

"We are ready at any time to meet with Abu Mazen (Abbas) and have real negotiations and have an atmosphere for peace," Olmert said, adding that Abbas was a "partner for peace" and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal was not.

DOJ_NMG_0112637

Mubarak responded that not everyone in Egypt supported its peace agreement with Israel, but it did not stop Egypt from signing the treaty.

The Egyptian president hosted Abbas at a summit here on Dec. 27, four days after Olmert met with Abbas in a meeting intended to thaw relations between the sides. The Olmert-Mubarak meeting was expected to build on those earlier efforts, but did not appear to have achieved any major breakthroughs.

Mubarak expressed concern about the violence between Israel and the Palestinians and between rival Palestinian factions, but said they should not dampen peace efforts.

"We have to work with both sides, with the Palestinian side to reach a cease-fire among them. They must unite and solve their problems, and then we can see how to deal with the Israeli side so they can sit at the negotiating table and reach peace. It is a tough task but can't be skipped," he said.

Olmert said he expressed concerns to Mubarak about the ongoing smuggling of weapons and money from Egypt into the Gaza Strip. Israel and the West have imposed a financial embargo on the Hamas government, but top Hamas leaders have kept the government afloat by bringing suitcases stuffed with millions of dollars over the border.

Mubarak said he was doing his best to stop weapons smuggling into Gaza, but said the cash-filled suitcases were not illegal as long as they were declared.

He also urged Israel to accept Syria's offers to restart peace talks that broke down seven years ago. Olmert has rejected the offers, citing Syria's support for Hamas and the Hezbollah guerrilla group in Lebanon.

Israeli Raid Overshadows Olmert's Talks With Mubarak (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 4 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert met President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt on Thursday evening in an effort to give momentum to the Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations. But the meeting was overshadowed by an Israeli raid in the West Bank in which four Palestinians were killed and 20 wounded.

Mr. Mubarak was clearly embarrassed by the timing of the raid, hours before the meeting of the two leaders in an Egyptian Red Sea resort town, Sharm el Sheik. He called it a hindrance to peace efforts and told Mr. Olmert that Egypt "rejects and is indignant at the military operation."

"Israel's security cannot be achieved through military force but by serious endeavors toward peace," Mr. Mubarak added at his news conference with Mr. Olmert.

Mr. Olmert said that he was sorry that innocent Palestinians were hurt, but that Israel would defend itself and was acting to arrest "terrorists who had killed Israelis."

He gave no explanation for the timing of the daylight raid, a vain attempt to arrest a wanted militant, which used unusual force in normally quiet Ramallah. He said Israeli troops returned fire, but did not initiate it. "Things developed in a way that could not have been predicted in advance," he said. "If innocent people were hurt, this was not our intention."

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, with whom Mr. Olmert met last week, condemned the raid, saying in a statement that it "proved that the Israeli calls for peace and security are fake." Palestinians have been calling for an extension of a Gaza truce with Israel to the West Bank.

"The continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace," Mr. Abbas said.

Mr. Olmert and Mr. Mubarak said Egypt was continuing its efforts to secure the release of an Israeli corporal captured in June by militants, offering in exchange several hundred Palestinian prisoners held by Israel. There had been speculation that the two men might be able to announce more concrete progress on the matter, which is blocking more substantive discussions with Mr. Abbas.

Egyptian officials said that they were discussing another Olmert-Abbas meeting with Egyptian and Jordanian leaders present. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to visit the region this month.

It was an unusual and emotional day for Mr. Olmert, during which he commemorated two legendary Israeli political figures, both of whom he succeeded in their jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0112638

Earlier, in Jerusalem, he spoke at the state funeral for the city's fabled former mayor, Teddy Kollek, who died Tuesday at 95 and was buried in the area of the Mount Herzl cemetery reserved for Israel's leaders.

Mr. Olmert defeated Mr. Kollek to become Jerusalem's mayor in a bitter political fight in 1993. He said Israel's first leader, David Ben-Gurion, had declared Jerusalem to be Israel's capital in 1949, but "Teddy Kollek made it so."

Thursday also marked a year since Prime Minister Ariel Sharon suffered a second extensive stroke, which left him in a deep coma from which he is not expected to awaken. Mr. Olmert, Mr. Sharon's deputy, was chosen to lead the Kadima Party in his stead and became prime minister, and he acknowledged Mr. Sharon's tragedy at his news conference in Egypt.

In general, Mr. Olmert has been regarded as inferior to Mr. Sharon and Mr. Kollek. In the latest opinion poll, conducted by the Dahaf Institute and reported Thursday in the newspaper Yediot Aharanot, nearly 70 percent of Israelis polled said they disapproved of Mr. Olmert's performance as prime minister. Israelis are unhappy with the way he managed the summer's war against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and do not much like his personality, contrasting him with the more stolid and experienced Mr. Sharon.

Still, Mr. Olmert has proved himself a skilled politician, and early on Thursday Parliament quietly passed his $68 billion budget, a crucial test of his government's ability to survive. The budget battle was always a great drama under Mr. Sharon, but Mr. Olmert, who has expanded his governing coalition to include parties ranging from Labor to the right-wing Israel Beiteinu Party of Avigdor Lieberman, had little difficulty.

Mr. Olmert's office is being rocked, though, by a new corruption scandal. He has not been touched by this scandal, though he has been under investigation for smaller cases of improper use of influence.

But his longtime office director, Shula Zaken, has been put under house arrest and ordered not to contact Mr. Olmert as the police investigate whether she and the director of the Tax Authority, Jackie Matza, tried to help Ms. Zaken's brother and two other businesspeople through the appointment of cronies to key jobs in return for tax breaks.

About 30 people are under some form of detention in the spreading scandal.

The operation in Ramallah by Israeli forces, with armored vehicles, bulldozers and helicopter support, was carried out hours before Mr. Olmert met with Mr. Mubarak.

Palestinians and news reports said the operation was to arrest Rabiah Hamad of Fatah, a senior member of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades. The army would not confirm that Mr. Hamad was the target, but said the man it wanted was armed and was wounded, but escaped. The army arrested four other wanted Palestinians, a spokesman said.

It was a rare incursion into the heart of Ramallah, and it prompted an angry response. Youths on rooftops threw stones, metal trash barrels, a refrigerator and blocks of concrete at the Israeli Army vehicles. There were mortars fired at the Israeli soldiers, and an exchange of gunfire.

Palestinian medics said four men — Yussef Abdel Khader, 23; Khalil al-Badawi, 20; Jamal Jawela, 29; and Ala al-Himran, in his 20s — died at a Ramallah hospital from gunshot wounds.

In Gaza there was continuing violence, with three more men killed in fighting between Fatah and Hamas. The fighting centered around the Jabaliya refugee camp in northern Gaza after gunmen surrounded the houses of known political or security figures.

In Beit Lahiya, a senior Fatah commander, Col. Muhammad Gharib, was killed and his wife severely wounded when Hamas militants attacked his home with rifle fire and rocket-propelled grenades. Two of his bodyguards were also killed. About 25 others were wounded in Jabaliya, and local radio was filled with appeals to the gunmen to restore calm.

On Wednesday five Palestinians, including a woman who was a passer-by, were killed and 12 wounded in Fatah-Hamas gun battles, which broke a weeklong lull. Other militant factions arranged a truce overnight and kidnapped members of Hamas and Fatah were released by the other sides, but the truce broke down on Thursday.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, returned to Gaza on Thursday from hajj, his pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia. His entourage underwent a special inspection in El Arish, Egypt, to ensure that he was not carrying large amounts of cash back to Gaza, which has been deprived of most Western aid since Hamas won parliamentary elections last January.

[Early Friday, Mr. Haniya said he and Mr. Abbas had agreed at emergency talks to keep gunmen from their parties off Gaza's streets.]

DOJ_NMG_0112639

For the fourth day there was no word about a kidnapped Peruvian photographer for Agence France-Presse, Jaime Rázuri, 50, who is said by colleagues to be lacking a required heart medication.

Palestinian security services have warned foreign journalists to keep out of Gaza for now, because of the kidnappings and chaos.

A leader of the Palestinian People's Party, Bassam al-Salhi, said the security chaos could be resolved only with political agreement. "The weakness of the Palestinian political system and the situation of the current Hamas-led government have contributed to this state of lawlessness," he said.

Israeli Arrest Raid In West Bank Kills 4 Palestinians (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 4 -- Israeli troops pushed into Ramallah on Thursday in a rare daylight arrest operation, killing four Palestinians and wounding more than 20 others during heavy fighting in the city's streets. In the Gaza Strip, factional violence between the Hamas and Fatah movements left at least six people dead.

The Ramallah raid, the largest in the West Bank city in nearly two years, occurred as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak met at a Sinai resort to discuss ways to reduce the factional tensions and revive the dormant Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

In a written statement after the operation, which took place blocks from his official compound, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said it showed that "Israeli calls for peace and security are fake."

"The continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace," Abbas said, calling on foreign governments to pressure Israel to stop such operations.

In recent weeks, Olmert has pledged to strengthen the political standing of Abbas, a relative moderate and a leader of Fatah, as he confronts the radical Islamic movement Hamas, which has day-to-day control of the Palestinian government.

Hamas has rejected Abbas's calls to recognize Israel and renounce violence in return for a resumption of foreign aid, which was cut off following its election victory almost a year ago. Abbas's announcement last month that he intends to call early general elections to resolve the crisis has brought a fresh surge of partisan fighting.

In meeting with Abbas less than two weeks ago, Olmert promised to release $100 million in frozen tax revenue that Israel collects on the Palestinians' behalf and to lift a number of military checkpoints in the West Bank. The gestures were meant to be a vote of confidence in Abbas, but Israeli and Palestinian officials say neither pledge has been fulfilled.

The Ramallah operation occurred in a busy commercial district festooned with Christmas lights and left behind damaged cars and streets strewn with stones and debris. Such operations are commonly carried out at night, but Israeli forces moved into a downtown building in the late afternoon.

Soldiers found the man they intended to arrest armed with a handgun, military officials said, and fired on him as he fled. Israeli officials declined to identify the man because he was still at large, having escaped into streets that filled quickly with demonstrators.

But Palestinian witnesses identified the target as Rabiah Hamad, a leader of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Fatah's armed wing. He was later treated for wounds in a Ramallah hospital.

Israeli military officials said the forces came under heavy fire during the operation. The troops arrested four gunmen, who Palestinian witnesses said also belonged to the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades.

Palestinian witnesses and hospital officials said at least three of the men killed were civilians. The status of the fourth remained unclear.

"I am sorry if innocent people were hurt today in Ramallah," Olmert said at a news conference with Mubarak, who moments earlier had expressed his "dissatisfaction" with the raid. Olmert added: "One should remember that Israel has to operate against terrorists who operate against innocent Israelis. The operation today was to arrest a wanted man who hurt Israelis."

DOJ_NMG_0112640

A second day of partisan fighting in Gaza began when a car carrying members of the Executive Force, a Palestinian security service controlled by the Hamas-run Interior Ministry, came under fire in the city of Beit Lahiya. One Hamas member died in the ambush, and two others were badly wounded.

After nightfall, the Executive Force surrounded the Beit Lahiya home of a senior officer of the Preventive Security Service, a Fatah-controlled branch. The gunmen said the house had been used in the earlier ambush.

Shots rang out as the Executive Force took up positions, and protesters arrived to prevent an attack on the house.

Soon after, the Executive Force opened fire on the house with rifles and rocket-propelled grenades. Fatah officials said the officer, Col. Mohammed Ghrayeb, was killed in the shooting.

The Associated Press reported later that, in addition to Ghrayeb, four of his guards and a Hamas gunman were killed in the confrontation and about three dozen people, including eight children, were wounded.

10 Palestinians Killed In Raid, Clashes (AP)

By Karin Laub

AP, January 5, 2007

Israeli undercover troops burst into a West Bank vegetable market Thursday, seizing four fugitives and exchanging heavy fire with Palestinians in the first major raid since the Israeli and Palestinian leaders agreed to try to ease tensions.

Factional fighting among Palestinian groups also surged, leaving at least six dead and prompting a meeting early Friday between rival leaders — President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas. Haniyeh said the two sides agreed to pull back their forces.

The agreement came hours after six Palestinians, including a senior security officer, were killed and more than a dozen wounded in fighting in Gaza between gunmen loyal to Hamas and those allied with Fatah.

In the Ramallah raid, four Palestinians, all civilians, were killed and 20 wounded. Abbas said in a harshly worded statement that Israel's peace promises rang hollow in light of the raid and demanded $5 million in compensation for the damage to shops and cars in Ramallah.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak just after the Ramallah raid, apologized for any civilian casualties, but said the operation was intended to protect Israel from terrorist attacks.

"Things developed in a way that could not have been predicted in advance. If innocent people were hurt, this was not our intention," he said.

The summit had been intended to push for new Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts, but was overshadowed by the violence.

Standing next to Olmert in the Red Sea resort of Sharm El-Sheik, Mubarak condemned the raid in Ramallah. "Israel's security cannot be achieved through military force but by serious endeavors toward peace," he said.

In Washington, a senior European Union diplomat said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East this month to try to promote peacemaking.

"We will try to see how we can give a push to the peace process," said Javier Solana, who met with Rice on Thursday.

The Israeli raid, which turned downtown Ramallah into a battlefield with dozens of cars smashed and vegetable carts overturned, further undercut Abbas at a time when he is locked in an increasingly violent power struggle with the Islamic militant Hamas.

Abbas said Israel's assurances that it is striving for peace and security cannot be believed. "The continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace," his statement said.

In the northern Gaza Strip, a senior Palestinian security officer allied with Fatah was killed when Hamas militants laid siege to his house, engaging in a protracted gunbattle with his guards and then attacking it with grenades and a dozen rockets, Palestinian officials and witnesses said.

The officer, Col. Mohammed Ghayeb, was the chief of the Preventive Security Service in northern Gaza, and his death was expected to trigger revenge attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0112641

Moments before his death, Ghayeb was on the telephone to Palestine TV appealing for help as his house in Beit Lahiya came under attack. "They are killers," he said of the Hamas gunmen. "They are targeting the house, children are dying, they are bleeding. For God's sake, send an ambulance, we want an ambulance, somebody move."

The battle outside the house raged for much of the day and killed four of Ghayeb's guards and a Hamas gunman. About three dozen people, including eight children, were wounded.

Hours later, Abbas of Fatah and Haniyeh of Hamas met in Gaza and agreed to work to defuse the tensions and recall their gunmen, Haniyeh told reporters. "We are going to end all armed displays in the streets," he said. Abbas had no comment.

It wasn't immediately clear if the truce, the latest of several, would hold.

During the standoff outside Ghayeb's home, dozens of women rushed into the streets in protest, chanting "Spare the bullets, shame, shame."

One resident, Amina Abu Saher, told Al Quds radio that it was difficult for her to see Palestinians battle each other and she and the other women were determined to stop the internal fighting.

The factional fighting is a result of the political deadlock between Hamas, which controls the Cabinet, and Abbas, who was elected separately and wields considerable power. Talks on power-sharing between Hamas and Fatah have failed, and truce attempts have repeatedly collapsed.

In several places in the West Bank late Thursday, Fatah militants attacked Hamas offices and vehicles. One Hamas activist was wounded, Palestinian security officials said.

The Israeli army raid in Ramallah took the Palestinians by surprise.

It began when troops tried to arrest fugitives from the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a violent Fatah offshoot, in the vegetable market. A gunbattle erupted, and Israeli forces sent reinforcements, including armored personnel carriers, bulldozers, jeeps and an attack helicopter.

For about two hours, a heavy battle raged, sending residents scrambling for cover. Bursts of gunfire, loud booms and ambulance sirens could be heard across Ramallah. At one point, a helicopter fired large-caliber bullets.

The apparent target of the raid, Rabih Hamed, was seriously injured. A photographer for the local news agency Maan was critically wounded by a gunshot to the head.

Meanwhile, Israeli TV and Channel 2 television reported that Olmert had decided to remove his defense minister, Amir Peretz, citing sources in the prime minister's office. Olmert's office, however, denied the reports.

Peretz, who has a limited security background has come under fire, along with Olmert, because of the inconclusive results of last summer's war with Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon.

Treasury Steps Up Pressure On Syria (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, January 5, 2007

The Bush administration, intensifying pressure on Damascus, moved Thursday to financially clamp down on three Syrian institutions suspected of helping spread weapons of mass destruction.

The Treasury Department's action means that any bank accounts or financial assets belonging to the three entities found in the United States would be frozen. Americans also are prohibited from doing business with them.

The three entities targeted are the Higher Institute of Applied Science and Technology, the Electronics Institute and the National Standards and Calibration Laboratory.

"Syria is using official government organizations to develop nonconventional weapons and the missiles to deliver them," Stuart Levey, Treasury's under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said in explaining the United States' action.

The department has the power to take the financial-blocking action under an executive order issued by President Bush in June 2005.

The three entities acted against Thursday are "subordinates" of the Scientific Studies and Research Center, the Syrian government agency responsible for developing and producing non-conventional weapons and the missiles to deliver them, the department said.

DOJ_NMG_0112642

The government ordered U.S. banks to freeze the center's assets in 2005. The Treasury Department said that although the center promotes its civilian research function, its "activities focus substantively on the development of biological and chemical weapons."

The department alleged that the Electronics Institute is responsible for missile-related research and development. It described the Higher Institute of Applied Science and Technology as educational institution that provides training to engineers of the Scientific Studies and Research Center. The government didn't provide details on the National Standards and Calibration Laboratory but said that South Korea and Japan have identified the lab as a "proliferation concern."

The United States' relationship with Damascus has been strained for several years.

Last month, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group urged the Bush administration to have serious talks with Syria and with Iran as part of a new Iraq strategy. But the U.S. has been reluctance to seek help from Syria on Iraq until the Syrians curb their support to radical Palestinian groups and to the Lebanese Hezbollah.

Bush Looking At Global Warming Ideas (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 5, 2007

President Bush and German Chancellor Angela Merkel pledged closer cooperation on combatting global warming and in trying to prod a Middle East peace on Thursday, brushing aside lingering differences between the two countries.

Bush said at a joint White House news conference that he was open to new ideas to confront climate change, although he stopped short of some of the tight environmental standards favored by Germany and other European nations.

"We talked about climate change, and I assured the chancellor I'm committed to promoting new technologies that will promote energy efficiency and do a better job protecting the environment," Bush said. "I believe there is a chance now to put behind us the old stale debates of the past."

It was a reference to past differences between Bush and European allies on the Kyoto accords, an international agreement to reduce pollution that causes global warming. It has not been ratified by the United States.

For her part, Merkel said, "I was delighted to hear that there is a readiness there."

"We will continue to have our experts work on it," she added. "On the one hand, we obviously need economic growth, but on the other hand, a reduction, also of greenhouse gases."

Bush praised Merkel for her efforts to put the so-called quartet_ the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — at the center of a revived Israeli-Palestinian peace effort.

"Madame Chancellor had a good idea to convene the quartet," Bush said. He said that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would soon be going to the region to try to revive the process.

"We're strongly committed to a two-state solution. Two democracies supporting each other's rights to exist," Bush said. He said, however, that he was unwilling to expand the quartet.

The two leaders conferred on issues ranging from war and energy problems to the economy, trade and dealing with the conflict in Sudan's Darfur region.

Merkel's visit came just days after Germany assumed the presidency of the 27-nation European Union and the Group of Eight major industrialized democracies.

With British Prime Minister Tony Blair expected to step down this year, Merkel is emerging as Bush's top ally in Europe.

Being seen to have friendly relations with Bush carries some risks for Merkel, given the president's unpopularity in Europe. But she minimizes them by publicly raising points of difference such as her stance that the prison camp at Guantanamo should be shut down — although she did not raise the issue, at least publicly, on Thursday.

Bush and Merkel barbecued a wild boar together when Bush visited her home parliamentary district last July.

"Laura and I are looking forward to feeding you dinner. I'm not so sure it's going to be as good a dinner as the barbecue you fed us," Bush said.

He also made a lighthearted reference to an impromptu back rub that he gave Merkel at an international forum last year. His rubbing of the back of her neck and shoulders was captured on camera, as was her look of surprise and a grimace.

DOJ_NMG_0112643

As the two ended Thursday's news conference and headed for dinner, Bush said softly, "No backrub."

Bush Makes Light Of Earlier Gaffe (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

President Bush has adopted a hands-off policy with German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

"No back rubs," a smiling Bush declared Thursday while posing for photos with Merkel at the White House. She seemed to agree.

Bush was making light of his own gaffe at a summit of G-8 industrial nations last year. At the time, he gave an impromptu rub of Merkel's neck and shoulders. The chancellor hunched her shoulders in surprise, threw her arms up and grimaced, though she appeared to smile as Bush walked away.

A quick video image of the touchy moment quickly became one of the most popular clips on the Internet.

Bush made the joking reference to it after a private meeting and a short news conference with Merkel.

New Mexico Governor Heads To Sudan On Diplomatic Mission (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP)--New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said Thursday he is heading to Sudan on a diplomatic trip that would add to his extensive international experience as he prepares to announce whether he will run for president.

Richardson will try to meet with Sudanese officials and persuade them to accept a peacekeeping force in the war-torn Darfur region, according to a statement from his office.

He is to arrive Sunday after traveling overnight and plans to travel to Darfur.

Sudan's president, Omar al-Bashir, has rejected a U.N. Security Council resolution that provides for bolstering the poorly funded and equipped 7,000-troop African Union force to about 22,000 peacekeepers under U.N. leadership. The nonprofit Save Darfur Coalition requested Richardson's help because of his long relationship with Bashir and is paying for the trip.

Richardson, a Democrat who was U.N. ambassador and energy secretary in the Clinton administration, would have one of the most impressive foreign policy resumes if he decides to run for president.

As a member of Congress in the 1980s and 1990s, Richardson was a special envoy on several international missions and won the release of Americans held in North Korea, Iraq, Cuba and Sudan.

Since being elected governor in 2002, Richardson has not stopped his international work. He has traveled repeatedly to North Korea, meeting last month with North Korean officials in Santa Fe, N.M., to discuss the communist country's nuclear future.

In September, he traveled to Sudan and successfully negotiated with Bashir for the release of a captured U.S. journalist who had been held for more than a month on espionage charges.

For nearly four years, Sudanese troops and the Arab janjaweed have been fighting Darfur's ethnic African rebels, who revolted against what they saw as decades of neglect and discrimination by the Khartoum government.

U.N. and African Union officials have accused the government of arming the janjaweed and coordinating attacks with them - a charge Khartoum denies. More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million driven from their homes.

Richardson also will push for a cease-fire, his office said.

Richardson coordinated his trip with Andrew Natsios, the Bush administration's special envoy to Sudan, according to the governor's office. Natsios did not respond to an interview request sent to the State Department.

Police Uncover Explosives In Spain's Basque Region (WP/AP)

By Mar Roman

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 4 -- Police found a large explosive device in the Basque region Thursday, five days after a car bombing in Madrid that was blamed on the separatist group ETA shattered a nine-month cease-fire.

The discovery came as Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero visited the wreckage of Saturday's car bombing and vowed that Spain would not be intimidated. The blast in the parking lot of Madrid's international airport killed one man, left another missing and feared dead and wounded at least 26 people.

DOJ_NMG_0112644

"It will achieve nothing. It is not going to intimidate anyone," Zapatero told reporters.

Outside the Basque town of Amorebieta, nearly 220 pounds of explosives were found in a drum near an abandoned car, and they had been rigged to be used in an attack, Basque police said. Bomb disposal experts removed the device from the site to dismantle it.

Zapatero said Saturday's attack made him more determined to end ETA's nearly four-decade-long campaign of violence, aimed at achieving an independent Basque homeland. But he announced no new strategy or even a hint of his next move.

The attack was a political setback for Zapatero, who made ETA's dissolution a centerpiece of his political agenda. When he announced in June that he would negotiate with the group, he infuriated conservatives who opposed talks with what they consider an active terrorist organization.

The blast killed a 35-year-old Ecuadoran immigrant. Rescuers were still looking for the missing man, also Ecuadoran, but held out little hope of finding him alive. The death marked the first fatality in an attack blamed on ETA in more than three years.

In a rare gesture Thursday, the outlawed group Batasuna, widely seen as ETA's political wing, expressed its "deepest sorrow" for the death of the Ecuadoran immigrant.

The blast shattered a cease-fire that ETA declared in March and said was permanent. Zapatero's government canceled plans for negotiating a settlement with Europe's last armed political militancy.

ETA and its political supporters have complained in recent months that the peace process was faltering because the government refused to make preliminary concessions. Those included moving ETA prisoners from jails across Spain to the Basque region and halting police arrests and trials of ETA suspects and pro-independence politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0112645

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

W Pushes Envelope On U.S. Spying (NYDN) ... 4
Bush Administration Defends Emergency Mail Inspection (USAT) ... 4
White House Denies Switch In Mail Policy (NYT) ... 5
Bush Warned About Mail-Opening Authority (WP) ... 6
Bush: Mail Subject To Warrantless Searches (CBS) ... 7
A Terror Detainee Longs For Court (NYT) ... 8
Defense Rests After Hearing From Torture Expert At Hamas Trial In U.S. (AP) ... 10
Grocer Pleads Guilty To Misleading Federal Agents (NSDY/AP) 11

Homeland Response:

Court To Consider Conflicting Portraits Of Would-be Subway Bomber (AP) ... 12
Ill. Man Indicted In Hand Grenade Case (AP) ... 12
Federal Grand Jury Indicts Shareef (RRS) ... 13
Democrats Set Homeland Security Changes (AP) ... 13
4 Cities Cut, 4 Added For Terror Grants (AP) ... 14
Inside The Ring (WT) ... 14

War News:

Bush Will Seek Aid, Jobs Funds To Bolster Iraq (WSJ) ... 16
Bush Talks To Al-Maliki, Set To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT) 17
Bush Making Changes In His Iraq Team (WP) ... 18
Why America Should Operate From Iraq's Borders (FT) ... 19
The Hanging: Beyond Travesty (WP) ... 20
Dynamic Ideas For Iraq (WSJ) ... 21
New Congress Leery Of Bush's Iraq Plans (LAT) ... 22
McCain Reaffirms Support For US Troop 'Surge' In Iraq (AFP) .. 24
Short-Circuiting The Surge (WP) ... 24
Jubilant Democrats Assume Control On Capitol Hill (NYT) ... 25
House Dems Lead Quick Action On Ethics Pelosi Assumes Speaker's Post Amid Pledges Of Bipartisanship (AJC) ... 26
New Congress, Old Fights; Choosing Teams For 2008 (WSJ) ... 27
War Foes Set Sights On New Majority (WT) ... 28
White House Postponing Loss Of Iraq, Biden Says (WP) ... 29
Shays Says More Troops In Iraq Is A 'Huge Mistake' (HARTC) . 29
Bush Shaking Up Team Responsible For Carrying Out Iraq Strategies (USAT/AP) ... 30
Bush To Make Changes In Key National Security Jobs (MCT) ... 31
Bush To Name A New General To Oversee Iraq (NYT) ... 32
Bush To Reveal New Commanders, War Strategy Next Week (LAT) ... 34
Concern As Spy Chief Quits To Join Rice (FT) ... 35
Bush Is Expected To Shift U.S. Ambassador In Iraq To U.N. (NYT) ... 36
Negroponte Moves To Job Considered Crucial At State Dept. (WP) ... 37
Negroponte To State? You Heard It Here First. (WP) ... 38
Speculation Surrounds Choice By Spy Chief To Take Step Back (NYT) ... 39
Negroponte Shift Is Ruffling Feathers (LAT) ... 41
Negroponte To Shift To No. 2 Diplomat (WT) ... 42
Bush To Nominate Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP) ... 43
Mr. Negroponte's Newest Job (NYT) ... 43
A Small Change (LAT) ... 44
Bush To Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy (AP) ... 44
Pentagon Link To Spy Chief Pick Arouses Concern (WSJ) ... 45
Nominee Played Big Role In Outsourcing Intelligence (USAT) ... 46
John Michael McConnell, A Member Of The Club (NYT) ... 47
Bush Says Hussein 'Was Given Justice' (LAT) ... 48
Lawmakers Criticize Video Of Hussein's Final Minutes (NYT) ... 49
2 Guards Arrested For Hussein Video, Official Says (WP) ... 49
U.S.-Iraqi Forces Launch Assault On Sunni Haven (LAT) ... 50
Bombs Kill 13 In Baghdad After Brief Lull In Violence (USAT/AP) 51
Deadly Blasts In Baghdad Leave Gruesome Traces (NYT) ... 52
13 Killed In Baghdad Bombings (WT/AP) ... 53
Arrested Iranians 'Were Trying To Influence Iraqi Government': BBC (AFP) ... 54
Denying The Facts, Finding The Truth (NYT) ... 54
If Iraq Fragments, What's Plan B? (CSM) ... 55
A Mother Fights For A Soldier Who Said No To War (WP) ... 57
Theft Probe Leads To N.Va. Storage Site (WP) ... 58
Taliban Leader Promises More Afghan War (NYT) ... 59
Taliban Leader's Powerful Vanishing Act (LAT) ... 60
Pakistan Premier Wants Afghan Refugees To Return Home (NYT) ... 62
Medical Teams Saving More Troops (WT) ... 62
The Battle Of Iraq's Wounded (LAT) ... 63

DOJ:

J.Lo Honored By People En Espanol (AP) ... 64
Hopi Recommended For US Attorney Post (AZREP) ... 65
Low-profile Demeanor In A High-profile Job (MDGAZ) ... 65

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutors End Case In Long AOL Fraud Trial (WP)..... 67
Gadflies Get Respect, And Not Just At Home Depot (NYT) 68
Nardelli's 'Severance' (WSJ)..... 70
One Bad Apple (WP) 71

Criminal Law:

Prosecutors Cite More Favors By Lawmaker (WP)..... 71
Ex Mass. House Speaker Indicted (AP) 72
Finneran Faces Loss Of State Pension (BOS)..... 72
Get Out Of Jail - But Not For Free: Finneran Deal May KO Job, Pension, Law Career (BOSH) 73
Former State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (AP)... 74
Ad Man Sentenced For Pay-to-play (PHI) 75
Exec In Pay-to-play Scam Gets Probation (PHI)..... 75
Judge Rejects Herrera Delay (LVRJ) 76
Convicted Commissioner In Las Vegas Can't Delay Prison Date (AP)..... 76
Kopp Jurors Questioned On Abortion (NSDY/AP) 76
Nab 23 In Mortgage Con (NYDN)..... 77
FEDS NAB BROKERS IN FRAUD SCHEME (NYPOST)..... 77
Feds: We Have Scammers Behind Millions In Fraudulent Loans (WNBC)..... 78
Former Benton County Defense Lawyer Enters Plea In Bribery Case (AP) 78
Ex-health Care Company President Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud (AP) 78
Former Jackson County Executive Charged In Mortgage Fraud Case (AP) 79
U.S. Death Sentences Drop To 30-year Low (AP)..... 79
Rethinking The Death Penalty (NYT) 80
No Whitey After All These Years (BOSH)..... 81
Hunt For Whitey Bulger Still Targeting Hub Kin (BOS) 81
Embezzlement Is Found In Catholic Dioceses (NYT) 82
Remain Silent? Some In Custody Spell It All Out (NYT) 84

Civil Law:

Fat Chance (WP) 85
Diet Pill Sellers Fined $25M (USAT)..... 86
Eli Lilly Settles More Zyprexa Lawsuits (WP/AP) 87

Civil Rights:

U.S. Justice Department Won't Investigate Portsmouth Jail Death (VAPILOT)..... 87
Dismissal Of Boys Town Suit Eyed (WT) 88

Antitrust:

Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Nets $105 Million (LAW)..... 89
Visa, MasterCard Settle With Government (WSJ)..... 89
Brussels Raises Heat On Energy Companies (FT)..... 90
S Korea Watchdog Probes Qualcomm (FT)..... 90
South Korea Regulator Probes Qualcomm (AP)..... 91
Issues Of Power, Prestige Doom Law Firm Merger (WSJ)..... 91
2 Law Firms Call Off Plans For A Merger (NYT) 93
LSE Holder Raises Its Stake (WSJ) 94

Environment:

Parks Agency Leaves Controversial Book On Shelf (NYT)..... 94
A Revitalized Chesapeake May Be Decades Away (WP)..... 95

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Rehnquist Drug Dependency Detailed (AP) 96
Sedative Withdrawal Made Rehnquist Delusional In '81 (WP).... 98
Torture Case Defendant Loses 1st Legal Fight (SPT) 99
Five Men Indicted On Drug Charges (BSUN)..... 100
Feds Will Help County Go After Gang Members (PALMBEACHP)..... 100
Colombia Extradites 2 Police Officers (AP) 101
Colombia Extradites Policemen To U.S. (WT) 101
Colombia Extradites Two Police Officers To US On Drug Smuggling Charges (VOA) 102

Immigration:

Wisconsin Man, 81, Ordered Deported; Was SS Guard (AP)... 102

Tax:

Suit Says Couple Cost U.S. Treasury Millions (JSO)..... 103

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Take Control Of Congress (AP) 103
Democrats Elect First Female Speaker, Pass Lobbying Reforms (MCT)..... 104
Nancy Pelosi Basks In Historic Day (AP) 106
Civility, Synergy Top Order In Senate (WT) 107
Reid Takes Center Stage, But He's Hardly The Star Of The Show (WP)..... 108
Smiles, Backslaps, Even A Civility Meeting: For A Day, At Least, Bipartisanship Reigns (NYT) 109
Jubilant Democrats Take The Wheel On Capitol Hill (LAT) 110
Democrats Take Control Of Congress (CHIT)..... 111
Speaker Pelosi's Ethics (WSJ) 112
Republicans Take Back-to-Basics Tack (WP)..... 113
Bush Practices A Reach Across The Aisle (LAT)..... 114
Democrats To 'issue Toughest Ethics Reform' (FT)..... 116
Senate Feels Heat As House Cranks Up Ethics Overhaul (NYT)117
Democrats Take Control On Hill (WP)..... 118
Pelosi Sets Aggressive Pace (WSJ)..... 120
For Democrats, A Choice: Forward Or Reverse? (NYT)..... 121
After The 100 Hours, A War Awaits (WP) 122
Tax Cuts And The Minimum Wage (NYT)..... 123
House Warming (WP)..... 123
Women Bask In New Speaker's Shining Moment (WP)..... 124
Congress Reopens Under New Management (USAT)..... 125
Joyful Democrats Salute Speaker Pelosi (WT) 126
Forgive The Cynicism, But This Is Change? (WP)..... 127
In New Senate, The 'Candy Desk' Gets A Kiss-Off (WSJ)..... 128
Miers Resigns As White House Counsel (AP)..... 129
Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up For Battle (WP) 130
Miers Steps Down As White House Counsel (NYT)..... 132
The Reliable Source (WP) 132
First, Do Less Harm (NYT) 133
Medicare Drug Plan's 2nd Year Less Bumpy (USAT)..... 134
First Muslim Lawmaker Takes Oath With Quran (USAT)..... 135

DOJ_NMG_0112647

Ellison Uses Thomas Jefferson's Quran (AP) 135
1st Muslim Elected To Congress Takes Office (MCT) 136
Jefferson's Koran Used In Ceremony (WT)..... 136
Administrator Is Dismissed From Nuclear Security Post (NYT) 137
After Breaches, Head Of U.S. Nuclear Program Is Ousted (WP)138
Nuclear Weapons Administrator Ousted (LAT) 139
Nuclear Agency Head Dismissed For Lapses (AP)..... 139
Agencies Bid Farewell To Retiring "Elders" (WP)..... 140
Good Times Or Good Governance (WP) 142
Lagging Judicial Pay (NYT) 142
Tax As You Go (WSJ)..... 143

Other News:

Warm Weather Weighs On Price Of Oil (USAT)..... 144
Energy, Mining Firms Take Hit (WSJ) 144
The First Energy President (NYT)..... 145
Rise In Ethanol Raises Concerns About Corn As A Food (NYT)146
New Prospect For US: Glut Of Ethanol Plants (CSM)..... 147
Data Indicate Growth Softened During December (WSJ)..... 148
Holiday Sales Look Happier Than Expected (USAT)..... 149
Holiday-Sales Figures Leave Big Gaps (WSJ)..... 149
Markets Finish Higher Despite Unease (USAT/AP) 151
Rates On 30-Year Mortgages Unchanged (AP)..... 151
Pending Sales Of Existing Homes In U.S. Fell 0.5% (Update1) (BLOOM)..... 152
Court Weighs Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors (USAT)..... 153
First Black Governor Of Mass. Sworn In (AP) 153
Massachusetts Swears In A Black Democrat As Governor (NYT)155
Four Stars Lead Early GOP Race (CSM)..... 156
Inside Politics (WT) 157
The Anti-Clinton (TIME) 158
Bill Clinton Turns Heads In The Senate (MACT)..... 159
Challengers Join Hands To Unseat Texas Speaker (WT) 160
Virginia's Moment Of Clarity (WP) 161
Rice Announces $16M In Aid For Somalia (AP)..... 161
Troops Fight Militiamen In The South (WP/AP)..... 161
US Helps Contain Somalia's Islamist Forces (FT) 162
U.S. Ships Hunt For Al Qaeda Off Somalia (WT/LDT)..... 162
Somali Government Seeks To Tighten Its Grip Amid Chaos (NYT) 163
Somalis Adapt Warily, Pragmatically To New Order In Capital (WP)..... 164
Somalia's Chance (WP)..... 165
Pentagon To Train A Sharper Eye On Africa (CSM)..... 166
No Breakthrough After Israel-Egypt Talks (AP)..... 167
Israeli Raid Overshadows Olmert's Talks With Mubarak (NYT) 168
Israeli Arrest Raid In West Bank Kills 4 Palestinians (WP) 169
10 Palestinians Killed In Raid, Clashes (AP) 170
Treasury Steps Up Pressure On Syria (AP)..... 171
Bush Looking At Global Warming Ideas (AP)..... 172
Bush Makes Light Of Earlier Gaffe (AP)..... 173
New Mexico Governor Heads To Sudan On Diplomatic Mission (AP)..... 173
Police Uncover Explosives In Spain's Basque Region (WP/AP)173

DOJ_NMG_0112648

TERRORISM NEWS:

W Pushes Envelope On U.S. Spying (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek

New York Daily News, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush has quietly claimed sweeping new powers to open Americans' mail without a judge's warrant, the Daily News has learned.

The President asserted his new authority when he signed a postal reform bill into law on Dec. 20. Bush then issued a "signing statement" that declared his right to open people's mail under emergency conditions.

That claim is contrary to existing law and contradicted the bill he had just signed, say experts who have reviewed it.

Bush's move came during the winter congressional recess and a year after his secret domestic electronic eavesdropping program was first revealed. It caught Capitol Hill by surprise.

"Despite the President's statement that he may be able to circumvent a basic privacy protection, the new postal law continues to prohibit the government from snooping into people's mail without a warrant," said Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), the incoming House Government Reform Committee chairman, who co-sponsored the bill.

Experts said the new powers could be easily abused and used to vacuum up large amounts of mail.

"The [Bush] signing statement claims authority to open domestic mail without a warrant, and that would be new and quite alarming," said Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies in Washington.

"The danger is they're reading Americans' mail," she said.

"You have to be concerned," agreed a career senior U.S. official who reviewed the legal underpinnings of Bush's claim. "It takes Executive Branch authority beyond anything we've ever known."

A top Senate Intelligence Committee aide promised, "It's something we're going to look into."

Most of the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act deals with mundane reform measures. But it also explicitly reinforced protections of first-class mail from searches without a court's approval.

Yet in his statement Bush said he will "construe" an exception, "which provides for opening of an item of a class of mail otherwise sealed against inspection in a manner consistent ... with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances."

Bush cited as examples the need to "protect human life and safety against hazardous materials and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore denied Bush was claiming any new authority.

"In certain circumstances - such as with the proverbial 'ticking bomb' - the Constitution does not require warrants for reasonable searches," she said.

Bush, however, cited "exigent circumstances" which could refer to an imminent danger or a longstanding state of emergency.

Critics point out the administration could quickly get a warrant from a criminal court or a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court judge to search targeted mail, and the Postal Service could block delivery in the meantime.

But the Bush White House appears to be taking no chances on a judge saying no while a terror attack is looming, national security experts agreed.

Martin said that Bush is "using the same legal reasoning to justify warrantless opening of domestic mail" as he did with warrantless eavesdropping.

Bush Administration Defends Emergency Mail Inspection (USAT)

By Mimi Hall And David Jackson

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — The White House on Thursday defended a policy allowing the government to open mail without a warrant, despite criticism that the crime-fighting tactic might lead to privacy breaches.

Bush administration and Postal Service officials said citizens' mail remains constitutionally protected from unreasonable search and seizure. But White House spokesman Tony Snow said the United States needs to have the power to inspect mail in emergencies.

DOJ_NMG_0112649

The mail controversy erupted Wednesday after a report in the New York Daily News that President Bush on Dec. 20 attached a so-called signing statement to a new postal law. The statement grants the government the authority during emergencies to bypass a law forbidding mail to be opened without a warrant.

Snow said Bush was simply reiterating authority the government already has under the law.

U.S. Postal Service spokesman Thomas Day concurred. "The president is not exerting any new authority," he said.

Snow did not say what emergency circumstances might warrant inspections of the mail.

Brian Walsh, a lawyer at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the authority likely would only be used in extreme cases, such as if police learned a bomb or an envelope containing anthrax or another biohazard was in the mail.

If the government didn't have the authority for prompt inspections, the mail — particularly overnight delivery — could become "a courier service for drug dealers or terrorists," Walsh said.

Privacy rights advocates expressed concern that the administration could loosely define emergency situations to include looking at mail sent by or delivered to people who might wrongly be included on the government's terrorist watch lists.

The American Civil Liberties Union said such "deliberate ambiguity" was troublesome.

It "raises a red flag because of President Bush's history of asserting broad powers to spy on Americans," ACLU Director Anthony Romero said.

Others accused Bush of making an end-run around the Constitution and Congress.

"This opens the door into the government prying into private communications," said Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer with the Brennan Center for Justice. "It's something we associate with a totalitarian or police state."

In Congress, where Democrats took control of both houses Thursday for the first time in 12 years, some lawmakers expressed unease about the practice.

"Every American wants foolproof protection against terrorism," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said. "But history has shown it can and should be done within the confines of the Constitution. This last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law is the exact type of maneuver that voters so resoundingly rejected in November."

White House Denies Switch In Mail Policy (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — The White House said Thursday that President Bush was not claiming any new executive authority last month when he issued a statement suggesting that postal inspectors could open mail without a warrant in emergency circumstances.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said the statement Mr. Bush issued in signing postal legislation was merely a restatement of existing law allowing mail to be opened without a warrant in “exigent circumstances” to protect public safety.

“All this is saying is that there are provisions at law for, in exigent circumstances, for such inspections,” Mr. Snow said. “It has been thus. This is not a change in the law. This is not new.”

The questions arose after The New York Daily News published an article Thursday drawing attention to the Dec. 20 signing statement and legal questions surrounding it. The front page featured a photo of Mr. Bush alongside the banner headline: “I’ve got mail! And it’s yours!”

Federal law, in keeping with the constitutional prohibition on unreasonable searches, generally prohibits the government from opening first-class mail without a warrant. But a 1996 postal provision allows postal inspectors to open mail without a warrant in narrow circumstances if there is credible evidence that a package contains a bomb or other dangerous material.

Mr. Bush has drawn intense scrutiny and criticism from Democrats and groups like the American Bar Association for issuing signing statements reserving the right to disregard more than 800 selected provisions of measures he signed into law , often on the grounds that they represented an unconstitutional infringement on executive authority.

In signing the postal legislation last month, Mr. Bush said that its restrictions on the opening of mail should be construed “in a manner consistent, to the maximum extent permissible, with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection.”

Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush had not claimed any “sweeping new powers” through the statement, as The Daily News article asserted, and the Postal Service issued a statement Thursday echoing that assessment.

“As has been the longstanding practice, first-class mail is protected from unreasonable search and seizure when in postal custody,” said Thomas Day, a senior vice president for the Postal Service. “Nothing in the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act changes this protection. The president is not exerting any new authority.”

Critics were not so certain.

DOJ_NMG_0112650

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, called Mr. Bush's signing statement a "last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law" protecting the privacy of mail users. The American Civil Liberties Union said it would press to find out how often mailings had been opened without a warrant.

Bush Warned About Mail-Opening Authority (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

President Bush signed a little-noticed statement last month asserting the authority to open U.S. mail without judicial warrants in emergencies or foreign intelligence cases, prompting warnings yesterday from Democrats and privacy advocates that the administration is attempting to circumvent legal restrictions on its powers.

A "signing statement" attached to a postal reform bill on Dec. 20 says the Bush administration "shall construe" a section of that law to allow the opening of sealed mail to protect life, guard against hazardous materials or conduct "physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

White House and U.S. Postal Service officials said the statement was not intended to expand the powers of the executive branch but merely to clarify existing ones for extreme cases.

"This is not a change in law, this is not new, it is not . . . a sweeping new power by the president," spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "It is, in fact, merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president of the United States."

But some civil liberties and national-security law experts said the statement's language is unduly vague and appears to go beyond long-recognized limits on the ability of the government to open letters and other U.S. mail without approval from a judge.

Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies in Washington, said the government has long been able to legally open mail believed to contain a bomb or other imminent threat. But authorities are generally required to seek a warrant from a criminal or special intelligence court in other cases, Martin and other experts said.

"The administration is playing games about warrants," Martin said. "If they are not claiming new powers, then why did they need to issue a signing statement?"

Administration critics said they were particularly confused because the relevant portion of the postal reform legislation -- which prohibits opening mail without warrants in most circumstances -- remains unchanged.

A White House official, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the signing statement, first revealed by the New York Daily News, was intended only to make clear that the new law would not limit the ability of the president or attorney general to open mail under emergency provisions of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which governs spying in the United States. That law allows authorities to conduct searches and surveillance without warrants in emergency situations, although they must apply for a warrant later.

"The point was that because Congress was passing this anew, the concern was that there would be some confusion," the official said. "The law that's been around since 1978 still allows you to conduct warrantless physical searches under some circumstances, and nothing changes that authority."

The debate over the signing statement comes after disclosures over the past year that Bush authorized a program that allows the National Security Agency to monitor telephone and e-mail communications between the United States and other countrieswithout court oversight. The administration has strongly defended the legality of the NSA spying program, arguing that Congress authorized it as part of the war on al-Qaeda and, even if it had not, that the president has the power to order such surveillance.

In addition to searching for a bomb or other hazardous device, postal officials are legally allowed to open letters that cannot be delivered as addressed, but only to find a correct destination for the parcel. The FBI and other law enforcement agencies are also allowed to obtain authority from postal inspectors to track mail without opening it.

The latest statement caused a small ruckus on Capitol Hill yesterday just as Democrats were taking control of Congress. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, called the statement a "last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law."

Sharp limits have been placed on the government's power to open mail since the 1970s, when a congressional committee investigating abuses found that, for three decades, the CIA and FBI had illegally opened hundreds of thousands of pieces of U.S. mail. Among the targets were "large numbers of American dissidents, including those who challenged the condition of racial minorities and those who opposed the war in Vietnam," according to a report by the Senate panel, known as the Church committee. Also surveilled was "the mail of Senators, Congressmen, journalists, businessmen, and even a Presidential candidate," the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0112651

During his tenure, Bush has made plentiful use of signing statements, which are issued along with a president's signature on legislation. Although previous presidents used them as guidance for the executive branch, Bush has offered revised interpretations of laws on constitutional or national security grounds in some of his statements.

Bush: Mail Subject To Warrantless Searches (CBS)

CBS News, January 5, 2007

Presidential Signing Statement Claims Feds Can Open Mail In Certain Circumstances

(CBS/AP) President George W. Bush has created more controversy over his domestic intelligence gathering policies with a previously unnoticed "Signing Statement" attached to a postal reform bill which claims federal officials can open U.S. mail without a warrant.

The law as passed by the House and Senate requires government agents to get warrants to open first-class letters.

But the presidential statement, signed on December 20, added that sealed mail can be searched in "exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence."

The White House said the president is not claiming any new authority and that the statement does not change the scope of current law.

Spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore told CBS News White House correspondent Mark Knoller, "The signing statement merely recognizes a legal proposition that is totally uncontroversial: that in certain circumstances – such as with the proverbial 'ticking bomb' – the Constitution does not require warrants for reasonable searches."

But CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen questioned why the president felt it necessary to attach the language to the bill if nothing has changed.

"I don't think the White House would have included this language into a signing statement unless the feds were either already searching mail without a warrant or planning to do so," Cohen said. "And if the legal right to do so were as clear as the White House now says it's hard to believe that there was a need to remind everyone of the fact in a bill about the postal service."

"The signing statement raises serious questions whether he is authorizing opening of mail contrary to the Constitution and to laws enacted by Congress," said Ann Beeson, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union. "What is the purpose of the signing statement if it isn't that?"

She said the group is planning to file request for information on how this exception will be used and also asking whether it has already been used to open mail.

Postal Vice President Tom Day said Thursday: "As has been the long-standing practice, first class mail is protected from unreasonable search and seizure when in postal custody. Nothing in the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act changes this protection. The president is not exerting any new authority."

However, Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., criticized Bush's action.

"Every American wants foolproof protection against terrorism. But history has shown it can and should be done within the confines of the Constitution. This last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law is the exact type of maneuver that voters so resoundingly rejected in November," Schumer said.

The White House first came under scrutiny for its domestic surveillance policies in December 2005 when the New York Times revealed a National Security Agency program which eavesdropped on phone calls without warrants to do so.

Mr. Bush claimed the NSA program is needed in the war on terrorism; opponents say it oversteps constitutional boundaries on free speech, privacy and executive powers.

In October, a federal appeals court allowed the domestic spying program to continue after a lower court had ordered it stopped.

President Bush has also come under fire from legal experts for creating or expanding presidential powers in bill signing statements. In July, an American Bar Association task force said that the president was violating the Constitution by doing so.

"If left unchecked, the president's practice does grave harm to the separation of powers doctrine, and the system of checks and balances that have sustained our democracy for more than two centuries," ABA president Michael Greco said at the time.

Bush has issued at least 750 signing statements during his presidency, more than all other presidents combined, according to the ABA.

Typically, presidents have used signing statements for such purposes as instructing executive agencies how to carry out new laws.

Bush's statements often reserve the right to revise, interpret or disregard laws on national security and constitutional grounds.

DOJ_NMG_0112652

Both the warrantless searches and the president's use of signing statement's could be challenged by the newly convened Democratic congress.

"With Democrats now in control of Congress, don't be surprised if we see an investigation into these sorts of uses of signing statements and of the White House's legal authority to undertake searches like this without a warrant or other court order," Cohen said.

A Terror Detainee Longs For Court (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

Ali al-Marri, whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda and who is the only person on the American mainland still held as an enemy combatant, spends his days in a small cell in solitary confinement at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. When he is in an ironic mood, his lawyers say, he calls the cell his villa.

Mr. Marri waits there for word from his wife, two sons and three daughters, whom he last saw in 2001, just before his arrest in Peoria, Ill., where he was studying computer science at Bradley University.

Letters arrive, but they are late and have words and sentences blacked out. A note his wife sent to him 10 months ago landed recently. It began with a standard Muslim invocation, but a word was missing. Mr. Marri is pretty sure it was "Allah."

But mostly Mr. Marri waits for word from a federal appeals court, which will soon rule on one of the most urgent questions in American law, one his case presents in stark form: May the government indefinitely detain a foreigner living legally in the United States, without charges and without access to the courts?

Mr. Marri, who is 41 and a citizen of Qatar, wants the right to challenge President Bush's assertion that he is a terrorist and "a grave danger to the national security of the United States."

The Bush administration says the courts cannot second-guess the president when he decides that someone is an enemy combatant, at least when noncitizens are involved. Detaining combatants is a military rather than a criminal matter, the administration says, adding that its purpose is not to punish the prisoner but to stop him from returning to the battlefield.

The implications of that position are startling, according to a brief filed last month in Mr. Marri's case by some 30 constitutional scholars. "The government's interpretation would be vastly threatening to the liberty of more than 20 million noncitizens residing in the United States," the brief said, "exposing them to the risk of irremediable indefinite detention on the basis of unfounded rumors, mistaken identity, the desperation of other detainees subject to coercive interrogation, and the deliberate lies of actual terrorists."

Kathleen M. Blomquist, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, disputed that contention.

"Of all the terrorists currently in the custody of the United States military, al-Marri is the only one who was captured in the United States," Ms. Blomquist said, adding that the notion that millions of people are at risk is "unfounded and absurd."

Mr. Bush's determination that Mr. Marri is an enemy combatant, she said, was based on substantial evidence, including "his association with Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and files found on his computer concerning chemical weapons of mass destruction."

Mr. Marri maintains his innocence, his lawyers say. But they have refused to offer point-by-point rebuttals of the government's detailed assertions, calling instead for prosecutors to offer evidence to back them up in court.

"In a civilized society and under American law and tradition," said Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer for Mr. Marri with the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, "the government has the obligation to prove its case."

One of Mr. Marri's brothers, Mohammed Marri, in a telephone interview from Qatar, rejected the charge that Mr. Marri is a terrorist. "For sure it's not true," he said.

A third brother, Jarallah, is at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, held as an enemy combatant based on accusations that he had visited a Qaeda camp. "This is not a proper way to treat other people from other countries," Mohammed Marri said of his brothers and other detainees. "If they are guilty, let them prove it in court."

An Exclusive Club

The Charleston brig can hold 288 military prisoners and 6 enemy combatants, but there have never been more than 3 in the exclusive enemy combatant club. Two of them are now gone.

One of them, Yaser Hamdi, was freed and sent to Saudi Arabia after the United States Supreme Court allowed him to challenge his detention in 2004. Jose Padilla was transferred to the criminal justice system last year just as the Supreme Court was considering whether to review his case. That leaves only Mr. Marri.

Mr. Hamdi and Mr. Padilla are American citizens, but Mr. Marri is not. They were seized abroad or on their way back to the United States, while Mr. Marri was living what seemed to be an ordinary life, in Peoria, a city often caricatured as the nation's most ordinary, with a family and a minivan.

DOJ_NMG_0112653

The government contends in a partly declassified declaration from a senior defense intelligence official, Jeffrey N. Rapp, and in a recent book by former Attorney General John Ashcroft, that Mr. Marri was a Qaeda sleeper agent sent to the United States to commit mass murder and disrupt the banking system.

The assertions have not been tested in court, and human rights groups say they are based on unreliable evidence "There is substantial reason to believe," lawyers for two of the groups wrote in a brief in November, "that the allegations of the Rapp declaration are derived from the torture of two men interrogated at Guantánamo Bay and other detention sites: Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi."

The government says that Mr. Hawsawi was one of the financiers of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mr. Rapp's declaration cites the personal views of Mr. Mohammed, who is often referred to as K.S.M. "K.S.M. considered al-Marri an ideal sleeper agent," Mr. Rapp wrote.

Kept in Isolation

Mr. Marri was kept in isolation at the brig and, according to his court filings, subjected to tough interrogation. Interrogators threatened to send him to Egypt or Saudi Arabia, according to a lawsuit filed on his behalf in 2005, "where, they told him, he would be tortured and sodomized and where his wife would be raped in front on him."

"By winter '05," Andrew J. Savage, who also represents Mr. Marri, said in a recent interview, "I genuinely thought he was losing his mind. He told me in this sort of indirect way that he might not be able to hold on, that his mind was playing tricks on him."

Mr. Padilla's lawyers have said that their client's time in the brig was so grueling that he is not fit to stand trial. But while Mr. Padilla was passive, Mr. Marri pushed back. He put wet toilet paper on the video camera, for instance. The brig responded by taking away his mattress, Koran and hygienic products, including his toilet paper.

"There is almost nothing to distract him from his torment," his lawyers wrote in the lawsuit, "and he therefore becomes preoccupied with his pain and the degradation he suffers."

Perhaps as a consequence of the lawsuit, conditions have improved.

When Mr. Marri's lawyers were first allowed to see him in October 2004, after the decision in Mr. Hamdi's case, Mr. Marri was behind a transparent barrier and bound in leg-irons and handcuffs that were linked to a belly-chain and fastened to the floor. Officials from the Defense Intelligence Agency and the brig were present, and the conversation was videotaped.

On a recent visit, Mr. Savage said, he met his client in a visiting lounge. Mr. Marri, who was not restrained, was wearing stylish bifocals rather than institutional prison glasses. He was also wearing a watch, which makes it easier for him to know when to pray.

Mr. Savage brought hummus and pita bread. "We sat down, we broke bread, and we had a three-and-a-half hour conversation, unmonitored," Mr. Savage said.

Mr. Marri is now allowed to watch television in the evening, but not the news. He reads newspapers and magazines, but they are edited. "Brig staff remove all materials associated with the war on terror from them," Cmdr. Stephanie L. Wright, the brig's commanding officer, said in court filing in July.

Sometimes that makes for a thin newspaper. "All I get is sports and obits," Mr. Marri has complained, Mr. Savage said. He is critical of the former, saying there is not enough soccer coverage.

The Defense Department has allowed journalists and others to tour the Guantánamo facility, where Mr. Marri's brother Jarallah and 400 other men are being held. All of the Guantánamo prisoners are foreigners who were seized abroad. The government has not asserted that the brothers were working together.

The Defense Department refused a recent request to inspect the Charleston brig. A spokesman, Cmdr. J. D. Gordon, cited "operational security concerns surrounding the detention of an alleged al Qaeda-linked operative in the U.S. mainland," a reference to Mr. Marri. Commander Gordon added that "it has always been our policy to treat all detainees humanely."

Return to the United States

Mr. Marri spent eight years in the United States as a young man, graduating from Bradley with an undergraduate degree in business administration in 1991. When he returned to the United States 10 years later, he brought his family.

In his declaration, Mr. Rapp noted that Mr. Marri's profile "differed significantly from that of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers." Those differences, Mr. Rapp said, made Mr. Marri all the more attractive to Al Qaeda.

The years between Mr. Marri's two stints at Bradley are a mystery. The government says he trained at a Qaeda camp in Afghanistan for about a year and a half between 1996 and 1998, specializing in poisons. The government also says that Mr. Marri visited the United States briefly in 2000, which Mr. Marri has denied.

In the summer of 2001, Mr. Rapp wrote, Mr. Mohammed introduced Mr. Marri to Osama bin Laden. Mr. Marri "offered to be an Al Qaeda martyr," Mr. Rapp wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0112654

"Al Qaeda instructed al-Marri that it was imperative that he arrive in the United States prior to Sept. 11, 2001, and that if al-Marri could not do so, that he should cancel all his plans and go to Pakistan," Mr. Rapp wrote.

The Marris arrived in Peoria on Sept. 10, 2001.

Mr. Marri soon came to the attention of the F.B.I., which first interviewed him less than a month later. In December, agents searched his laptop, finding "research consistent with the tradecraft and teachings associated with Al Qaeda," Mr. Rapp wrote. Mr. Marri was arrested on Dec. 12, 2001, and held as a material witness at the request of prosecutors in New York. He was indicted two months later on charges of credit card fraud. In January 2003, the government added charges of lying to federal agents and financial institutions, and identity theft. Mr. Marri pleaded not guilty. His family has since returned to the Middle East.

For a year and a half, the government pursued a conventional criminal case. Mr. Ashcroft, in his book "Never Again," which was published in October, wrote that Mr. Marri "rejected numerous offers to improve his lot" by cooperating with investigators. "He insisted," Mr. Ashcroft wrote, "on becoming a 'hard case.' "

In June 2003, as the case was nearing trial, the government abruptly changed course, taking Mr. Marri out of the criminal system and moving him into indefinite military detention. That means, Mr. Ashcroft later wrote, that Mr. Marri can be held "at least until the war against Al Qaeda was over."

In its rush to move Mr. Marri, the government short-circuited its criminal case. On hearing that a federal judge in Peoria would allow Mr. Marri's lawyers to file papers opposing the transfer as long as the criminal case was alive, the government agreed to dismiss the criminal charges with prejudice, meaning they cannot be refiled.

The decision, however, would not prevent the government from charging Mr. Marri with other crimes outlined in Mr. Rapp's declaration.

The declaration has served the purpose for which it was designed. In August, it persuaded Henry F. Floyd, a federal judge in Spartanburg, S.C., to deny a habeas corpus petition challenging Mr. Marri's detention. Saying that Mr. Marri had "offered nothing more than a general denial" of the assertions in the declaration, Judge Floyd dismissed the petition.

Neither side was happy with the ruling. Mr. Marri has appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond, saying that the president does not have the power to detain him as an enemy combatant.

A foreigner living legally in the United States, his lawyers say, is not the same as a soldier captured on a battlefield. Even if the president does have the power, they say, he should be required to support his assertions with evidence.

The government argues that Judge Floyd gave Mr. Marri too full a hearing. It cited the recent Military Commissions Act, which says that the courts have no jurisdiction to hear challenges from any alien "who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant."

The case will be heard Feb. 1

The government offered Mr. Marri a sort of consolation prize should the appeals court dismiss his case. It said he could try to persuade a combatant status review tribunal, convened by the Defense Department, that he was not an enemy combatant. That would apparently be the first such proceeding on the mainland; all of the others known to have been conducted were at Guantánamo Bay.

A Different View

In a brief filed in November, eight former Justice Department officials, including Janet Reno, the attorney general in the Clinton administration, said that taking Mr. Marri out of the criminal system as his case approached trial "has given to the appearance of manipulation of the judicial process." The brief listed several criminal statutes available to prosecute people accused of terrorism along with many successful prosecutions under them.

"The criminal justice system has proven that it can make the cases," Ms. Reno said in an interview. "For the president to be able to designate someone as an enemy combatant, without process and without regulation, just doesn't make any sense and isn't necessary."

Ms. Blomquist, the Justice Department spokeswoman, said, "While we respect the views of former law enforcement officials, the United States cannot afford to retreat to a pre-September 11 mind-set that treats terrorism solely as a domestic law enforcement problem."

Mr. Marri shared a fantasy with one of his lawyers not long ago. "I'd love to be taken back to Saudi Arabia and they would beat the" — here, he swore — "out of me for six months," Mr. Marri said, according to Mr. Savage. "It would be brutal, but it would be finite."

Defense Rests After Hearing From Torture Expert At Hamas Trial In U.S. (AP)

By Mike Robinson, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112655

(AP) - CHICAGO-Attorneys for one of two men accused of furnishing thousands of dollars (euros) and fresh recruits to a Palestinian terrorist network rested their case Thursday following testimony from an expert on torture.

Closing arguments were set for Monday at the racketeering trial of former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University.

Federal prosecutors say the two men were members of the Palestinian militant group Hamas and helped to bankroll a wave of terror that included bombings, kidnappings and murder aimed at toppling the Israeli government.

"Ladies and gentlemen, we are done with the evidentiary portion of this case," U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve, who has presided over the 10-week trial, told the jurors before sending them home for the weekend.

Attorney William Moffitt, who represents Ashqar, rested his case weeks ago. Salah attorney Michael E. Deutsch rested Thursday following testimony from a psychiatrist and torture expert, Dr. Metin Basoglu.

Basoglu, an authority on the psychological mechanisms created by torture, testified over a live video feed from Istanbul where he lives.

Basoglu said a slipped disc in his back kept him from traveling.

Salah's attorneys are hoping Basoglu's testimony will reinforce Salah's claim that after his January 1993 arrest he was tortured by Israel's Shin Bet security agents into making incriminating statements.

Israeli police confiscated $97,000 in cash in his East Jerusalem hotel room, money they say was earmarked to pay for guns and bombs for Hamas.

The soft-spoken Salah, who grew up in a squalid West Bank refugee camp and later became a U.S. citizen, says the money was for Muslim charities.

He served almost five years in Israeli prisons before he returned to the U.S., where he immediately came under intense scrutiny by the FBI.

Basoglu, a specialist in psychiatry at Istanbul University and a senior lecturer at the University of London, said torture causes acute stress by making victims feel they have lost control of their situation.

He said the anxiety torture victims suffer during interrogation by the military or the police can become so intense as to be unbearable.

"Any one of us would comply in that situation," he said.

The trial began with opening statements in October. The prosecution's initial witnesses were two Shin Bet agents who interrogated Salah in 1993.

They testified under aliases in a courtroom cleared of spectators to protect them against possible reprisals by Hamas. But reporters were allowed to hear their testimony on closed-circuit TV in another room.

Both men denied Salah ever was tortured. Salah did not take the stand but his attorneys say he was put in a freezing cell with no blanket, forced to wear a foul-smelling hood and otherwise mistreated for weeks.

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified that she witnessed part of Salah's 54-day interrogation at a high-security prison in Ramallah. She said he seemed to be in good spirits. Salah attorneys say Miller saw only a small fraction of what went on and was easily fooled.

Prosecution witnesses testified that when agents searched Ashqar's home they found Hamas records and literature and that he took part in a Philadelphia meeting at which the group's organizers mapped strategy.

His attorneys maintain that he merely was exercising his right to free speech and that nothing he did violated the law.

There is a third defendant in the case - Mousa Mohammad Abu Marzouk - allegedly a high-ranking member of the Hamas command now believed to be living in Damascus and classified as a fugitive.

A crowded courtroom was expected for closing arguments Monday. The case has drawn wide interest since August 2004 when then Attorney General John Ashcroft unveiled the indictment at a news conference, saying the three operated "a U.S.-based terrorist recruiting and financing cell."

Grocer Pleads Guilty To Misleading Federal Agents (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, January 5, 2007

ROCHESTER, N.Y. (AP) _ A Rochester grocer pleaded guilty Thursday to misleading FBI agents about his brother's intentions to leave the U.S. for Israel and become a suicide bomber.

Mohamed Subeh, 43, admitted in U.S. District Court that he deceived federal agents when he denied seeing a letter from his brother that indicated he wanted to become a suicide bomber. Prosecutors said Subeh destroyed the letter, but not before investigators had the opportunity to photocopy it and have it translated.

Subeh, a naturalized U.S. citizen, on April 4 will face a sentence ranging from probation to six months in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0112656

Subeh's brother, Ismail Dorgham, 24, was stopped in 2003 at the Greater Rochester International Airport when he used cash to purchase a one-way ticket to Jordan and had no luggage in tow.

While he was questioned, an FBI counterterrorism agent found the note to Subeh _ written in Arabic _ in Dorham's possesion. The FBI translated a copy of the document a week later and concluded that Dorgham intended to become a suicide bomber on behalf of a terrorist organization.

Dorgham is currently married and living with his wife and his 2 {-year-old son in Bethlehem, Subeh's lawyer, John Parrinello said.

___

Information from: Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, http://www.democratandchronicle.com

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Court To Consider Conflicting Portraits Of Would-be Subway Bomber (AP)

By Tom Hays, The Associated Press

AP, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) — Shahawar Matin Siraj was either a naive stooge lured into a phony bomb plot or a homegrown terrorist determined to inflict misery on New Yorkers as revenge for wartime abuses of Iraqis.

The conflicting portraits of Siraj — convicted on conspiracy charges in a scheme to blow up one of the city's busiest subway stations — were painted in court papers recently filed in advance of his sentencing on Monday in federal court in Brooklyn.

Defense attorneys have sought to convince a judge that their client's sentence should not exceed 10 years since the attack never came close to being carried out.

Siraj, a 21-year-old high school dropout at the time of his arrest, "is not a dangerous psychopath, but more of a confused and misguided youngster," the defense team argued in its papers.

Prosecutors countered that the Pakistani immigrant deserves at least 30 years — and possibly life — behind bars as the "driving force" behind a "workable terrorist plot" to set off explosives at the subway station of Herald Square, a dense shopping district that includes Macy's flagship department store.

"The offense was the brainchild and handiwork of the defendant," the government's papers said.

On Thursday, U.S. District Judge Nina Gershon denied a defense motion for a new trial, saying in a written ruling that "the evidence as to the defendant's guilt was overwhelming."

Siraj and another man suspected in the plot, James Elshafay, were arrested on the eve of the 2004 Republican National Convention carrying crude diagrams of Herald square. Elshafay immediately agreed to cooperate with the government.

Authorities said Siraj had no affiliation with known terrorist organizations. Instead, he was a relative loner whose anti-American rants caught the attention of a police informant, Osama Eldawoody, and an undercover officer.

Eldawoody, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Egypt, had been assigned by the NYPD to identify and track Islamic extremists in Muslim neighborhoods after Sept. 11. He and the undercover officer emerged last year at Siraj's trial as the government's star witnesses.

While wearing a wire and assuming the role of an accomplice, Eldawoody assured Siraj that any plan he concocted would have the backing of a fictitious faction called The Brotherhood. On tape, Siraj was recorded musing about possibly destroying the Verrazano-Narrows and three other bridges serving Staten Island or killing Microsoft founder Bill Gates before settling on Herald Square as a target.

Testifying in his own defense, Siraj said he never had a violent thought before he fell under the spell of the 50-year-old Eldawoody. He said the older man became a mentor and instructed him that there was a fatwa, or religious edict, permitting the killing of U.S. soldiers and law enforcement agents.

Eldawoody had himself talked about "blowing up the buildings and blowing up the Wall Street places," the defendant said. He admitted taking steps to attack the subway station, but only after the informant inflamed him by showing him photos of prisoners being abused at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

According to the recent defense filings, he has since expressed his regret.

"I feel really, really bad and apologize to everybody," he told a psychologist. "I was just foolish, just angry."

Ill. Man Indicted In Hand Grenade Case (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112657

CHICAGO - A man accused of plotting to use hand grenades in an attack on holiday shoppers was indicted Thursday on charges of attempting to use weapons of mass destruction.

Derrick Shareef, 22, was arrested Dec. 6 by an FBI-led anti-terrorism task force following a sting operation in which an undercover informant secretly tape-recorded his plans.

Shareef was arrested when he met an undercover agent to trade a pair of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a handgun to use at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford, about 90 miles northwest of Chicago, federal prosecutors said.

Shareef is being held in the government's Metropolitan Correctional Center pending a court hearing. No date has been set.

Defense attorney Michael B. Mann, who was appointed to represent Shareef at his initial court appearance in December, was unavailable for comment. A message left on his office voicemail was not immediately returned.

Prosecutors have said they were convinced Shareef had operated alone and there had been no imminent danger to the public.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Shareef (RRS)

Rockford Register Star, January 5, 2007

ROCKFORD — A federal grand jury on Thursday formally indicted Derrick Shareef with attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction and attempting to destroy real and personal property by use of explosives.

“The complaint is one way to charge a suspect, but that has to be followed up by an indictment within 30 days,” said Kim Nerheim, a spokeswoman with the U.S. attorney’s office in Chicago, where the grand jury revealed the indictment.

“That’s what this was and that’s why it is so similar to the complaint,” Nerheim said.

Shareef, 22, allegedly wanted to use grenades in an attack on patrons of CherryVale Mall to wage jihad against people in the United States.

He was arrested Dec. 6 after he exchanged some stereo speakers for some nonfunctioning grenades and a firearm.

Shareef remains in federal custody in Chicago awaiting his arraignment, a date that has not been set.

Democrats Set Homeland Security Changes (AP)

By Leslie Miller

AP, January 5, 2007

Hours after taking control of Congress, House Democrats disclosed a plan they said would strengthen homeland security after five years of complaining that Republicans weren't doing enough.

Democrats say their legislation bill would implement the unfinished 9/11 Commission recommendations that fall under the Homeland Security Committee's jurisdiction.

The bill would require private companies to prepare for terrorism and the government would have to inspect cargo on passenger planes and shipping containers leaving the largest ports. Airport screeners would be given whistle-blower protection, money would be set aside to develop technology for detecting explosives at checkpoints and an appeals process would be established for airline passengers mistaken for terrorists on watch lists.

Democrats have said the Republican-controlled Congress didn't implement the commission's 41 recommendations aimed at improving safety after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

The commission itself met a year ago to hand out failing grades to the government, giving an "F," for example, to improving airline passenger screening and homeland security spending for cities considered most at risk of attack.

The bill will be debated and voted on Tuesday — without going through the committee process — as part of the Democrats' "100 hours" plan to quickly accomplish their priorities.

Republicans objected to the speed with which the Democrats are moving.

New York Rep. Peter King, ranking Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, sent a letter Tuesday to committee chairman and lead sponsor of the bill, Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss. In it, King said that bypassing the committee would contradict an "open, full and fair debate" promised by incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

"Homeland security is far too important an issue to play politics with, and any new homeland security measure should be given the review and oversight it deserves," King wrote.

The "9/11 Commission" bill isn't filed yet. According to a draft, it would tackle a knotty problem: spending homeland security funds on cities most at risk of terrorist attack.

Currently, the grant formula gives each state .75 percent of the total pot of money before its risk is assessed. The bill would reduce that to .25 percent, except states with large international borders would start off with .45 percent.

Homeland Security analysts have said there are no remaining proposals that can easily be enacted into law because they are politically difficult.

DOJ_NMG_0112658

For example, the commission recommended that oversight of Homeland Security be given to a single committee. The Homeland Security Department said it reported to 86 committees and subcommittees and gave more than 4,000 briefings in 2005-06. But soon after House Democrats unveiled the 9/11 bill, they announced that the Transportation Committee would share jurisdiction over two Homeland Security agencies: the Coast Guard and Federal Emergency Management Agency.

One problem for congressional Democrats in fulfilling their promise is that some of the commission's recommendations to change foreign policy — such as supporting Pakistan and reforming Saudi Arabia — don't fall under the purview of Congress. Those aren't addressed in the bill.

4 Cities Cut, 4 Added For Terror Grants (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, January 5, 2007

Four U.S. cities will get a fresh infusion of federal anti-terror grant money, and four others will be cut off from such grants, under a new government list of urban areas considered at serious risk of attacks and eligible to share $747 million.

The list obtained Thursday by The Associated Press shows the four newly eligible cities are El Paso, Texas; Norfolk, Va.; Providence, R.I.; and Tucson, Ariz.

The cities that were cut from the list of 45 metropolitan areas are Toledo, Ohio; Baton Rouge, La.; Louisville, Ky.; and Omaha, Neb.

The Homeland Security Department has come under intense scrutiny for its decisions in the Urban Area Security Initiative, or UASI, which is the only pool of federal money designed to go to localities based solely on their risk of terror attacks.

Officials in New York and several other major cities were furious last year when the agency announced major cuts to their funding while sending millions of dollars to places like Omaha and Louisville, which are generally considered to face less risk of terrorism.

The agency may officially announce the decision as early as Friday, though the designations do not yet come with fixed dollar amounts. Those are expected later this year, most likely in May, after the government has reviewed the cities' grant applications.

Under the program, DHS awards money not just to an individual city, but to the entire metropolitan area.

This year, DHS chose to lump together New York City and northern New Jersey into a single area. Last year, the agency kept them separate, giving money directly to Jersey City and Newark.

While the agency did cut four cities from the list, it spared several others that were warned in 2006 that they might be cut off. Those spared cities were Las Vegas, Nev., Buffalo, N.Y., Oklahoma City, Okla.; Tampa, Fla.; San Diego, Calif.; Sacramento, Calif.; and Phoenix, Ariz.

The UASI list also does not include a smaller, separate pot of grant money to protect urban infrastructure, like public transit systems. An announcement on that money is expected next week.

The actual UASI payments vary widely from place to place, and even year to year. In the 2005 budget year, for example, Los Angeles received $65 million, while Jacksonville, Fla. got $6.9 million.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks cities like New York and Washington have received the lion's share of the UASI money, but city officials protested furiously last May when funding for each was cut by 40 percent.

The program was launched after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and has since been the focus of yearly wrangling between the Bush administration and some in Congress who want a larger share of federal largesse to be distributed based solely on risk.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said Thursday he was concerned New York might be put at a disadvantage by having to split its share of funding with northern New Jersey.

"This could spell trouble. If they give out one pot of money to two areas, we cannot let that translate into fewer dollars," said Schumer.

The new Democratic majority in Congress, sworn in Thursday, has pledged to revise grant spending to distribute billions of federal anti-terror grants based on risk. The House is expected to take up such legislation next week as part of a package based on the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Prime target

The difficulty of trying to rebuild Iraq as insurgents try to destroy it was hammered home by an incident in November.

DOJ_NMG_0112659

The U.S. operates Camp Loyalty, a forward operating base near Baghdad, and stores building material there. In this case, they were husbanding a huge amount of electrical wiring and components to help turn the lights on in Sadr City, the capital's Shi'ite slum.

Then, insurgent mortar rounds hit the base storage yard. Everyone took cover. When the barrage ended, most of the supplies disappeared in flames.

"Media there never covers the fact that Iraqi bad guys are blowing up Iraq's own reconstruction," said a military official. "Congress is told subliminally by others that reconstructors are all crooks or political incompetents."

CIA on China threat

CIA Director Michael V. Hayden spoke to CIA employees yesterday for a town-hall-style meeting where he revealed the agency's new "Strategic Intent" report and outlined some of the reforms taken. They include setting up a new operations center with representatives from the collection, analysis and technical services branches.

The report lists the long war on terrorism, arms proliferation and the rise of China and India as part of the current "unstable and dangerous " strategic environment.

One initiative: the creation of a CIA associate deputy director for counterintelligence that supporters hope will give the agency something it badly needs in the current environment of aggressive foreign intelligence activities. "Counterintelligence is too critical an issue not to have a senior member of our leadership team committed to it 24/7," Gen. Hayden said in announcing the post.

Counterintelligence at CIA has been a backwater support function since the ouster of master counterspy James Jesus Angleton in the 1970s. Mr. Angleton oversaw an aggressive independent counterintelligence branch that conducted several mole hunts that upset veteran spies.

The CIA still has not fully recovered from the decadeslong betrayal of CIA officer Aldrich Ames, who gave Russia the names and identities of virtually all the CIA's recruited agents working against the Soviet Union. Ames was caught in 1993.

Other reforms outlined by Gen. Hayden include a "revitalized" covert action review group that will direct semi-secret CIA-sponsored activities ranging from political operations to paramilitary forces.

The CIA also has a new External Advisory Board that includes former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Richard B. Myers, former Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre and former Hewlett-Packard Chief Executive Officer Carly Fiorina.

Test run

The intelligence community would just as well forget the flawed 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq and work on making sure such a mistaken analysis does not happen again.

One new look is Intellipedia, a classified form of the Wikipedia, the Internet encyclopedia where people can use the "wiki" software to add information on a given subject.

Intellipedia debuted in April on the government's top-secret network. Today, there are more than 28,000 Web pages, over 13 million "hits" and 3,600 registered users.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence is experimenting with that concept, via Intellipedia, to see if intelligence analysts collectively can produce an accurate NIE on various subjects. Another aim is to get rid of the "stovepipes" — the metaphor for analysts not sharing information with other analysts in different fields but similar subjects.

"With all edits being attributable in Intellipedia, it actually kind of allows our officers to be much more collegial with one another, and it builds a community, which is what we're trying to do," Sean Dennehy, a CIA analyst, said at a recent round-table discussion.

Intellipedia will be a communal site for all types of intelligence articles, which can be edited by other analysts, while keeping the assessment's historical thread. You can have analysts from U.S. Pacific Command, the CIA and a satellite reconnaissance office talking to one another at the same time on the same topic via Intellipedia.

The DNI is also doing an experimental NIE, the intelligence community's crown jewel produced by the National Intelligence Council. The initial Intellipedia NIE will be on the troubled African nation of Nigeria. Intellipedia will be the recipient of analysts assessments on that country for use by the council to write the NIE.

Changing Air Force

Gen. T. Michael Moseley, Air Force chief of staff, has made the war on terror his top service priority, followed by caring for airmen and their families, and buying new combat aircraft and space assets.

A recent message from headquarters shows how the Air Force is changing. Last fall, the Air Force dropped its first small-diameter bomb, the GBU-39/B, from an F-15E Strike Eagle supporting troops in Iraq. The 250-pound bomb allows jet fighters to carry a larger bombs-to-targets ratio, meaning a pilot can hit multiple suspected terror safe houses and reduce collateral damage.

DOJ_NMG_0112660

The Air Force this summer also helped the Army by sending "several hundred" airmen to ground combat training before deploying to Iraq or Afghanistan. The Army is stressed by frequent war deployments. President Bush announced in December that he will ask Congress to increase the number of soldiers by an unspecified number. The military even has come up with a name for airmen changing their traditional missions. It's called "in-lieu-of."

The war on terror is also putting an unprecedented demand on the Predator, an unmanned aerial vehicle that can spy on the enemy and unleash deadly Hellfire missiles. The Air Force message called it "one of the most sought-after weapons by combatant commanders."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Will Seek Aid, Jobs Funds To Bolster Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's new strategy for Iraq, which the president is set to announce next week, will include a big boost in spending to fund reconstruction, economic growth and job creation, as part of a broader effort to help embattled Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

People familiar with the matter say that Mr. Bush will detail his request for billions of dollars in new aid for Iraq next week in an eagerly awaited speech on his strategy to contain sectarian violence there and clear the way for an eventual U.S. military withdrawal. In his speech, Mr. Bush will also call for the deployment of as many as 20,000 additional American combat troops to Iraq as part of a controversial "surge" designed to stabilize Baghdad and other violent regions of the country.

The administration's emerging Iraq strategy, which it is calling "The New Way Forward," will also include an effort to funnel U.S. money to moderate Iraqi political parties as a means of building a centrist political coalition to support Mr. Maliki, according to people familiar with the matter.

The proposals are part of what is shaping up as an effort by Mr. Bush to retool his Iraq strategy across all fronts. The measures are certain to prove controversial and could set the administration on a collision course with the new Democratic-controlled Congress, which was formally sworn in yesterday3.

Other pieces of that strategy began falling into place yesterday, as the president made additional changes in his national-security team. Those changes will leave a significantly different cast of diplomatic and military policy makers in charge of implementing the new strategy.

Administration officials said Mr. Bush is likely to nominate Navy Adm. William Fallon to replace Gen. John Abizaid as the head of the U.S. military's Central Command, which is responsible for leading the war efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan. Mr. Bush will also tag Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to replace Gen. George Casey as the top American military commander in Iraq.

In addition, White House officials said that Mr. Bush plans to nominate Zalmay Khalilzad, now U.S. ambassador to Iraq, as the next American ambassador to the United Nations.

· The News: The new Bush strategy on Iraq will include more money as well as troops, to boost reconstruction.

· What's at Stake: The plan calls for spending billions of dollars beyond the sum already provided in economic assistance.

· What's Next: The plan, to be unveiled next week, could set Bush on a collision course with congressional Democrats.

The changes come just weeks after Mr. Bush ousted former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, the policy maker most closely identified with the old Iraq strategy, which the administration acknowledges has failed.

Most Democrats have already expressed opposition to the idea of temporarily boosting the number of U.S. combat personnel in Iraq, and have instead coalesced around a proposal to begin withdrawing American military forces from Iraq later this spring.

Democratic leaders have ruled out trying to stymie the administration by barring funding for the additional forces, however. The new aid request for Iraq could emerge as a bigger flash point with Congress than the troop surge, in part because Democrats may view the proposed aid as an investment in an Iraqi government about which they have developed doubts.

The new Iraq money would come on top of the more than $20.9 billion that has already been spent on large-scale, U.S.-funded reconstruction projects in the country that have largely failed to restore the country's electricity output, water supply or sewage capabilities to prewar levels. The costly effort to rebuild Iraq's war-shattered infrastructure has been mired in controversy from the very beginning because most of the money went to large American contractors like Bechtel Group Inc., rather than smaller Iraqi firms.

A range of U.S. government audits later found evidence that the administration had seriously mismanaged the rebuilding effort, allowing billions of dollars to be misspent or lost to outright fraud and corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0112661

The new aid would be different, because it would be meant to go largely to Iraqis and Iraqi companies, rather than to large American contractors, officials said.

Still, Democrats have promised stringent oversight of funds spent on Iraq, and they will now have extensive influence over how much money is allocated and how it is spent. Democrats are also deeply skeptical about Mr. Maliki's intentions and capabilities, and are likely to resist any White House effort to funnel more money to him and his allies.

Expanded White House support for Mr. Maliki could also run counter to some recommendations made in a recent report by the Iraq Study Group, the panel of outside experts Congress formed to suggest changes in Iraq policy. The panel urged Mr. Bush to condition future American military and economic support on the Shiite-led Iraqi government's making the tough political compromises needed to restart Iraq's stalled political process by drawing in the country's Sunni minority. Mr. Maliki has to date failed to take such steps, and the rushed and chaotic execution of deposed Iraqi ruler Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, last weekend ratcheted Iraq's sectarian tensions even higher.

Administration officials say they are still putting the finishing touches on the economic aspects of the new Iraq strategy, but say the broad contours have largely been decided upon. One official involved in devising the new Iraq strategy said the administration hopes that the expanded job-creation and economic-development programs would make it harder for militias and insurgent groups in Iraq to recruit jobless young men.

The State Department section of the administration's fiscal year 2008 budget will ask lawmakers to appropriate $1.46 billion in aid for the Iraqi government, according to people familiar with the matter. These people said the request includes $335 million in security-related aid, $373 million in funding designed to help spur economic growth and $239 million for education and job creation. The largest share of the new money, $486 million, would go toward Iraqi political parties, human-rights groups and other players in the country's nascent democratic system.

The administration will request additional Iraq-related money in a supplemental spending bill that will be presented to lawmakers along with the standard budget.

The supplemental spending bill will ask for a "significant increase" in the money allocated to the so-called Commander's Emergency Response Program, which gives military officers in Iraq money they can use on small-scale reconstruction and job-creation projects that they hope will help stabilize the areas they patrol, according to a senior Pentagon official.

A second senior official said the increase could double the current size of the program from $720 million this past year to more than $1 billion in 2007.

Bush Talks To Al-Maliki, Set To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

President Bush, who will announce a new strategy for the Iraq war next week, spoke with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for nearly two hours yesterday, and said last night that he had been trying to determine whether Mr. al-Maliki "has the will necessary to do the hard work to protect his people."

"I told him, I said that you show the will, we will help you," Mr. Bush said in a brief White House press conference with German Chancellor Angela Merkel. "I believe Prime Minister Maliki has the will necessary to make the tough decisions. That's one of the things I learned today."

Mr. Bush said he was "in the process of making up my final decision as to what to recommend" on a way forward in Iraq, where more than 3,000 U.S. troops have died since the war began in March 2003.

"I'll be ready to outline a strategy that will help the Iraqis achieve the objective of a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself sometime next week," Mr. Bush said. "I've still got consultations to go through. Whatever decision I make, though, will be all aimed at achieving our objectives."

Mrs. Merkel, who will wield extraordinary clout among European leaders as she is simultaneously president of the European Union and host of the Group of Eight summit, said she will urge her neighbors to support efforts to stabilize Iraq.

"Allow me to say although Germany is not militarily present in Iraq, we have every interest in seeing Iraq taking a turn for a more peaceful development where people no longer need to be in fear of their lives, and that politically we shall do everything we can in order to give support to such a positive development," she said through a translator.

Mr. Bush next week is expected to order a "surge" -- a short-term increase of U.S. troops -- in Iraq, and the White House said yesterday that the president and Mr. al-Maliki agreed on the need to call in enough military to quell the sectarian violence that has spiraled out of control.

The two leaders spoke by secure video conference, with about half of the conversation limited to the president and prime minister and their translators, press secretary Tony Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0112662

The top generals in the Army and the Marine Corps have said recently that any increase of troops needs to be coupled with a well-defined strategy to secure and stabilize Iraq. Mr. Bush said yesterday that is precisely what he will demand.

"One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished," he said.

Mr. Bush also said he wished the execution of Saddam Hussein "had gone in a more dignified way," but noted that the deposed Iraqi dictator "was given justice; the thousands of people he killed were not."

Shortly after Saddam was hanged last week, a video appeared on the Internet showing him being taunted before his execution. The video has sparked a firestorm across the Middle East and in Washington, where reporters have questioned the White House daily about it.

"One thing is for certain: A horrific chapter in Iraqi history has been closed. And now we're talking about a more hopeful chapter for the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush said.

The president, who met for more than an hour with Mrs. Merkel and discussed matters such as global trade, the genocide in Darfur, the environment, Lebanon, Iran and the war in Afghanistan, praised the German chancellor for her support of a strong U.N. Security Council resolution to punish Iran for continuing its uranium-enrichment program.

"It was an important message to send Iran that the free world wants there to be a peaceful future, and we don't see a peaceful future with the Iranians developing a nuclear weapon," he said.

The short press conference in the Cross Hall of the White House ended on a humorous note. After shaking hands with the German leader, Mr. Bush smiled impishly and said, "No back rubs," a reference to criticism he received when he briefly massaged her shoulders last year at a G-8 meeting in St. Petersburg. The chancellor smiled, and the two headed off to dinner.

Bush Making Changes In His Iraq Team (WP)

By Robin Wright And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

President Bush is overhauling his top diplomatic and military team in Iraq, as the White House scrambles to complete its new war policy package in time for the president to unveil it in a speech to the nation next week, officials said.

But the White House is struggling to overcome deep differences among advisers over both the deployment of additional U.S. troops and whether the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can deliver long-delayed political and military actions, according to officials familiar with the debate.

With significant policy details left to be worked out this weekend, the administration is nonetheless moving ahead on several personnel changes. It is set to announce that Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who gained fame for his early success in training Iraqi troops and securing a volatile city in northern Iraq, will replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr. as commander of the multinational forces in Iraq, officials say.

The administration also intends to nominate Navy Adm. William J. Fallon to head the Central Command, replacing Gen. John P. Abizaid as the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East. Some military officials consider Fallon an unusual choice, because he is a naval officer in charge of the Pacific Command with limited experience in the Middle East and would be in charge of two ground wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

On the diplomatic side, the White House will appoint veteran U.S. diplomat Ryan C. Crocker, the current envoy to Pakistan, who began his career in the 1970s in Iraq, as the new ambassador to Baghdad. The controversial current ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, will be nominated to become the top U.S. envoy at the United Nations, replacing John R. Bolton, U.S. officials say.

The president is tentatively set to speak on Wednesday about his new plan for Iraq, with Maliki due to unveil his own new security plan a day or two before. Bush spoke for almost two hours with Maliki yesterday by videoconference, half of which was just the two of them and translators.

Maliki pledged to Bush that he will announce the deployment of three additional Iraqi army brigades to help secure Baghdad, U.S. officials said. The Iraq commitment would be in the neighborhood of some 4,500 troops, according to their brigade strengths.

After a meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel yesterday, Bush told reporters he had a good conversation with Maliki. "One thing I was looking for was . . . to determine whether or not he has the will necessary to do the hard work to protect his people," Bush said.

On deploying new U.S. troops in Iraq, Bush pledged to make sure that the mission is "clear and specific and can be accomplished."

But deep divisions remain between the White House on one side and the Joint Chiefs and congressional leaders on the other about whether a surge of up to 20,000 troops will turn around the deteriorating situation, according to U.S. officials.

DOJ_NMG_0112663

The U.S. military is increasingly resigned to the probability that Bush will deploy a relatively small number of additional troops -- between one and five brigades -- in part because he has few other dramatic options available to signal U.S. determination in Iraq, officials said. But the Joint Chiefs have not given up making the case that the potential dangers outweigh the benefits for several reasons, officials said.

There are already signs that a limited U.S. escalation, even when complemented by new political and economic steps, may not satisfy either supporters or critics of a surge. Pentagon officials and military experts say far more troops are needed to make a real difference, but the United States would have to remobilize reserves, extend current tours of duty and accelerate planned deployments just to come up with 20,000 troops, U.S. officials say. And such a surge would strap the military for other potential crises, they add.

After more than a month of interagency discussions chaired by deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch II, deep differences also remain among administration officials over the fundamental question of whether Iraq's Shiites can pull together a moderate political center.

Washington needs Baghdad to provide military manpower to confront the illegal Shiite militias that are fueling sectarian violence and to take political steps to accommodate Sunni grievances, notably in promised but long-delayed amendments to the new constitution.

But the crude execution of Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi government's insistence that two top officials of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, who were captured in a U.S. military raid, had to be handed back to Tehran have fueled U.S. concern that the government is under the partial control of Shiite militias and Iran. Though the White House has officially endorsed Maliki, U.S. officials are divided about whether the prime minister will really deliver, particularly badly needed Iraqi troops.

Last summer, Iraq failed to provide promised troops in Operation Together Forward, the highly publicized effort to secure Baghdad. Maliki pledged six battalions but provided only two -- and has not delivered the remainder, according to U.S. officials. Iraqi troops are essential to hold areas of the city after they are cleared of insurgents and other threats. The joint operation has instead resulted in escalating violence and increased U.S. and Iraqi deaths.

Some Iraqi units ordered to the capital suffered serious attrition or simply refused to go, which also happened in earlier joint U.S.-Iraqi operations. The AWOL rates among Iraqi units have averaged 5 to 8 percent but can rise to more than 50 percent when units are directed to deploy outside their normal areas of operation, according to a recent Pentagon report.

There is currently no military judicial system in the Iraqi army, and Iraqi commanders do not have the legal leverage to compel their soldiers into combat, according to the Pentagon. U.S. military commanders have long expressed frustration over the Iraqi military's failure to provide sufficient troops.

After yesterday's videoconference, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president did not press Maliki to crack down on Shiite militias because Maliki brought it up himself. "The prime minister stressed his determination to go after anybody responsible for violence," Snow said. "That would include not only insurgent groups and Saddam loyalists, but also militias within Iraq."

Bush also spoke for the first time yesterday about Hussein's execution, saying he wished the proceedings had unfolded in a "more dignified way."

But he said Hussein was given justice. "My personal reaction is that Saddam Hussein was given a trial that he was unwilling to give the thousands of people he killed," Bush said. "He was given a fair trial, something he was unwilling to give thousands of Iraqi citizens who he brutalized."

The White House declined to comment yesterday on its personnel moves, but a senior administration official said the changes are a precursor to revamping policy. "It is appropriate to have the people in place as soon as possible to implement the new policy," said the official, who declined to be identified because the president has not made his announcement.

Bush is expected to announce today that Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte will return to the State Department as deputy to Condoleezza Rice, and retired Navy Adm. John M. McConnell will take the top U.S. intelligence job, U.S. officials say. McConnell directed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996 under President Bill Clinton.

As part of his congressional consultations before next week's speech, Bush has invited a group of lawmakers to talk today about Iraq, including moderate Democratic Sens. Ben Nelson (Neb.) and Blanche Lincoln (Ark.). He will meet with more lawmakers on Monday.

Staff writers Glenn Kessler, Ann Scott Tyson and Peter Baker contributed to this report.

Why America Should Operate From Iraq's Borders (FT)

By Dov Zakheim

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112664

As the US administration has made very clear, the report of the Iraq Study Group will in no way represent the final word on American strategy in Iraq. The White House accepts that there has to be a change in approach. But its underlying premises - that Iraq's sectarian strife is not a civil war and that the keys to a stable Iraq are a stable Baghdad and Anbar province - are the same as before. These assumptions need to be revisited, fast.

As government has followed government in Baghdad, the promise of strength has been succeeded by the reality of weakness, incompetence and corruption. Meanwhile, too many Americans are being maimed or dying in a war that seems to have no end and no clear path to victory. It is not enough for government officials to mourn the dead or to hand out medals and personalised coins to the wounded. We must give our forces a fighting chance to succeed in their mission. This is not the case at present.

There is no doubt that Iraq is enmeshed in a bitter civil war. The US has had minimal impact on the course of that war. Iraqi casualties continue to mount, as do the number of Iraqis who have decided to kill their fellow citizens. Americans are caught in the crossfire. They cannot stop the sectarian forces that are determined to kill one another. The US could not do so in Lebanon during the 1980s and cannot do so today in Iraq.

It is equally clear that democracy, as it is understood in the west in general and in Washington in particular, is nowhere in sight in Iraq. It is hardly the highest priority for most Iraqis. What they want is stability. So do their neighbours throughout the region.

Continuing to rely on the Iraqi government to provide stability throughout the country is doomed. But pulling out of Iraq would further undermine stability in the region as a whole. Thus the US objective should be framed in terms of the wider region: stopping Iraq from launching attacks against its neighbours, preventing any invasion by Turkey in the north and barring Iranian domination in the south.

The first step is recognising that primary responsibility for pacifying Baghdad, where we are having minimal success and suffering the most casualties, lies with the Iraqi army and police. Efforts to train the Iraqis to cope with the civil war that has ravaged their capital must be stepped up. But why train them while they are in harm's way? Only when they are truly ready for combat should they be deployed to Baghdad or other violent areas.

Then the US must reposition its forces to foster regional stability and minimise casualties. Up to two brigades should be devoted to Kurdistan and a roughly equal number to the far west of Anbar province.

The forces in Kurdistan would help forestall a Kurdish declaration of independence that would prompt a Turkish invasion. The troops in western Iraq would help prevent both terrorist infiltration into Jordan and serious incursions from Syria. They would also indicate to Damascus that it should not misinterpret a readiness to talk as a concession.

The Pentagon should also move a division-sized force to the south, with a significant presence on the border with Iran. Tehran must understand that the US will not tolerate its domination of Iraq's south. Nor, as with Syria, would Washington's willingness to talk mean a readiness to appease.

Finally, US allies must be pressed to take the lead in establishing a network of provincial reconstruction teams similar to those that have met with some success in Afghanistan.

No doubt some will see this as the US giving up on democracy and being content to stand by as Iraqis kill each other. Yet clearly democracy in Iraq must await the end of the civil war. The quicker the Iraqis can be trained and equipped, the quicker the warring parties will exhaust themselves. It took 14 years in Lebanon; it is still notcompletely over in the Balkans. Peace will not come any time soon in Iraq, but the war need not last as long as a decade if there is a viable Iraqi army in place.

We should not "cut and run". Nevertheless, by assigning the lead for military operations in Baghdad where it properly belongs, with the Iraqi forces, the US can refocus. With a total force that would probably not exceed 75,000 troops, buttressed by perhaps 15,000 troops in the southern Gulf, the Pentagon could ease pressure on the active forces and reserves. At the same time, US forces could give better training to more Iraqi soldiers and police - in relative safety.

By operating from Iraq's borders American forces would be well placed to prevent the establishment of terrorist training camps anywhere in Iraq, including Anbar province. In addition, it ensures that US forces have a realisable mission. They may be unable to bring stability to all of Iraq, but they can certainly bring a degree of stability to the region. The US can thus reassert its leading role in a peaceful Middle East.

The strategic shift would bring relief to our overstretched and over-deployed military. It would reduce combat losses. Above all, it would give the military a mission that they can achieve. This way we can finally bring to an end a bitter domestic debate over Iraq policy that has so undermined public faith in the judgment and wisdom of their leaders on both sides of the political aisle.

The writer was US under-secretary of defence (comptroller) from 2001 to 2004

The Hanging: Beyond Travesty (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0112665

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Of the 6 billion people on this Earth, not one killed more people than Saddam Hussein. And not just killed but tortured and mutilated -- doing so often with his own hands and for pleasure. It is quite a distinction to be the preeminent monster on the planet. If the death penalty was ever deserved, no one was more richly deserving than Saddam Hussein.

For the Iraqi government to have botched both his trial and execution, therefore, and turned monster into victim, is not just a tragedy but a crime -- against the new Iraq that Americans are dying for and against justice itself.

In late 2005, I wrote about the incompetence of the Hussein trial and how it was an opportunity missed. Instead of exposing, elucidating and irrefutably making the case for the crimes of the accused -- as was done at Nuremberg and the Eichmann trial -- the Iraqi government lost control and inadvertently turned it into a stage for Hussein. The trial managed to repair the image of the man the world had last seen as a bedraggled nobody pulled cowering from a filthy hole. Now coiffed and cleaned, he acted the imperious president of Iraq, drowning out the testimony of his victims in coverage seen around the world.

That was bad enough. Then came the execution, a rushed, botched, unholy mess that exposed the hopelessly sectarian nature of the Maliki government.

Consider the timing. It was carried out on a religious holiday. We would not ordinarily care about this, except for the fact that it was in contravention of Iraqi law. It was done on the first day of Eid al-Adha as celebrated by Sunnis. The Shiite Eid began the next day, which tells you in whose name the execution was performed.

It was also carried out extra-constitutionally. The constitution requires a death sentence to have the signature of the president and two vice presidents, each representing one of the three major ethnic groups in the country (Sunni, Shiite and Kurd). That provision is meant to prevent sectarian killings. The president did not sign. Nouri al-Maliki contrived some work-around.

True, Hussein's hanging was just and, in principle, nonsectarian. But the next hanging might not be. Breaking precedent completely undermines the death penalty provision, opening the way to future revenge and otherwise lawless hangings.

Moreover, Maliki's rush to execute short-circuited the judicial process that was at the time considering Hussein's crimes against the Kurds. He was hanged for the killing of 148 men and boys in the Shiite village of Dujail. This was a perfectly good starting point -- a specific incident as a prelude to an inquiry into the larger canvas of his crimes. The trial for his genocidal campaign against the Kurds was just beginning.

That larger canvas will never be painted. The starting point became the endpoint. The only charge for which Hussein was executed was that 1982 killing of Shiites -- interestingly, his response to a failed assassination attempt by Maliki's Dawa Party.

Maliki ultimately got his revenge, completing Dawa's mission a quarter-century later. However, Saddam Hussein will now never be tried for the Kurdish genocide, the decimation of the Marsh Arabs, the multiple war crimes and all the rest.

Finally, there was the motley crew -- handpicked by the government -- that constituted the hanging party. They turned what was an act of national justice into a scene of sectarian vengeance. The world has now seen the smuggled video of the shouting and taunting that turned Saddam Hussein into the most dignified figure in the room -- another remarkable achievement in burnishing the image of the most evil man of his time.

Worse was the content of the taunts: "Moqtada, Moqtada," the name of the radical and murderous Shiite extremist whose goons were obviously in the chamber. The world saw Hussein falling through the trapdoor, executed not in the name of a new and democratic Iraq but in the name of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose death squads have learned much from Hussein.

The whole sorry affair illustrates not just incompetence but also the ingrained intolerance and sectarianism of the Maliki government. It stands for Shiite unity and Shiite dominance above all else.

We should not be surging American troops in defense of such a government. This governing coalition -- Maliki's Dawa, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and Sadr's Mahdi Army -- seems intent on crushing the Sunnis at all costs. Maliki should be made to know that if he insists on having this sectarian war, he can well have it without us.

Dynamic Ideas For Iraq (WSJ)

By Dan Senor And Roman Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

The president is on the cusp of making the most important decision of his second term: increasing our troop presence in Baghdad and Anbar in an effort to stave off Iraqi civil war. A troop surge into Baghdad will not solve problems overnight. But by helping to establish security, more troops can weaken the insurgency, which is the first step to addressing most of Iraq's other problems, including the growth of Shiite militias. Here are things for the president to consider as he moves forward:

No more half measures. With a possible troop increase gaining steam, some military officers at the Pentagon and in Baghdad are advocating only a temporary and minor increase of forces which they view as a reasonable compromise from their minimalist position. But 10,000-15,000 more troops would be insufficient to stabilize Baghdad and at the same time maintain a strong presence in Anbar, where the insurgency is likely to spill over if chased out of the capital. Such an approach would replicate the failures of "Operations Together Forward I and II" in 2006, when troop increases of 7,000 and 3,500 were unable to bring down the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0112666

In light of the deteriorating situation in Iraq -- and the president's anemic poll ratings -- this may be his last opportunity to shift his Iraq policy for good. This means erring on the side of more troops, not fewer -- even if it is politically painful in the short run. If the president decides to add more troops, he will not score points at home for deciding on a smaller increase. Any size surge will be controversial. So he should go for a number that maximizes chances for success.

A new military strategy calls for military leaders who "own" the change. Donald Rumsfeld has been cast as the architect of our current military strategy -- focused on training Iraqi soldiers and minimizing the U.S. footprint. But outgoing Central Command Chief John Abizaid and Iraq Commanding Gen. George Casey have also been firm backers of Mr. Rumsfeld's approach.

A fresh plan centered around a surge in troops will require military leaders who are as invested in the new strategy as Gens. Abizaid and Casey are behind the current approach. Gen. Jack Keane, a former vice chief of the U.S. Army, has been an instrumental advocate for a substantial surge. He is well-respected among the Pentagon brass, rank-and-file troops and civilian policy makers. The president should call him out of retirement and appoint him to head Central Command, as Gen. Abizaid's successor. He should also send Lt. Gen. David Petraeus -- a two-tour Iraq veteran who just finished crafting a new counterinsurgency doctrine for U.S. forces -- back to Baghdad to replace Gen. Casey, who is set to rotate out of Iraq in the coming months.

Economic aid must be matched by dramatic distribution reform. The administration is considering proposals by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and field commanders to pair a troop increase with a funding surge for new Iraq jobs programs. But this only makes sense if there are vast changes in how the new programs are managed by the U.S. and Iraqi bureaucracies.

The funds appropriated by our government barely affect the lives of average Iraqis. This is because large-scale U.S. reconstruction programs continue to be subject to Federal Acquisition Regulations applicable in peacetime. This means that major government contracts for Iraq are subjected, in advance, to the slow and cumbersome "Request For Proposal" process. An even larger cause of the bottleneck is that the Iraqi government lacks the manpower, infrastructure and decisiveness in its ministries to disperse funds effectively. So of those funds appropriated to the Iraqi government, only a small percentage ever moves from the government to the Iraqi people.

To make a "New Deal"-style jobs program work in Iraq, the president should propose that Congress streamline the acquisition process to allow for rapid project approval, following the model of the enormously successful Commander's Emergency Response Program. He should also appoint a respected retired military leader or business executive with expertise in logistics management to oversee distribution of aid on the ground. Anything related to funding and contracting for Iraq is understandably a sensitive issue, especially given the new Democratic majority's focus on oversight. So the president should ask the Democratic congressional leadership to propose a candidate for this position of "counterinsurgency economic czar."

Continue to support democracy and constitutionalism. As the situation has grown worse, some have called for abandoning the goal of democracy. If giving up on democracy could magically solve Iraq's other problems, it might be worth considering. But dropping support for democracy would be radically destabilizing. Shiite and Kurdish leaders would fear a move to disenfranchise their communities and restore a Sunni strongman to power. Instead, the president should continue to seek political solutions -- alongside a new security strategy -- via existing political and constitutional structures. This is an area where he deserves enormous credit: His commitment to democracy has been admirably steadfast.

Become the briefer in chief. When announcing the troop surge, the president should also announce that he will come before the American people every four weeks with a prime-time update on the war. The goal should be to emulate FDR's wartime fireside chats, when Americans were told to be ready with their atlases so they could follow along. Each month, President Bush could provide Americans a live update -- perhaps alongside his commanders, with maps, statistics, etc. -- charting progress from the previous four weeks and outlining metrics for the next month.

This would be a dramatic change in the president's public management of the war, to be sure. But the hands-off, "trust-my-generals" style is not working. Rightly or wrongly, too many citizens believe the president does not own his military campaign. Now is the time to change the dynamic.

Messrs. Senor and Martinez served as foreign-policy advisers to the Bush administration, based in Baghdad from April 2003 through June 2004.

New Congress Leery Of Bush's Iraq Plans (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112667

WASHINGTON — As President Bush prepares a major new initiative for Iraq, he confronts a wary and distrustful new Congress eager for solutions but unconvinced the administration can chart a successful exit from the war.

The new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate are reluctant to assume responsibility for the war, leaving unclear Congress' willingness to block any troop escalation or to compel Bush to change strategy.

As lawmakers convened Thursday, the misgivings highlighted how difficult it will be for the president to achieve anything close to consensus as he plots a new course in Iraq.

Democrats and Republicans voiced deep reservations about any plan that would send more troops to Iraq.

They also complained about how little they knew of the president's plans, warning that the lack of information further impeded congressional support.

"The president will need strong friends," said Indiana Sen. Richard G. Lugar, the senior Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee. Complaining that he had heard nothing from Bush, he added: "There need to be some informed persons if there is to be support for the president's proposal…. You need people on the takeoff if they are going to be there on the landing."

Next week, Bush is expected to unveil a new Iraq plan that would feature at least a temporary increase in troop levels in an effort to control sectarian violence.

Troop increases have been endorsed by a few lawmakers, including Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.).

But such a proposal is certain to be fiercely opposed by most Democrats.

For months, the party's leaders have been calling for the president to embrace various scenarios that would start the withdrawal of troops. On Thursday, they reiterated their views.

"The president's new plan must ensure the Iraqis take responsibility for their own future," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said on the chamber's floor as he assumed his new post.

The plan also "must remove our troops from a dangerous civil war," he said.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he would reintroduce a resolution calling for a phased withdrawal of troops starting this year unless Bush sets a timetable for removing them from Iraq.

A similar move sponsored by Levin and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) failed last year.

Levin — who is one of five Democratic committee leaders in the Senate and House who plan hearings this month that are expected to spotlight criticisms of the administration's handling of the war — said Thursday that any temporary increase in troops must include conditions on the Iraqi government.

"You could condition a surge [in troops] on the Iraqis actually meeting political milestones" that signify a functioning government, Levin said.

Perhaps most ominously for Bush, it is not just Democrats who are expressing concern about what he may announce.

Many Republicans, who until recently have overwhelmingly backed his foreign policy, fretted that the administration's plans to significantly reduce sectarian violence in Iraq remained unclear.

"We need to know what the mission is and what it will take to do the mission," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Texas Republican close to the president.

A few months ago, Hutchison called for more troops in Iraq; on Thursday, she said she was unsure that would be the wisest course.

"This is a hard call right now," said Hutchison, who added that she had not had any conversations with the White House about Bush's announcement.

Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said any troop increase would have to be accompanied by a political plan to advance reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis.

If the new strategy "is going to be well-received by both Republicans and Democrats, there has to be substance and objectives" that advance that goal, he said.

Some Republicans appear unwilling to accept troop increases under any conditions.

"Baghdad needs reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis. It doesn't need more Americans in the cross hairs," said Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, who recently visited Iraq and who is to seek reelection in 2008.

Five to 10 GOP senators are wavering in their support for any White House initiative to boost troop levels, said an aide to a senior Republican lawmaker. The aide requested anonymity when discussing the opinions of the senators.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who also is up for reelection next year, said that on a recent trip to Iraq, an American general told her confidentially that a jobs program for Iraqis would be more effective in reducing violence than an increase in U.S. troop levels.

The White House has begun to reach out to some lawmakers, including Coleman and Sununu; they said they had been invited to the White House today.

DOJ_NMG_0112668

Other lawmakers have similar meetings scheduled Monday, said Senate Assistant Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

"We're going to have some more consultation," Lott said, declining to discuss any details.

Iowa Republican Sen. Charles E. Grassley, who said he had not heard anything from the White House yet, said Bush needed to reach out to build support for a revised policy.

"It will be foolhardy for the president to come up with a new plan and not involve Congress," Grassley said.

McCain Reaffirms Support For US Troop 'Surge' In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, January 5, 2007

US Senator John McCain reaffirmed his support for the deployment of thousands of additional US troops in Iraq, a proposal expected to figure in President George W. Bush's upcoming reassessment of US strategy there.

"When I raise my hand and vote to send young men and women, American men and women into harm's way and fight a war, I am committing to accomplishing the mission," McCain, an early frontrunner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, told MSNBC.

He said the fight against Islamic extremism must be joined with renewed fervor.

"The consequences of failure are chaos and disaster. And these people ... want to destroy the United States of America," McCain said.

His remarks came as Bush prepares to announce a shakeup of US Iraq policy, which reportedly could include sending tens of thousands of additional troops to supplement 140,000-strong US force already there.

But a troop surge has found little support in Congress, with McCain one of only very few voices speaking up in favor of such a policy.

McCain takes over this week as the top Republican in the Democrat-led Senate Armed Services Committee. The Democrats took control of the Senate and House of Representatives Thursday following their November elections triumph.

McCain said he believes US soldiers there are equally committed to the goal of fighting on in Iraq.

"I just recently visited them, including some who have been involuntarily extended," said McCain. "The morale is good. They understand what the mission is and they know what they need to do."

"I am convinced that if we leave and lose this conflict, the conflict will spread in the region, there will be chaos, and we will be sending in men and women into harm's way both in the region and other parts of the world," the former Navy pilot and former Vietnam prisoner of war told MSNBC.

"I've said for more than three years, it's long, hard, tough," McCain said.

"It's going to be very, very difficult. And we have to understand that. But we also have understand the sequences of failure."

Short-Circuiting The Surge (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The shift in power heralded by the Democrats' assumption of control in the House and Senate yesterday could lead quickly to a direct confrontation with President Bush if he chooses, as many expect, to "surge" additional troops into Iraq.

The surge, which opponents look upon as a soothing label for an outright escalation of an unpopular war, is seen by most Democrats and some Republicans as a rebuke to the majority whose November ballots signaled a negative verdict on the Iraq war.

They also argue that the surge cannot work because it proposes a military solution to what is primarily a political problem: the increasingly deadly confrontation between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite communities. The violent reaction to the taunting of Saddam Hussein by Shiite executioners underscored the futility of expecting additional U.S. troops to repair the damage done by three years of flawed policies.

But Democrats will barely have time to celebrate their new congressional authority before confronting a hard fact of the American constitutional system: If Bush wants to continue or expand the Iraq war, Congress has precious few tools available to stop the commander in chief.

As a result, Democrats are quietly but urgently seeking ways of pressuring the president to change course, including the possibility of having Congress reconsider its original authorization of force, passed in October 2002.

Even Bush's critics doubt that the broadest measure, cutting off funds for the president's policies, could be effective or has the votes to pass. Yet Bush's opponents will be emboldened if he embarks on a surge, especially if it is not linked to what Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, calls "milestones" for political reconciliation that the Iraqi government will have to reach. Levin, whose views are shared by many Democrats, also insists that any surge should be part of an "overall plan of troop reduction" that would begin "within four to six months."

DOJ_NMG_0112669

Given the limited options, Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, has suggested to his colleagues that the strongest response to the surge would be a congressional resolution explicitly opposing the step.

Whereas cutting off funds is a "hollow threat," Biden said in an interview this week, a congressional resolution could have a powerful effect if it drew support from the significant number of Republican senators who are increasingly alienated from Bush's policies. Biden, who expects to offer his proposal at a meeting of Democratic senators today, argued that an anti-surge resolution might not bind the president but would exert considerable pressure on him to reconsider his approach.

More intriguing, Biden is studying whether Congress might reconsider the original Iraq war resolution, now as out of date as the administration's prewar claims. The resolution includes references to a "significant chemical and biological weapons capability" that Iraq didn't have and repeated condemnations of "the current Iraqi regime," i.e., the Saddam Hussein regime that fell long ago. In effect, the resolution authorizes a war on an enemy who no longer exists and for purposes that are no longer relevant.

Biden candidly acknowledges that it is difficult to find precedent for reconsidering a war resolution. But his idea is not as far-fetched as it might seem, as legal scholars -- including Michael J. Glennon on this page last month -- have noted that the war being fought on behalf of the Maliki government bears little resemblance to the war Congress authorized. Yet his idea of revisiting the authority granted Bush could be a forceful way for Congress to reassert itself and encourage a full-scale debate on the future of American policy in Iraq and in Afghanistan.

Biden, along with many others in both parties, is alarmed that the intense focus on Iraq is distracting attention from a disaster in the making in Afghanistan, with the resurgence of the Taliban. "If we're surging troops anywhere, it should be in Afghanistan," Biden said. Adding troops there would give the United States "the moral high ground" in its quest for more forces from NATO allies.

For his part, Levin believes that an anti-surge resolution has a reasonable chance of passing the Senate. He is also considering pressing for a resolution that he and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) have crafted that calls for benchmarks and a withdrawal plan.

Bush's critics are careful to say they still hope he will abandon the surge idea, which Levin sees as a desperate "Hail Mary" pass. Yes, Bush has the power to order a surge. But if he insists on doing so in the face of widespread skepticism, a president proudly famous for relying on his gut will discover that he faces a Congress that does not regard his instincts as a reliable guide to the defense of American interests.

Jubilant Democrats Assume Control On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — In a day of transition and pageantry, exultant Democrats on Thursday took control of both houses of Congress for the first time in a dozen years and elected the first woman to be speaker of the House.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California took the speaker's gavel at 2:08 p.m. from Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, whom she defeated by a vote of 233 to 202, the 31-seat margin of the new Democratic majority. The floor and the packed galleries erupted in cheers when the vote was announced.

Even Republicans grudgingly acknowledged the unprecedented nature of the day on which a woman ascended to power on Capitol Hill by rising as one to applaud her.

"This is an historic moment," Mrs. Pelosi said in her first remarks as speaker of the 110th Congress. "It's an historic moment for the Congress. It's an historic moment for the women of America. It is a moment for which we have waited for over 200 years."

Earlier in the day, on the other side of the Capitol dome, Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, became majority leader, a result of his party's one-seat victory margin in the November elections.

Both Senator Reid and Speaker Pelosi promised a new era of cooperation after years of partisan passion and gridlock. "Guided by the spirit of bipartisanship," Mr. Reid said, "Democrats are ready to take this country in a new direction."

The House opened the session by passing, by a large bipartisan margin, new ethics rules. [Page A13.]

But there were signs, too, of division among Democrats over how hard to push to undo the fruits of years of Republican rule. Many Democrats say those years moved the nation too far right, but others argue that the big tax cuts and regulatory relaxations are part of the permanent legislative framework that should be accepted. [News analysis, Page A12.]

In her remarks, Mrs. Pelosi delivered the obligatory promise of partnership with Republicans. But she immediately added a blunt warning to Mr. Bush on the war in Iraq.

"The American people rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end," she said, bringing Democrats to their feet.

DOJ_NMG_0112670

She signaled to Mr. Bush that any plan to increase the American military presence in Iraq would meet stiff opposition in the new Congress.

"It is the responsibility of the president to articulate a new plan for Iraq that makes it clear to the Iraqis that they must defend their own streets and their own security," she said, "a plan that promotes stability in the region and a plan that allows us to responsibly redeploy our troops."

Mrs. Pelosi's triumphal 20-minute remarks were frequently interrupted by applause, much like a presidential State of the Union address, which is delivered annually from the same rostrum in the House chamber. Cheering her on from the gallery were members of her family, dozens of California supporters and celebrities including Tony Bennett, Carole King and Richard Gere.

Mr. Boehner sat glum and unmoving in his seat for much of the hour it took to record the vote that put Mrs. Pelosi in the speaker's chair. The former speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, now just a Republican member of Congress from Illinois, stood hunched and hulking by the back rail of the chamber.

Mrs. Pelosi sat on the House floor with several of her grandchildren as her Democratic colleagues rose to record their votes, many adding footnotes. Representative Loretta Sanchez, Democrat of California, said she voted "for the empowerment of all women in the world." Seventy-one women will be in the House, a record.

The jubilant Democratic takeover of the House was an echo of the Republican "revolution" of 1994 in which Republicans took control of the House after 40 uninterrupted years of Democratic dominance.

In the Senate, Vice President Dick Cheney, in his constitutional role as president of the chamber, swore in the members, including 10 new senators, only one a Republican, Bob Corker of Tennessee. A beaming Bill Clinton, accompanied by his daughter, Chelsea, and his mother-in-law, Dorothy Rodham, looked from the gallery as Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York took the oath at the outset of her second term, perhaps dreaming of another oath-taking that might be two years hence.

The first order of business for the new Democratic-led House was passage of a measure to limit gifts to lawmakers from lobbyists and to restrict subsidized flights on private aircraft. The bill is part of a larger package of ethics changes that Democrats are pushing as part of a promise to voters to end what they called a "culture of corruption" in Congress that led to several indictments and resignations of members last year.

Next week, the Democrats plan a 100-hour blitz to raise the minimum wage, lift restrictions on federal financing of embryonic stem cell research and allow the government to negotiate price cuts with pharmaceutical companies for the Medicare prescription drug program, among other matters. By the time they have clocked the 100 hours of legislative debate, House Democrats also plan to have passed bills to cut interest rates on student loans and roll back subsidies for oil and gas producers, seeking to make a statement of priorities, pressure the Senate to act and put an active agenda before the country before Mr. Bush's State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

In an early sign of bipartisanship, Senators Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, and Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, introduced a bill to repeal the individual alternative minimum tax, which is imposing an increasingly heavy burden on middle-income taxpayers.

But before much real business was conducted, Democratic lawmakers adjourned for a round of festivities to celebrate their victories and to lubricate their donors in what resembled nothing so much as a scaled-down presidential inaugural.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who engineered the election of 42 new Democrats to the House as leader of the party's Congressional campaign committee, threw a huge reception at Johnny's Half Shell across the street from the Capitol. Mrs. Pelosi was the host of a gala at the National Building Museum at which Mr. Bennett and Ms. King were scheduled to perform.

Senator Claire McCaskill, the newly elected Democrat from Missouri and one of 16 women in the Senate, seemed a bit in awe after taking the oath of office on Thursday afternoon.

"Anybody who would go through that and not feel overwhelmed with the enormity of the institution and the men and women who have served there would have to be in a coma," Ms. McCaskill said in the lobby outside the Senate chamber. "I'm sure there will be tough times ahead, but it's thrilling to be part of one of this country's enduring institutions."

House Dems Lead Quick Action On Ethics Pelosi Assumes Speaker's Post Amid Pledges Of Bipartisanship (AJC)

By Julia Malone

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 5, 2007

Washington — The 110th Congress opened Thursday with a burst of ceremony, quick action on ethics reform and the historic election of California Rep. Nancy Pelosi as the first female Speaker of the House.

DOJ_NMG_0112671

Democrats took majority control of both houses for the first time in a dozen years with promises of bipartisan cooperation, despite deep divisions over the war in Iraq and a looming 2008 presidential race that has already begun to heat up.

Foreshadowing a possible clash with the Bush administration, Pelosi said the American people in the last election "rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end."

She called on President Bush to "articulate a new plan" on Iraq when he addresses the nation on the subject as early as next week.

However, she stopped short of outlining a Democratic position on the war.

On the Senate side, where the Democratic margin is a mere 51-49 and where the pace is much slower, new Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada was even less specific.

"Iraq is an issue that we all need to work on, and we will work on that," he said as he emerged from a closed-door bipartisan meeting for the entire Senate membership.

He and Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the new minority leader, said they would work across party lines.

By contrast, the new Democratic management of the House was rushing forward on a series of other measures, beginning with dealing with what Pelosi and her party have dubbed the "culture of corruption" that led to lobbying and bribery scandals.

"Let us join together in the first 100 hours to make this Congress the most honest and open in history," Pelosi told the House.

She quickly dispensed with a lingering dispute by allowing the seating of Vern Buchanan, a Republican, to represent the Florida 13th district at least until a legal challenge by Democrat Christine Jennings is resolved over the vote count in that close election.

Then the House leadership speedily guided the first of two major sets of rules changes into passage by a vote of 430-1. Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) cast the sole negative vote.

Among the ethics reforms approved Thursday:

· Members of the House will be barred from accepting gifts from lobbyists.

· Members won't be allowed to accept reimbursement for travel when the trips are arranged by lobbyists or when lobbyists go along (unless the trip involves a college or university).

· Lawmakers won't be able to accept offers from corporations to fly on their private airplanes.

· The House ethics committee will be charged to set guidelines to determine whether a proposed trip sponsored by any outside group is relevant to a member's official duties.

The House, which begins a new five-day legislating week instead of the previous practice of voting chiefly Tuesday through Thursday, is set to approve additional rules today.

These include regulations requiring that members publicly disclose any "earmarked" spending or other benefit they obtain through legislation for their home state or district.

The House is also expected to pass a "paygo" measure that forbids passage of new spending unless the House first agrees to cuts elsewhere or a revenue increase.

Other rules set for adoption are aimed at promoting "civility" in the House and keeping procedures open to public disclosure.

However, the rules drew protests from the Republican minority, as members complained they had not been allowed to offer competing proposals for priorities that Pelosi and the Democrats have set for the first 100 hours of the legislative session.

All of the measures have been slated for action in the next two weeks, without the customary committee hearings and with only limited floor debate. However, unlike the House rules changes, the rest of the legislation would require Senate approval and a presidential signature. Some measures would almost certainly be headed for a presidential veto.

New Congress, Old Fights; Choosing Teams For 2008 (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

DEMOCRATS FACE conflicting pressures on potential Iraq troop "surge."

With Bush preparing to unveil new strategy, Democratic leaders re-affirm commitment not to block troop funding. But Moveon.org plans protest outside speech today by Sens. McCain and Lieberman backing a surge, underscoring ire of Democratic base.

Senate Democrats plan to grill Rice and Gates as part of more than a dozen hearings to mobilize public opposition over next three weeks. Republicans brace for additional defections, while McCain cautions that 20,000 more soldiers might not be enough.

DOJ_NMG_0112672

"There are still people around [Bush] who think things aren't that bad," McCain frets.

HEALTH ISSUES may spark first big clash between Bush and new Congress.

The House votes next week on lifting federal stem-cell research limits, but proponents lack two-thirds needed to override another Bush veto. Senate backers claim the votes to do so, and most Republican 2008 presidential candidates back expanded research. "The ball is in [Bush's] court," says a spokesman for Democratic Senate leader Reid.

Administration aides and pharmaceutical lobbyists say Bush would veto as "price controls" the House Democratic plan to require government negotiations with drug makers for lower Medicare costs. But the Senate may water down the legislation by merely permitting negotiations.

EDWARDS REACHES for feminists' backing while Clinton and Obama ponder options.

Abortion-rights activist Kate Michelman is expected to endorse the former North Carolina senator, who seeks fast new year's start. Aides expect Clinton to signal her candidacy this month, but she says, "I'm not making any decisions yet" as new Congress opens.

Some Democratic operatives question dearth of black campaign professionals on her team as Obama becomes top potential rival.

A Clinton strategist notes that the senator's aide, Patti Solis Doyle, would be the first Hispanic campaign manager ever, and that her staff will "absolutely reflect the diversity of our party."

Obama, back from Hawaii vacation, makes no commitments on candidacy to those interviewing for staff jobs.

CONSUMER GROUPS PREPARE to assail rumored Bush candidate to head Consumer Product Safety Commission, National Association of Manufacturers lobbyist Michael Baroody. "It's sort of astonishing that the administration would pick someone from a regulated industry," says Rachel Weintraub of the Consumer Federation of America. The agency will lose its ability to make rules or levy fines on Jan. 14 unless chairman's vacancy is filled.

PRESSURE TACTIC: The recent arrest of Iranian diplomats in Baghdad, allegedly for ties to militants, was part of Pentagon strategy to ratchet up efforts to curb Tehran's growing influence inside Iraq. "I think you can expect more" in the months ahead, said one official.

NOT SO FAST: FEC admonishes Nascar driver Kirk Shelmerdine for putting Bush-Cheney decal on his car during 2004 campaign. While declining to fine Shelmerdine, the election-watchdog agency said the bumper sticker amounted to an independent expenditure that should have been reported to the FEC.

UPSIDE DOWN? Republican Sen. Sessions of Alabama may find better luck under Democratic control with his bill to reduce the sentencing disparity between crack and powder cocaine. Democratic backers want to eliminate the disparity altogether, arguing it discriminates against black defendants. But they face law-enforcement resistance, leaving Sessions's proposal as a potential compromise.

DINGELL ALARMS FCC Democrats, too.

Back as chairman of House Energy and Commerce panel after 12 years, the Michigan Democrat has blasted the Republican-controlled communications panel. But his statement of "significant concerns" about ATT-BellSouth merger rankled Democratic commissioners. The agency's two Democratic board members had won concessions from AT&T to approve the deal. A Dingell aide said he wasn't referring to the Democrats' actions.

FCC officials brace for frequent Hill trips for oversight hearings.

MINOR MEMOS: More than a decade after President Clinton said "The era of big government is over," liberal activist Bob Borosage proclaims, "The conservative era is over"....In release to members and reporters, new House Majority Leader Hoyer prints Democrats' first-day agenda in typeface called "Comic."

War Foes Set Sights On New Majority (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

As Democrats reveled in their new majority yesterday, anti-war activists complained of cowardice on the Iraq war and pledged that they won't let Democrats cave to President Bush.

Cindy Sheehan, who opposes the war in Iraq, told more than 100 activists who rallied across the street from the Capitol that Democrats are behaving like Republicans and soon will be held to account.

"We're not going to give them a free pass and they found that out yesterday," Mrs. Sheehan said. On Wednesday, Mrs. Sheehan led a group of about 75 protesters who chased top Democrats out of their own press conference with chants of "de-escalate, investigate, troops home now."

DOJ_NMG_0112673

Activists yesterday pledged to keep pressuring Democrats to stop funding the military campaign, force a withdrawal of troops, and investigate and impeach Mr. Bush for what they called "lies" that led to the war. They complained that Democrats continue to vote for war funding and have not put impeachment on their legislative agenda.

"They need a backbone transplant," Ray McGovern, a retired CIA analyst, told the crowd.

Elaine Brower, whose organization sponsored the protest, said House Democrats "need to add to those first 100 hours what we are demanding today."

Democrats plan to hold oversight hearings on the war, but activist David Swanson said that doesn't go far enough.

"Prodding Bush is like teaching calculus to a pig," he said. "They are telling us that impeachment is off the table. They are doing for Bush what Ford did for Nixon: They are pardoning."

The rally was sponsored by World Can't Wait/Drive Out the Bush Regime. The group displayed banners calling Mr. Bush a "torturer," "war criminal" and "murderer."

About 30 hooded protesters in orange jumpsuits argued that the government is sanctioning torture at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. Swanson said the congressional leadership needs to be more aggressive, but it is up to war opponents to take action on impeachment.

"We are going to remove Bush and Cheney from office whether Democrats want it or not," he said.

Mrs. Sheehan, who gained national prominence as a war opponent after her son died while serving in Iraq, told the crowd that her "biggest fear" is that her allies will relax now that Democrats are in charge of Congress.

"They've proven to us that we can't relax," she said.

White House Postponing Loss Of Iraq, Biden Says (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said yesterday that he believes top officials in the Bush administration have privately concluded they have lost Iraq and are simply trying to postpone disaster so the next president will "be the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof," in a chaotic withdrawal reminiscent of Vietnam.

"I have reached the tentative conclusion that a significant portion of this administration, maybe even including the vice president, believes Iraq is lost," Biden said. "They have no answer to deal with how badly they have screwed it up. I am not being facetious now. Therefore, the best thing to do is keep it from totally collapsing on your watch and hand it off to the next guy -- literally, not figuratively."

Biden gave the comments in an interview as he outlined an ambitious agenda for the committee, including holding four weeks of hearings focused on every aspect of U.S. policy in Iraq. The hearings will call top political, economic and intelligence experts; foreign diplomats; and former and current senior U.S. officials to examine the situation in Iraq and possible plans for dealing with it. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will probably testify next Thursday to defend the president's new plan, but at least eight other plans will be examined over several sessions of the committee.

Other witnesses invited for at least 10 days of hearings include former national security advisers and secretaries of state, including Brent Scowcroft, Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, Zbigniew Brzezinski, Henry A. Kissinger, Madeleine K. Albright and George P. Shultz.

Biden expressed opposition to the president's plan for a "surge" of additional U.S. troops and said he has grave doubts about whether the Iraqi government has the will or the capacity to help implement a new approach. He said he hopes to use the hearings to "illuminate the alternatives available to this president" and to provide a platform for influencing Americans, especially Republican lawmakers.

"There is nothing a United States Senate can do to stop a president from conducting his war," Biden said. "The only thing that is going to change the president's mind, if he continues on a course that is counterproductive, is having his party walk away from his position."

Biden said that Vice President Cheney and former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld "are really smart guys who made a very, very, very, very bad bet, and it blew up in their faces. Now, what do they do with it? I think they have concluded they can't fix it, so how do you keep it stitched together without it completely unraveling?"

Shays Says More Troops In Iraq Is A 'Huge Mistake' (HARTC)

By Brian Lockhart

The Hartford Courant, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112674

U.S. Rep. Christopher Shays said yesterday it would be a "huge mistake" to send more American troops to Iraq if that country's government "doesn't do the heavy lifting it has to do."

Shays, R-Bridgeport, was in Hartford for the inauguration of Gov. M. Jodi Rell and swearing-in of members of the General Assembly. He returns to Washington today to begin his 10th term after fending off a second challenge from former Westport First Selectwoman Diane Farrell in November.

He was the only Republican congressman re-elected in Connecticut and New England.

"You're representing all of New England now," a visitor to the Capitol said upon recognizing Shays.

The 4th District congressman said the next two years will be pivotal for America's policies in Iraq.

"We went in on a bipartisan basis and we need to find a way to leave on a bipartisan basis," Shays said.

The Iraq Study Group's report, released a month ago, was a good start, he said.

The bipartisan group "nailed it pretty solidly," Shays said.

The report said the United States must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops in Iraq but warned against a rapid reduction. U.S. combat brigades not needed for force protection could be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008, it said.

President Bush is considering sending tens of thousands more troops to Iraq, where 140,000 are currently stationed.

Though a longtime proponent of the Iraq invasion, Shays said in the final days of his re-election campaign that there should be a timeline for troop withdrawal. After his 15th visit to Iraq last month, Shays said the country is in chaos and reiterated the need for a timeline.

"Saying we're not going to leave until the job is done is an invitation to Iraqis to let us do the job," Shays said at the time.

U.S. Sens. Christopher Dodd and Joseph Lieberman, both D-Conn., took separate trips to the Middle East last month.

Dodd said sending more troops would create additional targets for Iraq's warring factions. Lieberman wrote an opinion piece for the Washington Post - "Why We Need More Troops in Iraq."

Dodd also visited Syria, saying he supports the Iraq Study Group's conclusion that the United States must begin talks with that country.

Lieberman has said turning to Syria for help would be akin to asking an arsonist to help put out a fire.

Dodd and Lieberman also attended Rell's inauguration yesterday.

Shays yesterday would not comment on the senators' observations.

"That's what they believe," Shays said. "Ultimately the president determines foreign policy."

Shays said he asked the White House and State Department if he could visit Syria last month and was advised not to put it on his itinerary.

"I'm sorry they asked me not to," he said, because it is "crazy" not to engage Iraq's neighbors.

He said he supports the Iraq Study Group's proposals to set conditions for transferring more responsibilities from America to Iraq and for mending the rifts between the Sunnis and the Shiite-led government.

Despite his concerns about the war in Iraq, Shays praised last week's execution of toppled dictator Saddam Hussein.

Had Saddam lived, he would have grasped victory from defeat, just as he bolstered his image after the Gulf War, Shays said.

"If he had survived, given all he did, it was a message that he was more powerful than life," Shays said.

Bush Shaking Up Team Responsible For Carrying Out Iraq Strategies (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush is shaking up the team responsible for carrying out his military and diplomatic strategies in Iraq as he prepares to outline a new direction for the war that has raged for nearly four years.

Bush will replace Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the chief general in Iraq, in the coming weeks, according to media reports Thursday. A revamping of the administration's national security team was already underway.

Bush wants to replace Abizaid with Adm. William Fallon, the top U.S. commander in the Pacific, and Casey's replacement will be Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces, the reports citing administration officials said.

Giving Fallon and Petraeus the top military posts in the Middle East would help Bush to assert that he is taking a fresh approach in the region and help pave the way for him to turn policy there in a new direction. Both Abizaid and Casey have expressed reservations about the potential effectiveness of boosting troop strength in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112675

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Defense appropriations subcommittee, told The Associated Press on Thursday that he understands Bush wants to appoint Fallon to head the U.S. Central Command, a position responsible for directing the wars in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

"He's highly knowledgeable and well-educated and respected," Inouye said of Fallon. "I would think that his nomination, if the president is to submit it, would go flying through."

In a news conference Thursday, Bush said that he would go before the nation next week with his long-anticipated speech about the next steps in Iraq. The war was a major factor in the Republicans' loss of Congress and Bush's slide in the polls. More than 3,000 members of the U.S. military have lost their lives in the war.

"I'll be ready to outline a strategy that will help the Iraqis achieve the objective of a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself sometime next week," the president said. "I've still got consultations to go through." Some members of Congress have been invited to the White House on Friday for discussions about Iraq.

Considering more troops to deal with the rising violence in Baghdad, Bush said, "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished." Senior generals have cautioned against sending additional troops unless their role is defined.

Abizaid and Casey have at times sounded skeptical about increasing the size of the U.S. force in Iraq.

In November, Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee that boosting the roughly 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq by 20,000 would have a temporary impact, but he warned that the military's ability to maintain in increase of that size "is simply not something that we have right now."

Casey told reporters in Iraq last month that he is "not necessarily opposed to the idea" of sending in more troops, but said any increase would have to "help us progress to our strategic objectives."

Along with changes in policy in Iraq, Bush is rearranging his national security team. Retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell, a veteran of more than 25 years in the intelligence field, will be named Friday to succeed John Negroponte as national intelligence director, officials said.

In addition, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will be nominated to become the U.S. envoy to the United Nations, according to a senior Bush administration official. He is likely to be replaced in Baghdad by Ryan Crocker, a veteran American diplomat now U.S. envoy to Pakistan.

Bush's new plan for Iraq is expected to contain economic, political and diplomatic components.

Given the need to reduce high unemployment and draw Iraqis away from Shiite militias and the Sunni insurgency, the president is considering loans to businesses. He is looking at getting Iraqis into short-term jobs by proposing a significant increase in the discretionary funds that military commanders can use for reconstruction projects.

Questions about what the president's plan will mean for the U.S. military presence in Iraq have gotten the most attention.

One option presented to Bush calls for an initial infusion of 8,000 to 9,000 troops, mainly to reinforce Baghdad. The option involves sending two additional Army brigades, or roughly 7,000 soldiers, to Baghdad, and two Marine battalions, totaling about 1,500 troops, to western Anbar Province, the center of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

Sen. Ben Nelson, a member of the Armed Services Committee, was one of those asked to Friday's meeting at the White House. Nelson, D-Neb., said he planned to urge the president to resist sending more troops without setting firm conditions.

Bush and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spoke on a secure video hookup for nearly two hours Thursday. He appeared later in the day with German Chancellor Angela Merkel and recounted some of his discussions with al-Maliki.

The president said he talked with the prime minister about the final moments of Saddam's life, when he was taunted before being hanged. An unauthorized video showed images of Saddam's dangling body. The White House has been reluctant to criticize the proceedings, which have been condemned by some world leaders as deplorable.

"My personal reaction is that Saddam Hussein was given a trial that he was unwilling to give the thousands of people he killed," Bush said. "I wish, obviously, that the proceedings had gone on in a more dignified way."

Bush To Make Changes In Key National Security Jobs (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush is preparing to shake up his national security team and bring new faces to the United Nations, the military, the State Department and the U.S. embassy in Iraq, administration officials said Thursday.

In one high-profile shift, Adm. William Fallon, the head of the U.S. Pacific Command, would be nominated to succeed Army Gen. John Abizaid as the commander of the U.S. Central Command. Abizaid, who's been skeptical about the wisdom of sending more troops to Iraq, is scheduled to retire in March.

DOJ_NMG_0112676

Bush is also expected to name a replacement for Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and to appoint the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to be the U.S. representative at the United Nations. Khalilzad's likely replacement in Baghdad is Ryan Crocker, a veteran Mideast expert who's now the U.S. ambassador to Pakistan.

At the same time, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, the nation's top intelligence official and Khalilzad's predecessor as ambassador to Iraq, is in line to be named deputy secretary of state on Friday.

Administration officials discussed the changes on the condition of anonymity because White House policy prohibits discussing personnel moves before they're announced. Some of the contemplated changes could be derailed by last-minute developments.

The overhaul of Bush's military, intelligence and diplomatic team comes as the president is putting the finishing touches on a new strategy for Iraq. He's expected to announce his latest Iraq plan next week.

The president spoke briefly about his emerging Iraq plan after meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel early Thursday evening.

"My thinking is taking shape," Bush said. "I've still got consultations to go through."

The personnel shuffle is in keeping with Bush's desire for a fresh start in Iraq, but it doesn't appear to signal a major shift in policy. All the potential appointees are Bush loyalists who've supported the president's Iraq policy.

Fallon would be the first naval officer to head the Central Command, which oversees all U.S. military operations in South and Central Asia, the Middle East and North Africa. In the Pacific Command, Fallon helped develop a strategy to combat terrorist groups in the Philippines and Indonesia that relied as much on diplomacy and working with local allies as it did on military force.

Khalilzad, a highly regarded diplomat, became a top prospect for the U.N. job when former Ambassador John Bolton resigned in December. Bolton had been appointed to the post when Congress was in recess, and he stepped down when it became clear that he couldn't win Senate confirmation.

Khalilzad, the Bush administration's highest-ranking Muslim, reportedly has been eager to leave Baghdad for months. He's known as a consummate back-room deal maker, having played key roles in helping form the first post-Taliban government in Afghanistan and trying to reconcile Sunni Muslim, Shiite and Kurdish politicians in Iraq.

But his efforts to reach out to Iraq's Sunnis, who launched an insurgency after the fall of the late President Saddam Hussein, made Khalilzad some enemies in Washington, particularly in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, a State Department official said.

Negroponte interrupted his diplomatic career in April 2005 to become the nation's first Director of National Intelligence, a job created in response to the 2001 terrorist attacks.

He's expected to play a major role in helping Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with Iraq policy and efforts to revive Arab-Israeli peace negotiations.

"He's a diplomat's diplomat," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, without confirming the personnel shift. "She has a very good working relationship with him, and he is also somebody who has the confidence of the president."

Retired Navy Vice Admiral Mike McConnell, currently a top executive at the Booz Allen Hamilton consulting firm, is Bush's choice to replace Negroponte in the intelligence job. McConnell formerly headed the National Security Agency.

Bush To Name A New General To Oversee Iraq (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — President Bush has decided to name Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus as the top American military commander in Iraq, part of a broad revamping of the military team that will carry out the administration's new Iraq strategy, administration officials said Thursday.

In addition to the promotion of General Petraeus, who will replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the choice to succeed Gen. John P. Abizaid as the head of the Central Command is expected to be Adm. William J. Fallon, who is the top American military officer in the Pacific, officials said.

The changes are being made as the White House is considering an option to increase American combat power in Baghdad by five brigades as well as adding two battalions of reinforcements to the volatile province of Anbar in western Iraq.

Mr. Bush, who said Thursday that he would present details of his overall strategy for Iraq next week, and several top aides held a video teleconference on Thursday, speaking with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq and his top deputies about plans to add forces in the capital and other matters. The session lasted roughly an hour and 45 minutes.

"I said that 'You show the will, we will help you,' " Mr. Bush told reporters.

Echoing the comments of both military and political advisers in recent weeks, he added, "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished."

DOJ_NMG_0112677

Senior administration officials said that the choice of General Petraeus was part of a broader effort to change almost all of the top American officials in Iraq as Mr. Bush changes his strategy there.

"The idea is to put the whole new team in at roughly the same time, and send some clear messages that we are trying a new approach," a senior administration official said Thursday.

In addition to the military changes, Mr. Bush intends to appoint the ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, as the new United States ambassador to the United Nations, a senior administration official said Thursday.

"It was clearly time to move the players around on the field," said the senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because Mr. Bush had yet to announce the changes. "This helps the president to make the case that this is a fresh start."

Admiral Fallon would be the first Navy officer to serve as the senior officer of the Central Command, which is managing simultaneous ground wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Admiral Fallon is regarded within the military as one of its stronger regional combat commanders, and his possible appointment also reflects a greater emphasis on countering Iranian power, a mission that relies heavily on naval forces and combat airpower to project American influence in the Persian Gulf.

General Petraeus, who is now the head of the Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., helped oversee the drafting of the military's comprehensive new manual on counterinsurgency. He has served two previous tours in Iraq, and some former officers say he sees the need for additional troops in Baghdad.

He will replace General Casey, whose plan for troop reductions in Iraq faltered last year in the face of escalating sectarian strife and who initially expressed public wariness about any short-term increase in troops in Iraq, a move that is now a leading option under consideration by the White House.

The departures of both General Casey and General Abizaid were expected, though in General Casey's case it appears to have been moved up several months from the originally anticipated shift in spring or summer. General Abizaid's tour had already been extended for a full year beyond the typical two-year stint, and he has announced that he will retire soon.

The troop increase option under discussion would focus on improving security in Baghdad. Under this approach, two Army combat brigades would be sent to the capital during the first phase of the operation. A combat brigade generally consists of about 3,500 soldiers. At the same time, a third brigade would be positioned in Kuwait as a reserve, and two more brigades would be on call in the United States.

The expectation is that these three brigades would eventually be sent to Baghdad as well, though the president would have the option to limit the reinforcements. Part of the increase could be achieved by holding some units past their currently scheduled return home.

Scaling up by five brigades would more than double the number of American combat troops involved in security operations in the Iraqi capital. The emphasis on Baghdad reflects the view that stability in the capital is a precondition for any broader effort to bring calm to the whole country. It is also a recognition that the administration sees sectarian violence as a greater threat to Iraq's stability than the Sunni Arab insurgency.

While Baghdad is the principal focus, the option also provides for sending two battalions of reinforcements to Anbar, where overstretched Marine and Army forces have been battling Sunni Arab insurgents. A basic battalion generally consists of 1,200 troops.

One issue under discussion is how to mesh the emerging American strategy with the Iraqis' capabilities. Bush administration officials say they want the increase in American troops to be paralleled by a considerable rise in the number of functional Iraqi troops. But the Iraqis failed in the summer to send all the reinforcements that had been requested, and some Iraqi security forces, particularly the police, have been infiltrated by militias.

Another point of contention is that some senior aides to Mr. Maliki have been notably unenthusiastic about an increase in American troops in Baghdad. During his meeting with Mr. Bush in Jordan in November, Mr. Maliki presented a plan that would shift most Americans to the periphery of Baghdad so they could concentrate on fighting Sunni insurgents while the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government asserted more control over the capital. That has left some American officials wondering whether the Maliki government was making a legitimate bid to exercise sovereignty or is committed to a sectarian Shiite agenda.

Bush administration officials believe that their new Iraqi strategy must involve political steps toward reconciliation and reconstruction programs to produce jobs.

In their teleconference, Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki discussed the Iraqi government's efforts at political reconciliation and the Iraqi prime minister's vows to rein in militias, the pace of which American officials have found painfully slow. Discussing the execution of Saddam Hussein, Mr. Bush said the Maliki government was right to investigate the circumstances surrounding the hanging.

General Petraeus participated in the initial invasion of Iraq as the commander of the 101st Airborne Division. The division fought its way toward Baghdad and was later sent to Mosul in northern Iraq, where the general focused on political and economic reconstruction efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0112678

"We are in a race to win over the people," read a sign in his Mosul headquarters. "What have you and your element done today to contribute to victory?"

General Petraeus did a second tour in Iraq in which he oversaw the efforts to train the Iraqi Army. At his current post at Fort Leavenworth, he has been involved in the push to change the United States Army's training and education to emphasize counterinsurgency operations.

Jack Keane, the retired Army general who served as vice chief of the Army, called General Petraeus an "imaginative commander who is experienced and knows how to deal with irregular warfare," as the Army refers to insurgencies.

The Iraq commander post is considered a four-star general's command, a promotion that would add a star to General Petraeus's shoulder.

Officials also said Admiral Fallon received a persuasive recommendation from the Joint Chiefs as one of the military's stronger commanders of a geographic theater, with his current command including the challenges of North Korea and China.

In that capacity, he also took the unusual and punitive move in December of canceling a large, annual field exercise with the Philippines over a local judge's failure to honor the bilateral treaty governing protections for American military personnel. The judge refused to honor the agreement's rule that American military personnel remain in American custody pending final appeal of all criminal proceedings against them, and ordered a marine convicted of rape held in a local jail even though the case was on appeal.

Bush To Reveal New Commanders, War Strategy Next Week (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush intends to name two new military commanders to oversee the war and help establish a new direction in Iraq as part of his shift in strategy to be announced next week, according to a defense official.

Navy Adm. William J. Fallon, currently the commander of all U.S. forces in east Asia and the Pacific, will be nominated as the new head of U.S. Central Command, the military headquarters responsible for operations in the Middle East, replacing retiring Army Gen. John P. Abizaid.

And Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, a veteran of two tours in Iraq, will become the new four-star commander in Iraq, replacing Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. Both would have to be confirmed by the Democratic-controlled Senate for their new posts.

The changes would be among the first major steps in Bush's overhaul of his Iraq policy. They were first reported Thursday night by ABC News and confirmed by the defense official who requested not to be named since the announcement is pending.

Although both Abizaid and Casey were expected to leave their posts early this year, Bush's decision to name their successors at about the same time he unveils his revised strategy is a signal of how thoroughly he intends break from past policies, which he recently conceded are failing.

The choice of Petraeus in particular could have wide-ranging significance. Although his selection does not come as a surprise, Petraeus is closely associated with the push for a more complex counterinsurgency campaign, which would move U.S. soldiers out of their large bases and into smaller outposts in troubled neighborhoods.

Advocates of such a plan argue that it is the only way to gain the confidence of Iraqi civilians and protect them from attacks. Abizaid and Casey have resisted such moves, arguing a more visible U.S. presence would inflame locals and prevent Iraqi forces from shouldering the security burden.

Petraeus has risen quickly through the ranks after earning praise for commanding the 101st Airborne Division during the Iraq invasion.

"Dave Petraeus may be the most talented person I ever met," retired Army Gen. Barry McCafferey said in a recent interview. "He's got phenomenal intellectual gifts."

Petraeus currently oversees most of the Army's leading military colleges, where he supervised work on the new Army and Marine Corps counterinsurgency manual, issued last month. The manual advocated multiple manpower-intensive tactics that would break sharply from many of Casey's views for a lighter U.S. footprint in Iraq.

Bush's selection of Fallon would be more unexpected. Fallon, whose nickname is "Fox," would become the first Naval officer to take command of the Middle East headquarters since its creation in 1983. Because most threats in the region have been land-based, the command, known colloquially as Centcom, has alternated between Army and Marine generals.

Fallon has been viewed as somewhat out of step with Bush administration policy in Asia. He has advocated closer military relationships with China and downplayed the threat posed by North Korea's missile program. In contrast, former Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld repeatedly raised concerns about the North Korean missile program and the lack of transparency of China's military buildup while he was in office.

DOJ_NMG_0112679

Despite Fallon's differences with Rumsfeld, the former fighter pilot and Vietnam veteran is highly regarded within the Pentagon for his willingness to speak his mind and for his openness to subordinates. If he takes the reins of Centcom in March, when Abizaid is expected to retire, he will have served as head of Pacific Command for only a year.

Fallon was not Bush's first choice to head the Pacific Command when he was nominated in January 2005. The White House had originally nominated Air Force Gen. Gregory S. Martin for the command, but was forced to withdraw the selection when Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., objected to his ties to an Air Force officer involved in a procurement scandal.

The selection of a Naval officer to head Centcom could signal the Pentagon's interest in devoting more attention to countries in the region other than Iraq.

Pentagon officials have repeatedly raised concerns about the smuggling of weapons and personnel by terrorist groups on the region's seas, while any military move against Iran would likely rely heavily on ship-based missiles and fighter aircraft.

Concern As Spy Chief Quits To Join Rice (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

John Negroponte's abrupt shift from being the first US director of national intelligence to number two at the State Department reflects continued troubles in the intelligence community and a further concentration of power around Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state.

Analysts see the return of the career diplomat to the State Department as part of a broader and somewhat confused reshuffle of the Bush administration that began with the sacking of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary and has Iraq and the wider Middle East as its focus.

Mr Negroponte's expected replacement by a retired admiral, Mike McConnell, would also mean that key intelligence posts would all be filled by active or former military personnel – an issue of concern to civilians in the community.

Officials said President George W. Bush would announce the changes on Friday, possibly including his nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad, ambassador to Baghdad, as the new US envoy to the UN.

There was also speculation on Thursday night that Ryan Crocker, US ambassador to Pakistan, would replace Mr Khalilzad in Baghdad, and that David Petraeus would replace George Casey, the senior US general in Iraq. Gen Petraeus's appointment would be taken as a signal that the US military could change course in Iraq to emphasise a "hearts and minds" approach, designed to isolate the insurgents and reduce support for sectarian groups.

According to leaks put out by [a news agency] and ABC on Thursday night, Mr Bush is also expected to replace John Abizaid with Admiral William Fallon as head of central command, which oversees the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

With a week to go before Mr Bush is expected to announce his "new way forward in Iraq", the president spoke on Thursday for nearly two hours by video conference with Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister.

Less than two years ago, Mr Negroponte was elevated to co-ordinate all 16 distinct spy agencies following the 9/11 commission probe into the intelligence failures surrounding al-Qaeda's attacks. However, former intelligence officials say that the overhaul only succeeded in creating another layer of bureaucracy with inadequate powers.

Paul Pillar, a former senior CIA analyst who has accused the Bush administration of ignoring the agency's findings before invading Iraq, said Mr Negroponte had been unfairly criticised by some in Congress and that he did not have enough control over the defence department's intelligence operations.

Reuel Gerecht, a former CIA officer and a critic of the agency, called the creation of the director of national intelligence (DNI) a "lame idea".

"It has only made an overstaffed intelligence establishment even fatter," he said.

Another former CIA operative who asked not to be named said Mr Negroponte had never wanted the job and had clashed with Mr Rumsfeld, who controlled more than 80 per cent of the intelligence budget. "Negroponte gave in," he said.

Tensions between the DNI and the Pentagon may ease with the replacement of Mr Rumsfeld by Robert Gates, a former CIA director who has said he wants to yield important Pentagon intelligence activities.

Mr Gates is expected to appoint Lt-Gen James Clapper, who had fallen out of favour with Mr Rumsfeld, as his top intelligence official.

Former intelligence officials said Mr Negroponte was tired of bureaucratic turf wars and wanted to return to his diplomatic career.

Mr McConnell, a former head of the National Security Agency, is tipped to leave his consulting job to replace Mr Negroponte.

Members of Congress expressed dismay at Mr Negroponte's early departure, concerned at the apparent disarray at the top of the intelligence apparatus.

DOJ_NMG_0112680

Mr Negroponte, who was the first post-occupation ambassador to Iraq, brings his experience to the State Department at a time when Ms Rice is focused on shoring up Iraq's government while building alliances among Arab allies to contain Iran and moderate the Palestinian leadership.

At a press conference, Tony Snow, White House spokesman, rolled his eyes at a suggestion that Ms Rice, perhaps the closest in the cabinet to the president and now no longer challenged by Mr Rumsfeld, was set to move on.

Additional reporting by Edward Luce in Washington

Bush Is Expected To Shift U.S. Ambassador In Iraq To U.N. (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — President Bush intends to name Zalmay Khalilzad, the Afghan-born diplomat who has been ambassador to Iraq for the past 21 months, to be the new envoy to the United Nations, part of a diplomatic shakeup as Mr. Bush prepares to announce a new strategy for the war.

A senior administration official, who had been briefed on the decision but had to discuss it anonymously because the change had not been formally announced, confirmed Thursday that the president had decided to nominate Mr. Khalilzad to the United Nations post.

The official said Mr. Bush intended to name Ryan C. Crocker, the ambassador to Pakistan, to replace Mr. Khalilzad in Baghdad.

If confirmed by the Senate, the appointments would put seasoned, respected diplomats into two of the State Department's most challenging posts. Mr. Khalilzad would replace John R. Bolton, who served temporarily as United Nations ambassador but resigned late last year after concluding he could not win Senate confirmation.

Mr. Bush's decision to transfer Mr. Khalilzad, among the most visible Americans working in Iraq, would effectively accomplish two goals for the administration. As a Sunni Muslim, Mr. Khalilzad has been perceived by some Iraqi Shiites as not sympathetic enough to their views; removing him from Baghdad would help Mr. Bush make a fresh start there. And Mr. Khalilzad had told colleagues that he was ready to leave.

The change also would give the United States the strong voice it needs at the United Nations, particularly after the storm surrounding Mr. Bolton.

The senior administration official said the White House believed that Mr. Khalilzad, as a Muslim who had extensive experience overseas including a stint as ambassador to his native Afghanistan, would bring an important understanding of the Muslim world to his work at the United Nations.

Daniel P. Serwer, the executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recently issued a report recommending a new strategy for Iraq, said a Khalilzad nomination would send a message "that we are taking the U.N. seriously and sending somebody who has real weight with this administration, and who has served in our toughest post."

But Leon E. Panetta, a former chief of staff to President Bill Clinton who was one of five Democrats on the study group, said he feared removing Mr. Khalilzad from Baghdad would leave "a vacuum" there at a critical time.

"The problem we've had in Iraq is that the people who finally get to understand how that country works suddenly leave," Mr. Panetta said. "He's probably a pretty good appointment for the U.N., but you do have to be nervous about who is going to speak for us in Iraq."

But some in the administration have suggested that perhaps Mr. Khalilzad has been too prominent a figure in Iraq.

In a classified memorandum written Nov. 8 after visiting Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki in Baghdad, President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said that the president might urge Mr. Khalilzad, who goes by the nickname Zal, to take a lower profile as one way to buttress the Maliki government.

Under the heading "What we can do to help Maliki," Mr. Hadley ticked off a list of suggestions, among them: "Encourage Zal to move into the background and let Maliki take more credit for positive developments. (We want Maliki to exert his authority — and demonstrate to Iraqis that he is a strong leader — by taking action against extremists, not by pushing back on the United States and the Coalition.)"

Unlike the other changes to Mr. Bush's foreign policy team in the last 24 hours, which caught much of Washington off guard, the moves involving Mr. Khalilzad and Mr. Crocker have been the subject of speculation here for weeks, since Mr. Bolton resigned on Dec. 5.

By that time Mr. Khalilzad had already told colleagues that he was ready to for a change of assignment. ABC News first reported the decision about Mr. Khalilzad on its Web site on Thursday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0112681

Educated in Beirut and the United States (he holds a doctorate from the University of Chicago), the blunt-spoken Mr. Khalilzad, 55, has been a prominent figure in American foreign policy circles since the Reagan administration, when he advised the State Department on the Iran-Iraq war and the Soviet war in Afghanistan.

He later joined the administration of the first President Bush, where he earned a reputation as a hawk who called for the ouster of Saddam Hussein, advice that administration did not take. More recently, senior administration officials say, he was considered for the No. 2 State Department job that John D. Negroponte is expected to take.

Mr. Crocker, 57, has been a Foreign Service officer since 1971 and is among the State Department's most respected voices in the Middle East. He has been ambassador to Pakistan since 2004, and has served as ambassador to Syria, Kuwait and Lebanon.

Negroponte Moves To Job Considered Crucial At State Dept. (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

John D. Negroponte's departure as the nation's first director of national intelligence comes as the two-year-old office and the broad, post-Sept. 11 reorganization that created it have yet to reach the goal of uniting the intelligence community under a single leader.

But Negroponte's move to become Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy, and his replacement by retired Navy Adm. John M. McConnell, had little to do with any assessment of Negroponte's tenure or with the unfinished state of intelligence integration, a range of senior administration officials said.

Instead, it stemmed directly from the urgent need to fill a State Department job, vacant since early last summer, that was seen as crucial to implementing the new Iraq policy that President Bush plans to announce next week.

Negroponte will take charge of State's Iraq account as the administration begins a sharply uphill effort to turn around a failing war and persuade the new Democratic Congress to follow its lead. A career diplomat who served as Bush's ambassador at the United Nations and in Baghdad before becoming intelligence chief in April 2005, Negroponte will also have primary responsibility for policy toward China and Northeast Asia, especially the North Korean nuclear issue. Rice will focus on Iran, the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and other issues.

"This is a key job, a really important job," said one State Department official, who noted that other senior vacancies remain. "We've had a thin bench."

Rice broached the subject with Negroponte last summer, but the White House refused to consider his departure until a replacement had been arranged, one official said. As with several others who agreed to discuss the matter, he requested anonymity before the nominations, which must be confirmed by the Senate, are announced today.

By fall, several candidates for the intelligence position, including Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the military's Central Command, had turned it down. Others considered as Rice's deputy -- among them NATO military chief Gen. James L. Jones -- were similarly uninterested. The White House decided to postpone consideration of the issue until after the November midterm elections.

McConnell had already turned down an offer to become Negroponte's intelligence deputy -- a job vacated last spring when Gen. Michael V. Hayden became CIA director. It was only over the Christmas holidays, when Bush and Vice President Cheney appealed to McConnell to leave his private-sector position as senior vice president of the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton to take the lead intelligence job, that a deal was struck. Bush telephoned Negroponte, on vacation in Florida, to revive Rice's request.

Word of Negroponte's replacement was met with some concern on Capitol Hill yesterday. Senate intelligence committee Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said he was "troubled by the timing" and that the committee was neither consulted nor apprised of the moves before they became public on Wednesday.

He praised Negroponte for building the director of national intelligence (DNI) office "from scratch," but said the creation of a truly integrated intelligence community needs to move faster.

Susan Collins (R-Maine), who as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee shepherded the reform bill in 2004, said she is disappointed that Negroponte is leaving. She called it "a critical time in establishing the authority of the DNI, and he was making progress."

Former House intelligence committee chairman Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) said he is troubled that virtually all of the nation's senior intelligence positions will now be filled by military officers: McConnell, Hayden at the CIA, retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd at the National Counterterrorism Center and retired Lt. Gen. James R. Clapper Jr., who has reportedly been chosen by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates as undersecretary for intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0112682

"This is nothing against these people as individuals," Hoekstra said. But "when we crafted the intelligence reform bill, we put protections in there to make sure the military was represented. . . . We should have put language in there that protected civilian oversight. The administration clearly has a bias, almost a criterion, that to be in the intelligence community, you better have a military background. That's not what I envisioned, and I don't believe that's healthy."

Others pointed out that Hayden, who formerly served as Negroponte's DNI deputy, and Clapper, who retired in June after five years as director of the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA), had argued with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld over the growth of Pentagon control over intelligence. Along with McConnell, the head of the National Security Agency during the Clinton administration, the three are recognized as military men who, in the past, have responded well to the needs of the president and civilian policymakers.

The still-vacant job of deputy DNI is likely to be filled with a civilian. One candidate is Thomas Fingar, one of Negroponte's first appointments as deputy director of national intelligence for analysis and now chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

As DNI, Negroponte has focused on building common information-sharing and tradecraft training rather than day-to-day analysis or operations, said John E. McLaughlin, the former deputy CIA director. Negroponte has been criticized by Congress for being too diplomatic with the intelligence community's 16 agencies, some of whose members have resisted relinquishing traditional roles and perquisites in the name of integration.

But McLaughlin said Negroponte had "exercised his own authority" in pushing through a fiscal 2008 budget request that wrested money from more powerful elements of the community -- particularly the Pentagon.

At the CIA, Hayden has reflected his own close association with Negroponte even as he has tried to boost low morale. In a speech to agency employees yesterday, Hayden released the agency's five-year "Strategic Intent," subtitled "One Agency, One Community."

Its emphasis, said former senior CIA official Paul Pillar, was on "the strongly felt need for greater coordination across different organizations," while "quelling any thought that this is an agency that is in a state of transition to something much less than it once was."

Negroponte To State? You Heard It Here First. (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte's selection as deputy secretary of state was not, despite his public demurrals, shocking news.

Loop Fans may recall that on Nov. 15, not long after we first heard the deal was struck -- the delay apparently was finding a replacement for Negroponte -- we noted that he "was said to be unhappy" as DNI and "itching to move to a diplomatic post," maybe something like "deputy secretary of state."

The reasons, we wrote, were obvious: "The diplo world is home, because he has served as ambassador to Honduras, Iraq, the Philippines and the United Nations. Also, being deputy to Secretary Condoleezza Rice wouldn't be so bad, because at heart she's a sharing person."

We hear she's thinking of handing him such fine portfolios as Northeast Asia -- where he can deal with the Chicoms and the lunatic North Koreans -- and Iraq. That's two-thirds of the Axis of Evil (A of E) all for himself.

Of course, in a C-SPAN interview aired Dec. 3, Negroponte, when asked about his plans, said, "In my own mind at least, I visualize staying . . . through the end of the administration." And he reiterated that in a Dec. 14 chat with Washington Post reporters and editors.

But Negroponte is a guy who clearly can't hold a job. This would be his fourth since joining the administration just over five years ago. And the chatter has already begun that he may not be in this one too long before he moves up one level.The Lowest of the High: Former Veep

John Nance Garner famously said being vice president wasn't worth "a warm bucket of spit." (Apparently he didn't say "spit," but reporters cleaned up the language.) Well, imagine what being a former vice president is worth.

And there they were, the three living former veeps who never made it to the Oval Office, lingering after Gerald R. Ford's funeral at Washington National Cathedral. Former presidents Carter, Bush and Clinton and their wives had all been escorted out to their limousines and motorcades.

But Walter F. Mondale, Dan Quayle and Al Gore were left to cool their heels in a long line that didn't seem to move for 20 or 30 minutes, our colleague Peter Baker reports. Quayle was first to break under the pressure. Alone and unbothered by others, he broke out of the line, moved around the chairs and crept around the line to the front to try to see why it wasn't moving. Mondale and Gore showed a little more patience -- they and stood and waited behind a hundred or so people who have never been one heartbeat away from the presidency. They fidgeted and tried to make small talk.

DOJ_NMG_0112683

Eventually they, too, couldn't take it and, with their wives, bolted out of line in search of an exit through which they could actually leave the building. (No truth to the speculation that the line wasn't moving because Bill Clinton planted himself outside the door to shake hands with everyone leaving.)Who Might KBR Intend to Fund?

'Twas the day after Christmas and Halliburton subsidiary KBR, the U.S. military's largest contractor in Iraq, was filing its forms with the Federal Election Commission to set up its new political action committee, KBRPAC.

So why was the company, which just agreed to pay the government $8 million to settle allegations of overbilling for work in the Balkans and which has a number of False Claims Act and congressional investigations pending, setting up its very own PAC? Most likely because it's spinning off from parent Halliburton and needs its own operation. Or it could be because of two words: Henry Waxman.Osama's Not Dead; He's Resting

And now, the Monty Python Dead Parrot Award for 2006. It's always best to wait till the very end of the year before declaring the winner of this prestigious spinmeister award -- given in honor of the iconic scene in which Michael Palin, as a pet-shop owner, insists that the obviously dead parrot he just sold John Cleese's character is merely napping.

And, sure enough, the winning entry came in on Dec. 28, when CNN's Ed Henry interviewed White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend.

Henry pressed her to admit that the administration's failure to kill or capture Osama bin Laden in the past five years was, well, a failure. She wouldn't.

"Well, I'm not sure," Townsend said. "It's a success that hasn't occurred yet. I don't know that I view that as a failure."Britain, Finally in the Black

A happy new year to the Brits, who began 2007 debt-free for the first time since World War II. The British, according to wire services, transferred $84 million to the U.S. Treasury, the final installment in repayment of a $4.34 billion loan made in 1945 so they could stave off bankruptcy after having spent almost all their resources fighting Nazi Germany.

The loan, the equivalent of $232 billion in today's money, according to Bloomberg News, was double the size of Britain's economy at the time.Castro's Down but Not Out

Meanwhile, Cuban dictator Fidel Castro sent a New Year's Eve message to the media to mark his 48 years in power. "Regarding my recovery," he said in the note read on state television, "I have always warned that it could be a prolonged process, but it is far from being a lost battle."

Castro, according to the Associated Press, "said he was still 'in the loop' when it came to matters of state."

Speculation Surrounds Choice By Spy Chief To Take Step Back (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — From the start, John D. Negroponte felt miscast as the nation's first director of national intelligence, a diplomat who never seemed comfortable in spook's clothing, colleagues and friends of his said.

Even at age 67, Mr. Negroponte longed to be back in the thick of policymaking, they said. But he knew it was the one role he was barred from playing as long as he remained the nation's top intelligence chief, whose role is to step into the Oval Office each morning as a neutral, impartial adviser on the threats lurking around the globe.

It was because of this, officials said, that he agreed to do something generally unheard of in a city obsessed with the bureaucratic totem pole: trade a cabinet-level job for a subcabinet post as deputy secretary of state, a job that essentially requires him to handle tasks that Condoleezza Rice would rather not deal with.

Mr. Negroponte leaves his office at Bolling Air Force Base after only 19 months and with mixed reviews. The base is the home of a new intelligence bureaucracy created to solve the problems laid bare after the Sept. 11 attacks, but Mr. Negroponte barely had time to get it running. All over Washington on Thursday, there were questions about whether Mr. Negroponte was there long enough to lay the foundations of real change and whether his transfer suggested that the Bush administration was less committed than it claimed to be to an intelligence overhaul that President Bush had billed as the most significant restructuring of American spy agencies in half a century.

Senior administration officials said it was Mr. Bush who personally asked Mr. Negroponte to take on the diplomatic post sometime last month. It was the second time in two years that Mr. Bush had turned to Mr. Negroponte to fill a critical job: Mr. Negroponte became the director of national intelligence only after several other candidates had turned down the job. This time around, Ms. Rice had requested over the summer that Mr. Negroponte become her deputy. But the decision languished for months as the White House sought an adequate replacement for the spy chief, and as Mr. Negroponte vacillated between remaining at the helm of an intelligence community that numbered roughly 100,000 people and a return to the State Department, in the shadow of the administration's most visible international figure.

DOJ_NMG_0112684

Senior administration officials said that Ms. Rice wanted Mr. Negroponte to focus on China and North Korea, which have been among his focuses in the intelligence post, and on Iraq, a country he knows particularly well.

Mr. Negroponte has also served as ambassador to the United Nations, Mexico, the Philippines and Honduras, in a Foreign Service career that spanned more than three decades. A senior administration official who was involved in discussions about his nomination said that Ms. Rice regarded him as a foreign policy moderate who could help fill the big voids left by the departure of Robert B. Zoellick, who stepped down as deputy secretary last summer, and Philip D. Zelikow, who left the job of State Department counselor last month.

Ms. Rice would continue to play a central role in Iraq policy, the official said, but she has also made it clear that she wants to devote more time to a broader diplomatic initiative aimed at Middle East peace.

Mr. Bush is expected to nominate Mike McConnell, a retired vice admiral and former chief of the National Security Agency, to be Mr. Negroponte's successor.

John E. McLaughlin, a former director of central intelligence who is a friend of Mr. Negroponte, said that he managed to make the transition from career Foreign Service officer to the intelligence arena with little difficulty, but that Mr. Negroponte was now returning to the world where he felt most at ease.

Mr. McLaughlin said he believed that Mr. Negroponte's familiarity with the latest intelligence from Iraq would help to bring a "realistic" view of the situation there as the administration works to develop a new strategy.

But other intelligence experts expressed concern about what Mr. Negroponte's departure might mean to the office he helped to establish. "My major concern about this appointment is not about the State Department, but what happens at the D.N.I. office," said Lee H. Hamilton, who served as co-chairman of both the 9/11 commission and the Iraq Study Group. "The future of that office and the concept of intelligence-sharing is on the line."

Top Congressional officials responded angrily to the news of Mr. Negroponte's departure.

"I think he walked off the job, and I don't like it," said Senator John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Just as Mr. Negroponte is leaving his post, his office is finishing a major National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq's chances of surviving as a unified, independent country — a review that was commissioned only after a Congressional request over the summer, on a problem that Mr. Negroponte will have to help manage in his new post.

"He came into it after just a year in Iraq, and someone without a strong background in intelligence, and I think he is leaving awfully early, given the importance of getting this right," said Robert Hutchings, the senior diplomat in residence at the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton, who once headed the National Intelligence Council.

"I think it is quite irresponsible," he said.

Mr. Hutchings said the departure would compound "three or four years of nonstop turmoil" within American intelligence agencies.

Bush administration officials noted several successes during Mr. Negroponte's tenure, most significant the creation and progress of the National Counterterrorism Center. Terrorism experts have credited the center with fusing information from across the intelligence community to understand better the global terrorism threat.

But as he assembled a staff of more than 1,500 people, he was criticized for simply adding another layer to a bureaucracy he was assigned to streamline. But some intelligence experts said that the criticism was unfair, and that the real blame rested with Congress for passing convoluted legislation that made bureaucratic bloat at the director of national intelligence office inevitable. Some critics say that the job of spy czar was never necessary to begin with. Some of those whom the White House first approached to take the job nearly two years ago — including Robert M. Gates, the newly installed secretary of defense — were deeply skeptical about whether that structure would work.

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said that President Bush was "very impressed" with the job Mr. Negroponte had done.

One of the greatest difficulties of Mr. Negroponte's position has been trying to wrest control over multibillion dollar spy satellites and other gadgetry from the Pentagon, which historically had been in charge of 80 percent of the nation's intelligence budget.

One of the top priorities of the former defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, was to expand the Pentagon's role in intelligence gathering, and some members of Congress say that Mr. Negroponte was not aggressive enough in bringing the Pentagon's intelligence budget more under his control.

Some intelligence experts believe that Mr. Gates is likely to be less territorial than Mr. Rumsfeld was about the Pentagon's intelligence functions, and may even be eager to cede some of the Pentagon's authority to the new intelligence chief. Others said that the job of corralling 16 sometimes dysfunctional intelligence agencies is an often thankless task, and one where it is difficult to have a noticeable impact. Mr. Negroponte is said by associates to have grown particularly weary of clashes with members of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0112685

"I think it's pretty telling that both Bob Gates and John Negroponte prefer jobs trying to bail us out of Iraq to the job of trying to fix U.S. intelligence," said Amy Zegart, a professor at the University of California at Los Angeles and an expert in intelligence overhaul.

Negroponte Shift Is Ruffling Feathers (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — The abrupt departure of John D. Negroponte as the nation's spy chief prompted angry responses from Capitol Hill and triggered new debate Thursday over whether a position created to fix the nation's intelligence problems is itself fundamentally flawed.

President Bush is expected to announce today that Negroponte will become the top deputy at the State Department. Bush also is set to nominate retired Navy Vice Adm. J. Michael McConnell to be the next director of national intelligence.

The shuffle comes 18 months into Negroponte's tenure at the job. And though he has received mixed reviews for his reform efforts, lawmakers and senior intelligence officials said the switch was a significant setback for the office, which oversees the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies, including the CIA.

"I'm very concerned that taking out the top guy at a critical juncture is going to cause some backsliding," said Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, who was the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee when Congress passed the legislation creating the post of director of national intelligence. "It's a very steep learning curve. And any new person will have to play catch-up."

Negroponte's departure is the second major exit from the office of the directorate in a matter of months. His top deputy, Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, left in the spring to become CIA director. When Negroponte and Hayden were nominated for the intelligence posts in 2005, they were described as a team whose skills and expertise were indispensable to the success of establishing the new agency and enacting sweeping intelligence changes passed in 2004 by Congress.

"I'm disappointed that both he and Hayden have left," said Lee H. Hamilton, a member of the Sept. 11 commission, which designated the creation of a intelligence director one of its principal recommendations.

"I think we are beginning to see better sharing of information in the intelligence community, and I also think it's a work in progress and an awful lot needs to be done," Hamilton said. "It is therefore a little unsettling to me that your two top leaders move out of the DNI office within a matter of months." The deputy job held by Hayden remains unfilled.

In another of a series of moves among top foreign policy posts, officials said Bush was likely to nominate Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq, as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. Khalilzad would replace John R. Bolton, who resigned last month after serving 16 months as a Bush appointee but not winning Senate confirmation to remain in the job.

The U.N. move could be logical for Khalilzad, who has been ambassador to Iraq since June 2005. Bush is expected to announce a new plan for Iraq. Khalilzad has faced increasing tension with the Shiite leadership of the government, which has sometimes complained that he has gone too far in pushing for the interests of the country's Sunni minority.

Negroponte's departure as national intelligence director has been rumored for weeks, and officials close to him have said that the career diplomat is eager to return to the State Department, particularly in such a senior role. Negroponte is expected to play a leading role in revamping the State Department's Iraq policy by putting more pressure on the fledgling government there and enlisting more help from regional allies.

Intelligence veterans said it was clear that Negroponte had been chafing under the limitations of his position as intelligence chief. Though the job was created to coordinate the activities of the nation's spy agencies and improve communication among them, it lacks complete authority over those agencies' operations, personnel and budgets.

"He's in charge of everything and in charge of nothing," said Richard J. Kerr, a former CIA deputy director. "He has a whole bunch of independent organizations he's trying to get to work together — a lot by persuasion and some by coercion."

Kerr said that was partly why others, including new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, had previously spurned the position.

Negroponte was credited with improving the flow of information among spy agencies, and with winning several budget showdowns with the Pentagon over spending on spy satellites and other classified programs.

New Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said Negroponte was essentially walking out on an unfinished job. "I am deeply troubled by the timing of this announcement and the void of leadership at the top of our intelligence community," said Rockefeller, who announced hearings this month focusing partly on intelligence reform.

Negroponte was criticized by members of the Sept. 11 commission, among others, for creating a new intelligence bureaucracy, with about 1,500 employees in the national intelligence office.

DOJ_NMG_0112686

The Bush administration's plan to replace Negroponte with a retired naval officer prompted concern among some lawmakers that the intelligence community would be dominated by the military. McConnell was the military's top intelligence officer during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, and subsequently became National Security Agency director.

The top jobs at the CIA and NSA, as well as other agencies, are held by military officers.

"If it's McConnell [for director of national intelligence], it's one more uniform," Rep. Harman said, adding that it raised "at least a question mark about the military takeover of our intelligence organizations."

Kerr, the former CIA deputy director, voiced similar concerns, saying that civilian leadership of intelligence organizations was particularly important now because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "The military can get themselves so committed to the mission that their objectivity at times can be less than it should be," he said.

Negroponte To Shift To No. 2 Diplomat (WT)

By Bill Gertz And David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

In a day of shake-ups for the Bush administration yesterday, President Bush lost his chief counsel and signaled he will shift the top intelligence official to become the No. 2 diplomat at the State Department, and will tap a former admiral to take his place as head of the intelligence community.

Meanwhile, several press reports say Mr. Bush has decided to move the U.S. ambassador to Iraq to become the ambassador to the United Nations, and has chosen a new military leader to lead U.S. forces in the war on terrorism.

The changes come as he is working on a new strategy for Iraq, which Mr. Bush said he will announce next week.

Mr. Bush today will tap John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence (DNI), to become Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy, and will nominate retired Navy Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to fill his intelligence post, according to a senior administration official.

"What you've got are two guys of undisputed quality," the official told reporters.

Both positions require Senate confirmation, and the official predicted easy confirmation. Mr. Negroponte was confirmed 98-2 by the Senate for the intelligence post in 2005, and the official said Adm. McConnell will impress senators when he meets them.

But senators said they were disappointed Mr. Negroponte was leaving the position he has held since it was created just two years ago, saying he has made strides but there is a lot more work to be done.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat and chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, said the vacancy is all the more troubling because the intelligence deputy's slot has been vacant since May. He said he will try to make sure a replacement is confirmed before Mr. Negroponte departs for the diplomatic post.

Officials said the move to the State Department would suit Mr. Negroponte, a career Foreign Service officer.

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack described Mr. Negroponte as a "diplomat's diplomat" with all the qualifications required to fill the department's second-most-powerful post.

His appointment would fill the vacancy created when former Deputy Secretary Robert B. Zoellick left in July for a job on Wall Street.

Adm. McConnell would bring intelligence experience to the DNI post, having headed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996.

He is a well-regarded career military intelligence specialist but also someone who is not expected to initiate or oversee major reforms, current and former intelligence officials said.

"If you give him a problem, he can fix it," said one former senior intelligence official who supports Adm. McConnell. "But he's not going to make major reforms that are needed."

Mr. Negroponte was the first DNI under reforms that grew out of the September 11 intelligence failures, and critics of the new office say it created a new layer of bureaucracy in an overly bureaucratic intelligence system.

Meanwhile, both [a] news agency and ABC News reported that Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will be nominated as the next ambassador to the United Nations, and ABC reported Mr. Bush has chosen Adm. William J. Fallon to replace Gen. John Abizaid as the head of U.S. Central Command, which is in charge of U.S. military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In the change that hits closest to Mr. Bush, Harriet E. Miers, the White House's chief counsel who conservatives blocked from becoming a Supreme Court justice in 2005, announced she is resigning her position in the administration.

Miss Miers, 61, had followed Mr. Bush from Texas, where she was his personal lawyer and counsel to his campaign, to the White House. There, she was staff secretary and deputy chief of staff before becoming chief counsel two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0112687

"She's been here for six years. It's hard duty," White House press secretary Tony Snow said in announcing her departure, which is effective Jan. 31.

Bush To Nominate Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 5, 2007

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will be nominated by President Bush to become the U.S. envoy to the United Nations, a senior administration official said Thursday.

Khalilzad, who is Afghan born, has served also as ambassador to Afghanistan. He is likely to be replaced in Baghdad by Ryan Crocker, a veteran American diplomat, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make an announcement for the White House.

Khalilzad would replace John Bolton, whose appointment to the U.N. job expired recently.

The changes come as Bush is expected to announce a new U.S. policy in the Iraq war next week.

He is also shuffling other pieces of his national security team. He is preparing to announce that John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, will become the No. 2 official at the State Department and will be replaced by retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell.

The appointments must approved by the Senate.

Bush was unable to drive Bolton's confirmation through the Senate, which under Republican control approved Khalilzad for his current job. Bolton's style is more acerbic than Khalilzad's.

Khalilzad, an unusually outspoken diplomat known as a protege of Vice President Dick Cheney, would take the U.N. seat at a time when the world body is in the spotlight in confrontations with Iran, North Korea and in the Middle East.

Khalilzad's move from Iraq to the U.N. has been rumored for months, along with the expectation that Crocker, now ambassador to Pakistan, would succeed him in Baghdad. ABC News first reported Thursday that Bush had made the decision.

The U.S. official said some minor details still must be worked out on Crocker, but they are considered manageable.

Crocker was a senior U.S. representative in Baghdad for several months in 2003, shortly after the U.S. invasion that toppled President Saddam Hussein.

A White House favorite whom Bush calls by his nickname, "Zal," Khalilzad has worked in two other Republican administrations, those of Ronald Reagan and Bush's father, George H.W. Bush.

The highest-ranked Muslim to serve in the Bush administration, Khalilzad headed the Bush-Cheney transition team for the Defense Department in 2000 and served as a counselor to former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Negroponte's Newest Job (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

The No. 2 job in the State Department is technically a step down from John Negroponte's present post of director of national intelligence. But the reported return to the foreign policy fold of this former ambassador to Baghdad, and, before that, to the United Nations, has a certain logic to it.

The diplomacy-challenged Bush administration could surely use the help. We hope that Mr. Negroponte can provide Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with the intellectual and bureaucratic reinforcement she so desperately needs to help guide the administration to a wiser course on Iraq.

Mr. Negroponte certainly has experience. In a 40-plus year career — including an early stint as a political officer in Vietnam — he has also served as ambassador to Honduras (during Ronald Reagan's contra war), Mexico and the Philippines. He is known as a canny, and sometimes ruthless, bureaucratic player. What he doesn't have, unfortunately, is much of a reputation for challenging the unwise policy presumptions of his bosses.

In his 10 months in Baghdad from mid-2004 to mid-2005, Mr. Negroponte undoubtedly saw the yawning gap between Iraq's grim reality and the delusional claims of success issuing from Washington. While President Bush and other top officials trumpeted effective military training programs, a flowering Iraqi democracy and an insurgency ever on its last legs, anyone on the ground had to see paper Iraqi battalions, the rise of sectarian militias and ever-expanding chaos.

If Mr. Negroponte made a serious effort to jolt his bosses back to the real world, there is no public record of it. That will have to change if he is to have any chance of improving things. Before confirming him, the Senate should make sure he understands that asking hard and unwelcome questions is an essential part of the job.

Mr. Negroponte's switch will mean another wrenching shift in the top ranks of America's deeply troubled intelligence agencies. One of the main problems that the national intelligence director's job was created to solve was the destructive rivalries between intelligence agencies run by the Defense Department and their civilian counterparts.

DOJ_NMG_0112688

That infighting reached a crescendo during the reign of Donald Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. Mr. Rumsfeld's replacement, Robert Gates, a former director of central intelligence, will have the credibility — and we hope the will — to calm those rivalries and improve interagency coordination. Even then, Mr. Bush must quickly find a credible replacement for Mr. Negroponte, preferably one who is willing to jolt his bosses with the truth. This administration's record of failures in Iraq is matched only by its failures on intelligence.

A Small Change (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

NEVER MIND THE new faces on Capitol Hill, where Congress has changed hands for the first time in 12 years. The real action is at the White House, in Foggy Bottom and across the river at the Pentagon, where the Bush administration's game of musical chairs seems to be over for now. For all the new jobs, however, there are precious few new faces, and anyone expecting new policies is bound to be disappointed.

It has been a busy few weeks. Today, President Bush is expected to name John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, as deputy secretary of State. Replacing Negroponte will be retired Vice Adm. J. Michael McConnell, a 25-year intelligence veteran. Meanwhile, over at the Pentagon, Robert M. Gates has just started using his new "Secretary of Defense" stationery. Gates is a former director of the CIA, where the current chief, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, was Negroponte's deputy until May.

What does it all mean? First, lest anyone doubted it, Vice President Dick Cheney remains a force to be reckoned with. There is no reason to believe these changes in personnel presage a major change in policy, which by all accounts Cheney opposes. In each case, the administration has turned to trusted men who pass muster with Cheney.

Which is not to say they are unqualified. Negroponte, 67, should be a superb replacement for Robert B. Zoellick, who left for Goldman Sachs in July. On paper, Negroponte's move — from being the nation's top spy to being Rice's No. 2 — is a demotion. He reportedly had turned the deputy's job down once before, and accepted it this time only after being asked by the president.

His acceptance of the job may be more a reflection of the problems of his previous position than the promise of his new one. The director of national intelligence, a position created by Congress after 9/11 to oversee the nation's 16 spy agencies, has responsibility but very little authority — almost three-quarters of the nation's intelligence budget is controlled by the Pentagon. If the administration wants the director of national intelligence to have any influence, it might want to consider giving him more power.

The more interesting question, however, is why Bush, acting through Cheney (or is it the other way around?), wanted Negroponte at State. Word inside and outside the State Department for months has been that Rice has been unable to fill top jobs because her choices have either declined to sign up for a stint likely to be best remembered for the debacle in Iraq or have been vetoed as too liberal by the White House.

Negroponte, who has served as ambassador to Iraq and the United Nations, reportedly was the only person acceptable to both Rice and Cheney. That he already had a job was apparently just another detail to be worked out by the apparatchiks in the White House — and the Old Executive Office Building.

Bush To Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 5, 2007

President Bush has chosen a 25-year intelligence veteran, retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell, to be the country's second national intelligence director as he reshapes national security strategy with two years left in his presidency.

The current director, career diplomat John Negroponte, will move into the long-vacant job as top deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The nominations were expected to be announced Friday by Bush, said a senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the decision was not yet public.

The moves come as the White House considers a new direction in Iraq, where a quick invasion has devolved into a bloody civil conflict.

Part of the revised course appears to be an overhaul of Bush's intelligence and national security team. In addition to Negroponte's shift, Defense Secretary Robert Gates took over the Pentagon last month and is expected to bring in retired Lt. Gen. James Clapper as his undersecretary for intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0112689

Bush will nominate the current ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to be the U.S. envoy to the United Nations, said another senior administration official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make an announcement for the White House.

Bush said Thursday he will make a speech next week announcing his decisions about how to move ahead in the nearly four-year-old war.

The administration denied Negroponte's move was a demotion. The senior administration official said Bush reached out to Negroponte to fill the opening for deputy secretary of state, vacant since July. Bush also talked with McConnell about becoming intelligence chief, who oversees and coordinates the 16 U.S. spy agencies.

McConnell spent more than a quarter-century as an intelligence operations and security officer. He caught the attention of then-Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and then-Joint Chiefs Chairman Colin Powell during the first Persian Gulf War. McConnell regularly briefed them as an intelligence officer for the chairman of the Joint Chiefs and is known as someone who can distill complicated information into coherent presentations, said Matthew Aid, a historian who studies the National Security Agency.

McConnell was tapped to lead U.S. eavesdropping efforts as director of the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996. Aid suggested McConnell's record there was mixed. McConnell allowed Congress and the White House to cut NSA money after the Cold War, when Aid said the government should have ramped up for challenges posed by cell phones, the Internet and fiber optic cable.

Yet on McConnell's watch, the agency became central to providing intelligence on the war in Bosnia, shipments of weapons-grade technology to Iraq and other tough issues of that era.

McConnell left the government and has worked for Booz Allen Hamilton, a government contractor and consulting firm, for about a decade.

Negroponte has been a diplomat in spy's clothing since he became the nation's first intelligence chief in April 2005. He is more comfortable in ambassadorial circles than the cloak-and-dagger world.

As Rice's deputy, he no longer would have first chair for a major government department or oversight of a $40 billion budget. But associates said the job of creating a new organization from scratch has had plenty of frustrations, from securing office space to planning foreign travel.

Negroponte also may hold out hope that Rice will leave before the end of the Bush administration in early 2009, giving him a chance to retire as secretary of state. Deputy Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger got such a promotion in late 1992, when Bush's father asked chief diplomat James A. Baker III to head his unsuccessful re-election campaign.

Negroponte has been at the center of the current president's Iraq strategy. He was the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations when Secretary of State Powell made his now-infamous, error-filled presentation in arguing for the invasion of Iraq. Negroponte became the U.S. ambassador to Iraq in June 2004 and was there for the January 2005 elections that Sunni Muslims boycotted.

Soon after, the White House asked him to take the intelligence job after others said no because Congress did not give the position enough power: Congress created the position in response to the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

Some doubted the wisdom of creating such a post, worried it would only further weigh down the bureaucracy. Negroponte leaves as the success or failure of that endeavor remains an open question.

Observers say Negroponte considered his role as intelligence briefer of the president to be a leading aspect of his job, and he left details of managerial overhaul to his deputies.

McConnell, who initiated an internal overhaul of the structures at the NSA, is likely to get more into those details.

U.S. Circuit Court Judge Richard Posner, who has written a book evaluating intelligence reform, said the national intelligence director should not be expected to be the president's expert on issues from Iran to North Korea. "You need one person to be the manager. That is what I think McConnell has a good background for," he said.

Senate Intelligence Chairman Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., whose panel must approve McConnell's nomination, said he was troubled by the timing of Negroponte's departure because it leaves a void while his organization is in its infancy. He noted that Negroponte has been operating with only an acting deputy since Gen. Michael Hayden left in May to become CIA director.

Rockefeller and the committee's top Republican, Sen. Kit Bond of Missouri, said an intelligence chief must be in place before Negroponte leaves. "A premature departure creates an unneeded vacuum within the DNI office at a critical time," Bond said.

Pentagon Link To Spy Chief Pick Arouses Concern (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112690

WASHINGTON -- The nomination of a retired Navy admiral as the nation's chief spymaster stirred concerns about the expanding control of current and retired Pentagon officials over the U.S. intelligence community.

President Bush is expected to announce today the nomination of J. Michael McConnell as director of national intelligence, succeeding John Negroponte, who is moving to the No. 2 spot at the State Department. The White House also will nominate Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, as United Nations ambassador, buttressing President Bush's foreign-policy team ahead of an expected change in Iraq-war strategy. The nominees will have to be confirmed by the Senate.

Adm. McConnell's nomination will place current and retired military officials in charge of all of Washington's principal spy branches, including the Central Intelligence Agency, the National Security Agency and the Defense Intelligence Agency. The Pentagon controls 80% of the government's estimated $42 billion intelligence budget. Additionally, the U.S.'s overseas operations against al Qaeda and other international terrorist groups have resulted in the creation of the Defense Department's own intelligence czar and the deployment of military-intelligence assets in a number of global theaters.

WASHINGTON WIRE

1

See the expanded online version of Washington Wire2. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire during the day -- every weekday -- with analysis, news and buzz from inside and outside the Beltway.

Striking a Balance

Adm. McConnell's greatest challenge as director of national intelligence, say members of the intelligence community, will be to try to claim control of these Pentagon intelligence assets while striking a balance between the development of tactical and strategic intelligence.

Legislators and retired spies worry Adm. McConnell's career as a military-intelligence official could hold him hostage to the Pentagon's culture and mission. Among the lessons from the Iraq war, these officials say, was that the Bush administration underappreciated the strategic impact of removing Saddam Hussein and how countries like Iran and Syria might benefit.

"With so many military guys involved, you run the risk of the intelligence agencies giving the consumers what they want to hear," said Larry Johnson, who served as a senior counterterrorism official at both the State Department and CIA. "The result could be a focus on supporting wars, rather than longer-term analysis."

Adm. McConnell, 63 years old, serves as a senior vice president at Booz Allen Hamilton Inc., focusing on the consulting firm's Pentagon accounts. A call to his office for comment wasn't returned.

Adm. McConnell served as the NSA's director from 1992 to 1996 and worked as the chief intelligence adviser to then-Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Colin Powell during the first Gulf War. While picked to head the country's main eavesdropping agency by President Bush, Adm. McConnell was well-liked within the Clinton administration, say those he worked with, and isn't seen as a partisan player.

A Coordinated Effort

Mr. Negroponte's nearly two-year tenure as the first DNI was marked by a workmanlike approach toward integrating the U.S.'s 16 intelligence agencies under one command, say officials who worked with him. A chief task was to improve information sharing among these disparate agencies, particularly the CIA and Federal Bureau of Investigation. His office also pushed to develop more-nuanced and better-integrated intelligence assessments.

The success of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks is widely attributed to the U.S. government's failure to connect the dots among various pieces of intelligence. An independent commission studying the Iraq war also criticized American spy agencies for tailoring intelligence assessments to underpin already-developed policy objectives.

In trying to streamline the intelligence-development process, Mr. Negroponte created a "Magnificent Seven" grouping of agencies that now form the heart of America's spy work. Members said they have detected better coordination among agencies as a result.

Nominee Played Big Role In Outsourcing Intelligence (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Richard Willing

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — J. Michael "Mike" McConnell, in line to become the nation's top intelligence official, has been a leading figure in outsourcing U.S intelligence operations to private industry, records and interviews show.

McConnell, a retired Navy vice admiral, led the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996 before joining Booz Allen Hamilton Inc., a consulting firm based in McLean, Va.

White House officials confirmed McConnell's appointment to replace National Intelligence Director John Negroponte but declined to be identified by name because the nomination has not been formally announced.

McConnell's nomination and confirmation by the Senate would come amid two current trends in intelligence gathering: the emphasis on technology, and the heightened role of private contractors in analyzing data and preparing reports that once might have been written by government intelligence officers.

"The mission has expanded, the money is there, and there just aren't enough (intelligence officers) to do the job without outside help," says Stephen Marrin, a former CIA analyst who teaches intelligence studies at Mercyhurst College in Erie, Pa.

It is unclear how many private contractors are employed by the CIA and other intelligence agencies. Budgets and hiring figures are classified.

Last year, Negroponte started an audit of the number of private contractors used by all 16 intelligence agencies. That count was started because of concerns about how outsourcing affected intelligence, and it is continuing, says Chad Kolton, a spokesman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

The CIA also began a study last September to determine whether contractors were hurting the agency's work by luring away CIA officers with higher salaries. The CIA did not return a call Thursday seeking an update on that study.

Booz Allen is a "huge" supplier of intelligence contracting, Kolton said. Contract details are classified.

Ralph Shrader, Booz Allen Hamilton's chairman and CEO, says McConnell's experience as NSA director and a private contractor make him a good choice. McConnell "will work very hard to do the right thing," Shrader says.

"He's someone who can solicit lots of opinions, collect them all up, and produce something that takes the needs of the entire country into consideration," Shrader says. "He's very hands-on."

Booz Allen has received at least $50 million in Pentagon contracts since November 2005, records show. Some involve remnants of the Pentagon's "Total Information Awareness" program. Congress killed the program in 2003 amid concerns it would invade the privacy of ordinary Americans.

The $63 million contract signed with Booz Allen in 2002 called for the firm to develop a single system to collect and search through huge databases of government, personal and business records for signs of terrorist activities. McConnell signed that contract on Booz Allen's behalf.

Work on that contract has continued, according to federal contracting records, which show the Pentagon paid Booz Allen about $2 million under that contract during 2006, most recently on Sept. 26.

Spokesmen for the White House, Pentagon, Booz Allen and Negroponte's office all have declined to comment on the contract.

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, says he will question McConnell about the program and intelligence contracting.

"It's a critical concern," says Wyden, who led the efforts to kill TIA in 2002.

John Michael McConnell, A Member Of The Club (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — In choosing Mike McConnell to be director of national intelligence, President Bush is turning again to a steady intelligence professional who first achieved prominence during his father's administration.

Like Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the Central Intelligence Agency director, Mr. McConnell, 63, a retired vice admiral, has served as director of the National Security Agency, the eavesdropping giant. Like Robert M. Gates, the new defense secretary and former C.I.A. director, Mr. McConnell first operated in the highest circles of government in the tumultuous time that included the Persian Gulf war of 1991 and the fall of the Soviet Union.

"It's a gathering of the clan," said retired Adm. Bobby R. Inman, himself a former director of the National Security Agency and an early promoter of Mr. McConnell's intelligence career. "You're getting strong professionals in all these top jobs. They'll set out to solve problems, and they won't be motivated by turf or politics."

William P. Crowell, who worked as Mr. McConnell's deputy at the N.S.A., called him a "consummate professional" who managed the agency with great care at a difficult time of severe post-cold-war budget cuts. Ronald D. Lee, who worked as the security agency's general counsel under Mr. McConnell, called him "an exceptionally gifted leader who was completely devoted to the rule of law and the Constitution."

But W. Patrick Lang, a former Defense Intelligence Agency official who has been highly critical of the Bush administration, took a more skeptical view. He called Mr. McConnell, who made his career in naval intelligence, "competent but compliant" and expressed concern that he might not stand up to policy makers, particularly on highly charged issues like Iran's nuclear program.

For the last 10 years, Mr. McConnell, a courtly, soft-spoken South Carolina native, has been out of government, working for Booz Allen Hamilton, the consulting company. But much of his work has been for government agencies on intelligence and information security, and he has often written and spoken about the organization and future of spying.

DOJ_NMG_0112692

Colleagues say he was first approached several months ago about the possibility of replacing General Hayden as deputy to John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence. He turned down that job and was eventually invited to succeed Mr. Negroponte in the top job.

Mr. McConnell first came to public attention as the top intelligence officer to Gen. Colin L. Powell, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, during the 1991 war. He conducted daily briefings not only for General Powell but for the defense secretary, Dick Cheney, now the vice president. He had contact with Mr. Gates, Mr. Hayden and Condoleezza Rice, now secretary of state, all of whom worked on the National Security Council in the administration of Mr. Bush's father.

"He was measured, methodical and detailed," Bill Smullen, then an aide to General Powell, said of Mr. McConnell's war briefings. "Secretary Cheney saw Mike McConnell in action on a daily basis."

Mr. McConnell became a familiar figure on television during the gulf war, explaining troop movements and airstrikes. But on becoming director of the security agency in 1992 he retreated behind its traditional curtain of secrecy.

Matthew M. Aid, a historian of the agency, said that during his four-year tenure, the agency's monitoring did not keep up with the revolutionary technological changes in communications, including the Internet, cellphones and fiber-optic cable. But he said Mr. McConnell had been handicapped by a steadily declining budget and work force.

"He begged and borrowed and took money from research and development to pay for operations," achieving considerable success in tracking the warring parties during the war in Bosnia, Mr. Aid said.

John Michael McConnell was born on July 26, 1943, in Greenville, S.C., where his father worked in the shipping business and his mother in the garment industry. He graduated from Furman University and was commissioned as a line officer of the Navy in 1967. He served a tour in Vietnam and then became an intelligence officer.

He is married to Terry McConnell, a homemaker, and has two children and two stepchildren, all grown.

Former colleagues invariably remark on his quiet and courteous manner and say he rarely shows a temper. On Thursday some wondered whether that was the right temperament for a job created to force 16 competing and sometimes feuding agencies to cooperate and share information.

But Mark M. Lowenthal, who served as staff director for the House Intelligence Committee when Mr. McConnell ran the National Security Agency, said he was not concerned about that.

"His quiet manner and his lovely South Carolina accent belie it, but I have no doubt he can be forceful when necessary," Mr. Lowenthal said. He noted that Mr. McConnell had thrived at Booz Allen. "You don't do that by being shy and retiring," he said.

Bush Says Hussein 'Was Given Justice' (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that he would have preferred that the execution of Saddam Hussein had been conducted in a more "dignified" manner, but said the deposed dictator met the fate he deserved.

"He was given justice. The thousands of people he killed were not," the president said during a session with reporters after he met with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany.

His remarks on the hanging were the first he had made in public since Hussein was executed Saturday in Baghdad amid taunting shouts in which an observer called out the name of a militant Shiite Muslim cleric.

Soon after the execution, a video of Hussein's death, recorded on a camera phone, was posted on a number of websites.

The scene and the video have caused discomfort among Bush aides. They have tried to focus attention on the brutality of Hussein's regime, rather than on the circumstances surrounding his execution.

Public outcry about the hanging has been pronounced in Europe. Merkel, at Bush's side in the entry area of the White House State Floor, did not address the issue.

Bush said he had spoken about it earlier in the day with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, during a nearly two-hour videoconference.

Maliki told him that Iraq was investigating the execution, the president said. U.S. officials reportedly tried to persuade Iraqi officials to delay the hanging, rather than proceed with it on the first day of Sunni Muslims' observance of Eid al-Adha, the holiday marking the end of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca.

Bush said Hussein's hanging closed "a horrific chapter" in Iraq's history, adding, "We expect there to be a full investigation of what took place" in the death chamber.

The president also gave Maliki a renewed vote of confidence at a time when officials have begun to question whether he is, as Bush has said, the right person for the job.

DOJ_NMG_0112693

Lawmakers Criticize Video Of Hussein's Final Minutes (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — The execution of Saddam Hussein was initially hailed as an example of democratic justice being served in Iraq, but leading members of Congress said Thursday that the conduct surrounding the hanging could undermine United States strategy in Iraq and complicate efforts to help the new Iraqi government succeed.

The White House has declined to criticize the execution, portions of which were shown online in a bootlegged video. Several Republican senators who have been among President Bush's biggest supporters in the Iraq war said they were troubled by the video and fearful of the reverberations it could provoke.

"It's a very bad thing, it's harmful, and I'm sorry that it happened," said Senator John McCain, an Arizona Republican who has been a White House ally on its Iraq policy. "Obviously, it unnecessarily inflames the emotions of the Sunnis."

While the White House says that Mr. Bush has not seen the video — recorded without authorization with a cellphone camera — several members of Congress said that they had seen it. More important, they said, the rest of the world had, too.

As Mr. Bush inches closer to presenting his revised Iraq plan, Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed dismay at the scene surrounding the final minutes of Mr. Hussein's life. They said it was another sign of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's inability to deal with the sectarian divide in Iraq.

"It is a very unfortunate episode, and they are still trying to sort out accountability," said Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia. "The key to success in Iraq — whatever success we are able to achieve — is reconciliation, and this certainly was not a helpful chapter in that."

Whether the execution ultimately has political repercussions beyond Iraq and here in the United States remains an open question. But as senators prepared to be called to the White House as early as Friday for briefings about the president's Iraq plan, the video emerged as a new complication.

In the video, Mr. Hussein was shown standing with the noose around his neck at dawn last Saturday in Baghdad, facing a barrage of mockery and derision from unseen tormentors. The images showed Mr. Hussein amid shouts of "Go to hell!" and "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" in reference to a radical Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr.

Speaking at the White House after a meeting with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany on Thursday, Mr. Bush said he had wished the execution had "been done in a more dignified way." He said he appreciated that Mr. Maliki was investigating the way the execution was handled, but that he did not dwell on it during their video conference on Thursday. Mr. Bush said Mr. Hussein had received a fair trial, the likes of which his enemies had not. "He was given justice; the thousands of people he killed were not," Mr. Bush said.

Senator Susan M. Collins, a Maine Republican, said she was troubled by the swiftness of the execution, adding that "taunting someone who is about to be executed is just blatantly unacceptable." The images contained in the video would almost certainly inflame sectarian tensions throughout the region, she said.

"I have no grief for Saddam Hussein, but it makes it more difficult for Iraqi leaders to forge the political solution that I think is necessary to quell the violence," Ms. Collins said. "It threatens the very existence of the nation and thousands of Americans and Iraqi lives to have Saddam mocked before his execution."

It was unclear whether the newly ascendant Democrats in Congress planned to make an issue of the handling of the execution. It is not likely to be a part of promised Senate hearings on President Bush's Iraq policy, according to aides in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

At the State Department, the official response has been that the execution, while imperfect, is in the past and that people should move on. But aides to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice continued to bemoan what one official called "the idea that of all the people in that room, Saddam Hussein was the one who looked like he had the most dignity."

Senator Richard G. Lugar, an Indiana Republican, said the circumstances surrounding the execution were "another factor that makes life more difficult for the Iraqi government as well as for our hopes for that government and stability." But the video, he said, "is by no means the most difficult issue we are facing in Iraq."

2 Guards Arrested For Hussein Video, Official Says (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 4 -- Two guards were reportedly arrested Thursday for recording former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's execution with a video cellphone.

DOJ_NMG_0112694

"Two Justice Ministry guards have been arrested. Other guards have identified them as having filmed the hanging," an aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Sami al-Askari, told [a] news agency.

The government, apparently seeking to douse the sectarian tensions that worsened following Hussein's disorderly hanging, said Wednesday it had detained a security guard, but it was not clear whether the detentions reported by Askari were in addition to the earlier arrest.

"The investigation is ongoing, and we have identified those who flouted the rules," Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani told reporters. "Even for a dictator like Saddam, the law must be obeyed."

Meanwhile, 14 people were killed when two car bombs exploded in quick succession about 10 a.m. Thursday outside a governmental heating oil facility and gas station in the Mansour neighborhood of Baghdad.

The explosions at the Abu Jaafar station also injured 18 others, as residents lined up to buy heating oil, said 1st Lt. Amar Yasin of the Mansour police. Mortada Jassim, a security guard at the site, said several of the nearby cars, laden with oil, also burned.

"These cars became car bombs themselves," Jassim said. Guards at the site said they believed they were attacked because the facility is frequented by Shiites.

The U.S. military said Thursday that a patrol in western Baghdad was attacked by small-arms fire, killing one U.S. soldier. The soldier's name was not released until his family could be notified.

U.S.-Iraqi Forces Launch Assault On Sunni Haven (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

.

AL SHAMS, IRAQ — About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops launched a major offensive at dawn Thursday in Diyala province, an increasingly violent zone east of Baghdad that has become a haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents.

The target of the strike is an isolated landscape of farms and irrigation canals riddled with weapons caches, safe houses and training ranges, U.S. military officials said.

The insurgents, however, appeared to be well prepared for the slow-moving assault. Smoke signals and flares arced into the sky as a column of tanks and Humvees from the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, pressed into an insurgents' redoubt. U.S. military officials said spotters used those techniques to warn guerrillas in the area that the U.S. and Iraqi forces were approaching.

Insurgents also had dug deep trenches into the roadways and sabotaged canal bridges to slow the troops' advance. U.S. commanders said they suspected that the obstacles were designed to divert approaching vehicles toward roadside bombs.

Four hours into the operation, an explosion ripped through the front end of a U.S. Humvee but failed to penetrate the cabin. The U.S. soldiers inside were not injured, but the wreckage blocked the road for two hours as troops salvaged the vehicle and searched for additional explosives hidden along the road.

U.S. commanders viewed the operation as an opportunity to test the 400 soldiers of Iraq's 5th Army Division.

Nonetheless, commanders kept details of the operation from their Iraqi counterparts until hours before it began, out of fear that information would leak to insurgents, said Col. David W. Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, which assumed control of Diyala in October. Sutherland said he suspected that information from Iraqi soldiers compromised counterinsurgency operations in November and December.

Some Iraqi soldiers chafed at the secrecy around the operation, which was launched from a checkpoint south of Baqubah.

"They do not trust us," said one Iraqi soldier who identified himself as 1st Lt. Ali.

The rendezvous was a chaotic scene, with dozens of armored vehicles jammed into a checkpoint. U.S. officers shouted commands in English in an attempt to make them fall in line. Several Iraqi vehicles started off in the wrong direction.

"No, this way, this way!" shouted a U.S. soldier.

By the time the joint force swept into six villages to conduct searches, there were no military-age men to be seen.

Diyala has become a sectarian killing ground, with the number of attacks on civilians more than doubling since February. A resource-rich province with a population divided among Iraq's major ethnic and religious groups, Diyala is home to at least 50,000 former officers of the Iraqi military and has become a staging ground for Sunni Arab insurgent attacks in Baqubah, the provincial capital, and Baghdad.

U.S. military commanders acknowledged that it was difficult to root out insurgents spread over such a broad swath of sparsely populated farmland, but said they hoped to keep the insurgents off balance by disrupting training and operations.

"We will never kill or capture them all, and even if we do, there are plenty more who will take their place," Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas said. "Our success, in my view, will be based on continued presence, denying this place as a safe haven."

DOJ_NMG_0112695

Despite the temporary confusion and trust issues, the Iraqi soldiers appeared eager to work with their American partners. Some sang celebratory songs in unison as they grabbed their gear and assembled near their Humvees.

Operations in the insurgent badlands of southeast Diyala are still a novelty for Iraqi troops, said an Iraqi soldier, and they relished a chance to strike back at gunmen who pepper the southernmost Diyala army outpost so often that it has been named "The Death Station."

"They are all terrorists there," said a Shiite Muslim soldier from Basra, who declined to otherwise identify himself.

Insurgent leaders are well organized and have relatively deep public support. Abu Musab Zarqawi, leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, was killed by U.S. forces last year in western Diyala, and his group retains a strong presence in the province. Ansar al Sunna, another insurgent group, also is active. But the most well-established groups, such as the Council and the 1920 Revolutionary Army, are composed of ex-Iraqi soldiers, U.S. officials said.

Two hours after joining the Iraqi soldiers, the convoy rumbled toward Diyala's southeastern hinterlands. As they progressed, reports crackled over the radio of four more explosions, which disabled U.S. vehicles but did not injure any troops. Two more bombs were found before they were detonated.

Helicopters spotted small groups of armed men using the network of irrigation canals that crisscross the region to bypass U.S. and Iraqi ground troops. U.S. officials said they killed nine suspected insurgents and detained about nine others.

But large swaths of the region appeared to have been abandoned by military-age males. During a sweep of one hamlet, convoy commander Capt. Stephen Dobbins found only several women and children and a couple of teenage shepherds.

Dobbins asked a woman with a child on her lap where all the men had gone. To work, she said.

A search of the village turned up $1,500, passports with foreign stamps on them, cellphones and two AK-47 rifles, the military said.

"Then why did I see men running away from here?" Dobbins said.

"Those men were from another village," the woman said.

Meanwhile, 89 people were reported killed Thursday in Iraq's continuing violence.

The dead included 13 people who were killed by two car bombs that exploded at a Baghdad gas station, a U.S. soldier killed by small-arms fire in west Baghdad and a Karbala council member shot to death along a southern highway. Police also found 47 bodies in Baghdad.

Bombs Kill 13 In Baghdad After Brief Lull In Violence (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD — Twin car bombings killed 13 people Thursday in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood, and Iraq prepared to execute two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants despite an appeal from the United Nations.

The explosions went off one after the other at 10:30 a.m. in the Mansour neighborhood, setting fire to a gas station and incinerating at least a half-dozen cars. At least 25 people were wounded, police said.

Firefighters sprayed water on the wreckage as soldiers and civilians staggered around in a daze. Blood pooled among scattered containers for propane and kerosene, near where tea cups lay toppled on a blanket spread over wood crates.

Mansour is a primarily Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad. During Saddam's regime, it was home to the most elite Iraqi families; many international embassies remain there, though shuttered.

U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said this week there had been a "downturn" in violence during the four-day Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which began last weekend. Thursday was the first day after Eid for both Sunnis and Shiites. Caldwell acknowledged the possibility that violence could surge again.

Police said 47 tortured bodies were found dumped across Baghdad on Thursday, up from 27 a day earlier. An American soldier was killed by small-arms fire in western Baghdad, the military said.

Iraqi officials said Thursday they planned to execute two of Saddam's co-defendants in the coming days. The former Iraqi dictator was hanged Saturday.

U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour appealed to Iraq not to execute Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of the Revolutionary Court. Saddam and the two men were sentenced to death for the killing of 148 Shiites in the 1980s.

"Nobody can stop the carrying out of court verdicts," Sami al-Askari, an adviser to the prime minister, told the BBC's Arabic service. "The court's statute does not allow even the president of the republic or the prime minister to commute sentences, let alone grant a pardon. Therefore, no pressure can stop the executions."

In Washington, lawyers for al-Bandar filed a new request for the U.S. Supreme Court to block his transfer from U.S. to Iraqi custody.

DOJ_NMG_0112696

In the southern city of Basra on Thursday, more than 1,500 people demonstrated to express approval of Saddam's execution. The peaceful rally began at the offices of the Dawa Party and ended at the provincial governor's building. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who pushed for a speedy execution of Saddam, is a leader of the party.

Deadly Blasts In Baghdad Leave Gruesome Traces (NYT)

By Marc Santora And Johan Spanner

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 4 — The foot was balanced on a shopping bag after being scooped up off the dirty street by a man in a track suit. There was no person to go with the limb. Nearby a charred body was still smoldering, smoke coming off the black corpse 45 minutes after the attack.

For 50 yards, the dead were scattered about, some in pieces, some whole but badly burned.

This violence on Thursday involved two bombs timed to go off one after another in the formerly upscale neighborhood of Mansour, which continues to be ripped apart by sectarian violence. Thirteen people were killed and 22 wounded, just a small fraction of the civilians killed across the country this week.

The first device went off at 10:15 a.m., probably a roadside bomb set on a timer, officials said.

The attack was apparently aimed at a gasoline station. Cars were lined up around the block waiting for fuel, and dozens of people, grasping large plastic jugs, hoped to buy heating fuel.

Just moments after the first explosion, a second, larger, car bomb detonated.

The neighborhood has traditionally been a mixed Sunni and Shiite one. Although the Abu Jaffar gas station, where the attack was centered, is in what is considered a Sunni area, the method of the attack — multiple bombs timed to explode in succession — is usually thought of as a trademark of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, a Sunni insurgent group.

An hour after the explosion, there was still a strong stench of burning gasoline and fire. The road was slick with sludge from the water used to douse the fire. Blood pooled in areas. Scores of armed men were running about, including members of the Iraqi Army and the police. Some of those with machine guns had no uniforms at all.

Shots rang out, mostly in warning. Neighbors gathered outside, oddly calm and seemingly accustomed to such carnage.

A tanker truck filled with fuel was parked near the station, having escaped the blast.

Not surprisingly, residents living near the area blamed everyone from the government to the Americans to terrorists for what had happened.

“We are just innocent people,” said Nafia Abdul Jabbar. “The people killed were poor, in need of kerosene that they cannot afford to buy on the black market because the price is 10 times more than it is at the station.”

Elsewhere, a mortar attack was directed at the Shiite neighborhood of Huriya, wounding three people, officials said.

Clashes on the outskirts of the Sunni neighborhood of Ghazaliya left two people dead and 25 people wounded, Iraqi officials said. A grenade attack in the Amin neighborhood killed five people.

Across the city on Thursday, officials said, 47 bodies were found mutilated — 4 of them with their heads cut off.

An interview with the family of a man recently mutilated and killed, a prominent sheik considered to be the prince of the Tamim tribes, gives a glimpse into the complicated underworld that is, in part, responsible for the trucks full of bodies collected around this city every day.

The man, Sheik Hamid Mohammed al-Suhail, 75, was found Wednesday in the Shuala neighborhood of Baghdad, a Shiite redoubt, by members of his tribe, which is mixed Shiite and Sunni, who were searching for him. He disappeared last Sunday, and his mutilated body was found wrapped in a blanket, covered in blood. The search party recognized his body by the distinctive way the beard was trimmed.

He had been an outspoken critic of the sectarian fighting and participated in a recent conference in Cairo on national reconciliation.

The kidnappers, whom his relatives hinted they knew but would describe only as “militiamen” for fear of reprisal, initially called his family asking for $100,000, said a nephew, Sheik Ali Sammi al-Suhail.

The family told the kidnappers they did not have the money, the nephew said.

“The body was mutilated in a brutal way,” he said. “They used a drill on him and perhaps other tools.”

One hand and one leg were almost completely severed.

The nephew said he had been told by people who said they witnessed the killing that after his uncle was tortured, his body was thrown from a two-story building. He survived the fall but was brutalized further before finally being killed.

Another prominent Iraqi figure, Sheik Akram al-Zubeidi, was killed Thursday in Karbala, a Shiite holy city where there has been little sectarian strife. Sheik Zubeidi was assassinated when he was stopped at a fake checkpoint, a local hospital official said.

DOJ_NMG_0112697

Three other people in the car with him were also killed by the gunmen, whose motive was unclear.

There was continued fallout Thursday from the execution of Saddam Hussein, as Sunnis, from Kashmir to Libya, used his death as a rallying point.

The Libyan government announced that it would erect a statue of him to stand next to one of Libya's own national heroes, news agencies reported.

At least nine people were hurt in the Indian-controlled part of Kashmir when the police fired rubber-coated bullets to break up a large group of people protesting the execution, [a news agency] reported.

Two Iraqi officials involved in the investigation of the distribution of a graphic video of the hanging said Thursday that a second guard was being held for questioning. Officials announced the arrest of the first guard on Wednesday.

There is increasing pressure, including from the White House, on the Iraqi government to proceed with caution in carrying out the execution of Mr. Hussein's two co-defendants, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Mr. Hussein's half brother, and Awad al-Bandar, a former judge.

Despite the international reaction directed at the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, Mr. Maliki's popularity among Shiites in southern Iraq seems to have increased.

In Basra, Iraq's second largest city, hundreds of demonstrators representing Islamist parties rallied in the streets, praising Mr. Maliki and setting photos of Mr. Hussein on fire.

13 Killed In Baghdad Bombings (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Twin car bombs killed 13 persons yesterday in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood after a lull in violence, and Iraq prepared to execute two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants, despite an inquiry into an unruly scene in the former dictator's execution chamber.

The explosions went off one after another at 10:30 a.m. in the Mansour neighborhood, setting fire to a gas station and incinerating at least a half-dozen cars. In addition to the dead, police said at least 25 persons were wounded.

Firefighters sprayed water on the wreckage as soldiers and civilians staggered around in a daze.

"What do they want from us? What do they want from us?" one Iraqi soldier asked, referring to those behind the blasts. Blood pooled among scattered containers for propane and kerosene, near where tea cups lay toppled on a blanket spread over wood crates.

Mansour is a primarily Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad. During Saddam's regime, it was home to the most elite Iraqi families.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell said this week there had been a "downturn" in violence during the four-day Muslim holiday Eid al-Adha, which began last weekend. Gen. Caldwell acknowledged that violence could surge again.

Police said 47 tortured bodies were found dumped across Baghdad yesterday, in addition to the 27 a day earlier. A U.S. soldier was killed by small-arms fire in western Baghdad, the military said.

Despite the row over Saddam's hanging and a call for restraint from the United Nations, Iraqi officials said yesterday that they planned to execute two of the executed dictator's co-defendants in the coming days.

"Nobody can stop the carrying out of court verdicts," Sami al-Askari, an adviser to the prime minister, told the British Broadcasting Corp.'s Arabic service.

"The court's statute does not allow even the president of the republic or the prime minister to commute sentences, let alone grant a pardon. Therefore, no pressure can stop the executions."

U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour appealed to Iraq not to execute Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half-brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of the Revolutionary Court. Saddam and the two men were sentenced to death for the killing of more than 140 Shi'ites.

In Washington, attorneys for al-Bandar filed another request for the U.S. Supreme Court, this time to Justice John Paul Stevens, to block his transfer to Iraqi custody. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. turned down an identical request on Wednesday.

Meanwhile, Iraq's interior minister said whoever recorded Saddam's hanging on a cell-phone camera would be punished, and Mr. al-Askari said two Justice Ministry guards were being questioned.

"The investigation committee is interrogating the men. If it is found that any official was involved, he will face legal measures," he said.

The grainy video shows Saddam being taunted in his final moments Saturday with shouts of "Go to hell" and "Muqtada, Muqtada" -- a reference to radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0112698

Prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon, one of 14 official witnesses to the hanging, told Iraqi state television that he did not think there was "any legal abuse, only moral violations."

Arrested Iranians 'Were Trying To Influence Iraqi Government': BBC (AFP)

AFP, January 5, 2007

Five Iranians detained by US forces in Baghdad last month were senior intelligence officers engaged in a covert political mission to influence the Iraqi government, the BBC said.

"There were five senior officers in various intelligence organisations... It was a very significant meeting... These people have been collared, relatively speaking, up to no good," one unnamed British official told the broadcaster.

US forces detained 10 people on December 21 on suspicion of weapons smuggling after finding what they said were documents, maps, photographs and videos in a raid at pro-Iranian Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim's compound.

Military commanders said the 10, two of whom were Iranian, were linked to "illegal activities," including potential attacks on coalition forces.

Three Iranian diplomats were detained in a vehicle in Baghdad the previous day but later released.

The BBC's flagship political programme Newsnight cited British authorities in Iraq as saying that while the arrests produced highly important intelligence information, there was no "smoking gun" about weapons supplies or attacks.

Instead, the Iranians were there to hold high-level meetings with representatives of several Iraqi Shiite factions that have come to prominence since the fall of president Saddam Hussein in 2003.

"There was discussion of whether the Maliki government would succeed, who should be in which ministerial jobs... It was a very significant meeting," one official said.

"The fact of who some of the Iranians were is very significant."

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said later he had invited the two Iranians detained at Hakim's compound to Iraq as part of an agreement between Baghdad and Tehran to improve security.

His office said he was "unhappy" with the arrests, increasing tensions between Washington and Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's Shiite-led government in Baghdad, which is pursuing closer ties with Iran.

The two Iranians were released last Friday. Shiite-dominated Iran -- which the coalition claims orchestrates attacks on its forces in Iraq -- said the arrests were an embarrassment for the United States.

The BBC said US sensitivity to the matter comes from discovering evidence that Iran is trying to turn the situation in Iraq to its advantage, to the extent of trying to influence the make-up of the Baghdad government.

Washington is now urging Baghdad to declare the Iranians arrested as personae non grata and ban them from returning to Iraq, it added.

The New York Times last week quoted White House officials as saying two of the men were "senior military officials" with links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard unit that trains Lebanon's Shiite Hezbollah guerrilla movement.

The White House said it would wait for the results of an investigation before characterising the Iranians' activities, but suggested it confirmed Iranian "meddling" in Iraqi affairs.

Hakim, a member of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) which is part of Maliki's ruling coalition, met US President George W. Bush in the White House earlier in December.

Denying The Facts, Finding The Truth (NYT)

By Slavoj Zizek

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

London

ONE of the pop heroes of the Iraq war was undoubtedly Muhammad Said al-Sahhaf, the unfortunate Iraqi information minister who, in his daily press conferences during the invasion, heroically denied even the most evident facts and stuck to the Iraqi line. Even with American tanks only a few hundred yards from his office, he continued to claim that the televised shots of tanks on the Baghdad streets were just Hollywood special effects.

In his very performance as an excessive caricature, Mr. Sahhaf thereby revealed the hidden truth of the “normal” reporting: there were no refined spins in his comments, just a plain denial. There was something refreshingly liberating about his interventions, which displayed a striving to be liberated from the hold of facts and thus of the need to spin away their unpleasant aspects: his stance was, “Whom do you believe, your eyes or my words?”

Furthermore, sometimes, he even struck a strange truth — when confronted with claims that Americans were in control of parts of Baghdad, he snapped back: “They are not in control of anything — they don’t even control themselves!”

DOJ_NMG_0112699

What, exactly, do they not control? Back in 1979, in her essay "Dictatorship and Double Standards," published in Commentary, Jeane J. Kirkpatrick elaborated the distinction between "authoritarian" and "totalitarian" regimes. This concept served as the justification of the American policy of collaborating with right-wing dictators while treating Communist regimes much more harshly: authoritarian dictators are pragmatic rulers who care about their power and wealth and are indifferent toward ideological issues, even if they pay lip service to some big cause; in contrast, totalitarian leaders are selfless fanatics who believe in their ideology and are ready to put everything at stake for their ideals.

Her point was that, while one can deal with authoritarian rulers who react rationally and predictably to material and military threats, totalitarian leaders are much more dangerous and have to be directly confronted.

The irony is that this distinction encapsulates perfectly what went wrong with the United States occupation of Iraq: Saddam Hussein was a corrupt authoritarian dictator striving to keep his hold on power and guided by brutal pragmatic considerations (which led him to collaborate with the United States in the 1980s). The ultimate proof of his regime's secular nature is the fact that in the Iraqi elections of October 2002 — in which Saddam Hussein got a 100 percent endorsement, and thus overdid the best Stalinist results of 99.95 percent — the campaign song played again and again on all the state media was Whitney Houston's "I Will Always Love You."

One outcome of the American invasion is that it has generated a much more uncompromising "fundamentalist" politico-ideological constellation in Iraq. This has led to a predominance of the pro-Iranian political forces there — the intervention basically delivered Iraq to Iranian influence. One can imagine how, if President Bush were to be court-martialed by a Stalinist judge, he would be instantly condemned as an "Iranian agent." The violent outbursts of the recent Bush politics are thus not exercises in power, but rather exercises in panic.

Recall the old story about the factory worker suspected of stealing: every evening, when he was leaving work, the wheelbarrow he rolled in front of him was carefully inspected, but the guards could not find anything, it was always empty. Finally, they got the point: what the worker was stealing were the wheelbarrows themselves.

This is the trick being attempted by those who claim today, "But the world is nonetheless better off without Saddam!" They forget to factor into the account the effects of the very military intervention against him. Yes, the world is better without Saddam Hussein — but is it better if we include into the overall picture the ideological and political effects of this very occupation?

The United States as a global policeman — why not? The post-cold-war situation effectively called for some global power to fill the void. The problem resides elsewhere: recall the common perception of the United States as a new Roman Empire. The problem with today's America is not that it is a new global empire, but that it is not one. That is, while pretending to be an empire, it continues to act like a nation-state, ruthlessly pursuing its interests. It is as if the guiding vision of recent American politics is a weird reversal of the well-known motto of the ecologists — act globally, think locally.

After 9/11, the United States was given the opportunity to realize what kind of world it was part of. It might have used the opportunity — but it did not, instead opting to reassert its traditional ideological commitments: out with the responsibility and guilt with respect to the impoverished third world — we are the victims now!

Apropos of the Hague tribunal, the British writer Timothy Garton Ash pathetically claimed: "No Führer or Duce, no Pinochet, Amin or Pol Pot, should ever again feel themselves protected from the reach of international law by the palace gates of sovereignty." One should simply take note of what is missing in this series of names which, apart from the standard couple of Hitler and Mussolini, contains three third world dictators: where is at least one name from the major powers who might sleep a bit uneasily?

Or, closer to the standard list of the bad guys, why was there little talk of delivering Saddam Hussein or, say, Manuel Noriega to The Hague? Why was the only trial against Mr. Noriega for drug trafficking, rather than for his murderous abuses as a dictator? Was it because he would have disclosed his past ties with the C.I.A.?

In a similar way, Saddam Hussein's regime was an abominable authoritarian state, guilty of many crimes, mostly toward its own people. However, one should note the strange but key fact that, when the United States representatives and the Iraqi prosecutors were enumerating his evil deeds, they systematically omitted what was undoubtedly his greatest crime in terms of human suffering and of violating international justice: his invasion of Iran. Why? Because the United States and the majority of foreign states were actively helping Iraq in this aggression.

And now the United States is continuing, through other means, this greatest crime of Saddam Hussein: his never-ending attempt to topple the Iranian government. This is the price you have to pay when the struggle against the enemies is the struggle against the evil ghosts in your own closet: you don't even control yourself.

If Iraq Fragments, What's Plan B? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112700

WASHINGTON

As President Bush readies a new strategy for Iraq, some experts in Washington are looking beyond the question of US troop levels to what might happen if worst-case scenarios come true. Call it Plan B: How the United States might handle Iraq's partition.

It may still be possible to hold Iraq together, many of these critics believe. A surge in American military strength might help. But the hour is late - and a lack of contingency planning on the part of US officials may be one reason the situation has become so dire.

"If I was working for George Bush, I would want somebody to be thinking hard about this, sort of preparing the groundwork," says Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow in foreign-policy studies at the Brookings Institution in Washington.

The US might need actively to aid Iraqis in relocating to parts of the country where they feel safer, says Mr. O'Hanlon. This sort of resettlement assistance wouldn't be unprecedented, he notes. The US did it in Bosnia.

Such a policy would perhaps preempt the violent Balkans-style ethnic cleansing that is already occurring in Iraq, O'Hanlon says. Sectarian strife is displacing 100,000 Iraqis a month.

"One-third to one-quarter of the ethnic cleansing that might occur [in Iraq] has occurred," says O'Hanlon.

Of course, to many US officials such a policy would be anathema. Mr. Bush has long insisted that a unified, democratic Iraq is one of his goals - not an Iraq separated into sectarian regions.

It has been widely reported that the new "way forward" Bush is expected to announce next week will include a substantial surge in US forces, designed to bring stability to violence-torn parts of the country.

Such an increase might allow reconstruction aid to begin to have a real effect in Baghdad and elsewhere, improving the daily life of Iraqis and strengthening the shaky central government, according to an influential report on the subject co-authored by Frederick Kagan, a military historian at American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

"Victory in Iraq is still possible at an acceptable level of effort," says a summary of the AEI study.

But events in Iraq now may be running at a speed that outpaces the US ability to respond. Bush has mulled over his options for weeks, while sectarian violence rises and the political partition of the country continues apace, says Vali Nasr, an adjunct senior fellow for Middle East studies at the Council on Foreign Relations.

The attempt to form a unity government has completely failed, says Mr. Nasr. Absent viable political plans, power is determined by the violence of militia in the street.

"The carnival of Saddam's execution is handwriting on the wall about how deeply divided this society is," he says.

Will the country's political divide be followed by a physical one? Possibly. Sen. Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware, incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has long advocated establishing Iraq as a loose federation, consisting of Sunni, Shiite, and Kurdish regions, and a Baghdad that belongs to all.

Other experts, including Leslie Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, have been increasingly vocal in calling for the US to help Iraqis resettle in areas of safety.

"We've got to provide them the means, the protection, and the funds to set up a new life," said Mr. Gelb in a recent National Public Radio interview. "We owe them that."

Resettled refugees might, in the end, blame America for their plight. The US could be accused of abetting ethnic cleansing. All plausible, says O'Hanlon of Brookings - but the problem is, the ethnic cleansing is happening anyway. The question, therefore, is really a humanitarian one: How to save lives?

In a recent piece titled "A Bosnia Option for Iraq," published in the journal American Interest and co-authored with Edward Joseph, a visiting scholar at Johns Hopkins University, O'Hanlon proposes a "soft partition" of Iraq.

The war in Bosnia ended only after 200,000 civilians died and half the country's population had fled their homes, says the article. Ethnic relocation may be distasteful, but with Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads now attacking even hospitals and schools, what is the alternative?

"If US and Iraqi forces cannot protect civilians, there is little moral dilemma about facilitating their movement to safer areas," says the article.

The Iraqi government would have to offer housing and jobs for those resettled, as well as protection while moving, according to the article. Government property commissions could help Sunnis and Shiites swap homes.

The key to making the relocation work might be a division of oil money. It should be split a number of ways, the article says, with individuals, provinces, and the overall government receiving allocations.

"The Bosnia option has a much higher chance of success than anything resembling current strategy ... although I can still see the case for one last big push [with more US troops]," says O'Hanlon.

Other experts say that a surge in troops will serve a purpose only if tied to a comprehensive approach of bringing stability and security to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112701

The problem now is not just troop levels or stability in Baghdad, says Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in a new study.

"The 'threat' from the insurgency and militias is only part of the problem," writes Mr. Cordesman. "Iraq's central government is weak and the nation is steadily dividing into sectarian and ethnically controlled areas."

Thus any new military effort should be accompanied by a further push to create incentives for peaceful coexistence, according to Cordesman - or peaceful separation where there is not a credible alternative. The US should "provide aid to relocation when this is the only option," writes the CSIS scholar.

A Mother Fights For A Soldier Who Said No To War (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Carolyn Ho is a mother on a mission.

She came to Washington in mid-December to build support for her son, Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada, the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq.

Barring some kind of miracle, he will be court-martialed on Feb. 5 at Fort Lewis, about 45 miles south of Seattle. If convicted, he could be sent to military prison for six years. There's going to be a pretrial hearing today.

Like many Americans, she believed she could come to the capital city and change the world. Or at least her small part of it.

She was acting purely on instinct, wanting to do everything in a mother's power to protect her son. "I'm here to get what I can," said Ho, who is from Honolulu. Dark hair pulled back. Dark eyes that moisten when she speaks of her son. Soft voice. "I'm going to put it out there."

At the very least, she hoped for some kind of letter of support before today's hearing. Late yesterday afternoon, a letter arrived. After a lot of worry and work.

Lobbying Congress is no day at the spa.

During her Capitol Hill quest, she was accompanied by several seasoned lobbyists, but they let her do the talking. She moved along the halls, sitting down with staffers in the offices of Sens. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) and Daniel Akaka (D-Hawaii) and aides from the offices of Reps. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), John Conyers (D-Mich.) and Maxine Waters (D-Calif.).

In closed-door meetings, Ho told the same story. She sees her efforts as part of a larger, multifaceted wave that is challenging the Bush administration from every angle. At the same time the president is advocating an increase in the number of soldiers in Iraq, there is on the home front an increase in the number of vocal opponents of the war. "I believe my son is part of this movement," Ho said.

Phoebe Jones of Global Women's Strike, an international antiwar network that supports Ho and Watada, was at Ho's side on Capitol Hill. "The work of mothers is protecting life, beginning with their children," Jones explained. "And that is really the opposite of the obscenity of war."

On the Hill, Ho handed out information packets. She passed around photos of Watada, who is taller, fuller of face than his mother, but shares her smile.

Her son "based his decision on facts," she said. He studied the war in Iraq and decided it was illegal. He tried to resign and leave the service with dignity, but the Army wouldn't let him. He asked to be shipped to Afghanistan; his request was denied. He was offered a noncombat position in Iraq; he said no thanks.

Because the United States entered the war based on false premises, Ho said, the war is illegal. It is thus her son's constitutional duty to disobey orders.

So she asked that members of Congress get involved. She said that ideally she would prefer that the military accept her son's resignation and dismiss all charges against him. "He shouldn't be in a military prison," she said. His voice "will be totally squelched."

She asked, "Just who is the criminal here? The one who is refusing to participate in war crimes?"

From the Army's standpoint, the case is simple. Tens of thousands of soldiers have passed through Fort Lewis on their way to the war and have not asked for special treatment, said Army spokesman Joe Piek. Watada, 28, signed on for military service in 2003 with full knowledge that he might have to fight an unpopular war, Piek said. "This is a case about a soldier who refused orders to deploy to Iraq. . . . That is the bottom line."

Watada has been charged with one count of "missing movement," which means he did not board one of the planes that were taking his 3rd Brigade to Kuwait on June 22. In Kuwait the brigade's 4,000 soldiers received their equipment and their marching orders.

He also is charged with "conduct unbecoming an officer," for subsequent statements he made. For now he is assigned to a special troops battalion and has been doing everyday soldierly duties while awaiting his court appearance.

DOJ_NMG_0112702

Piek said, "He joined the Army and swore an oath, and that includes following the orders of the officers appointed over him. His unit was placed in a stop-loss category, which meant that everybody currently in that unit would deploy. You don't get to pick and choose, especially if you are a junior officer, which places you get to go to."

To Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz, the situation is more complicated. "The United States talks out of both sides of its mouth," he said. "We've prosecuted soldiers in other countries for following orders to commit war crimes. But God forbid you should use that refusal as a defense in this country."

The Watada defense: Questioning the war publicly is not "conduct unbecoming" but an exercise of freedom of speech. And he had the right to miss movement because he was refusing to participate in what he deems an illicit enterprise.

To Carolyn Ho, congressional staffers were polite and receptive. She came at an inopportune time, she was told several times. Congress had adjourned for the holidays and there was not much time before the court-martial.

There were flashes of hope: Along the way, someone suggested that a "sign-on letter" sent by members of Congress to the secretary of the Army might be a way to galvanize support for Watada. Or a "dear colleague" letter that would alert others in Congress to Watada's situation. One staffer brought up the idea of a "private resolution," an arcane move in which Congress passes a bill that affects one person. "Those are possibilities," Ho said. But as the day wore on, fatigue showed on her face.

She left with little more than encouragement and good wishes. A high school counselor, Ho had been on leave since the end of September. She had to get back to work.

She is divorced. Her ex-husband, Bob Watada, has also been out drumming up support, speaking to churches and civic organizations around the country. She spent October and November on the West Coast and much of December on the East. At one event she shared a podium with Cindy Sheehan, who refers to the moms-against-bombs instinct as "matriotism."

Ho went back to Hawaii for Christmas, but is in the Seattle area this week for the hearing.

On the phone from Fort Lewis, Ehren Watada explained how he decided while still in college -- in the aftermath of 9/11 -- that he wanted to serve his country in the military. He walked into a recruitment office in Honolulu and said he wanted to go to officer candidate school. He failed the physical because of childhood asthma. "I was heartbroken," he said. "I paid out of pocket for a breathing test to prove I had no breathing problems. I passed the test with flying colors and was eventually accepted at the end of March 2003."

Though Watada's father did not serve in the military, several uncles were in World War II. One of his uncles was killed in Korea. Another relative was in Vietnam. "There is a history of service in our family," he said.

When he signed up, "I didn't know the things I know today. I believed the military and the government when they told me that Iraq posed an imminent threat."

Watada said it took him a couple of years to realize that the United States should not be in Iraq. He submitted his resignation in January 2006. "The commanders of my unit were not too happy about it," he said. They were surprised, he said, because until that point he had received positive evaluations.

"I can't stop the war," said Watada. "But if Americans believe the war is wrong, they should be doing everything they can to stop it."

His mother is doing what she can. "People are stepping gingerly," she said yesterday about legislative action. "There's a wait-and-see approach."

She was in Tacoma, Wash., yesterday for a press conference when she received a personal letter from Rep. Maxine Waters. Ho read an excerpt over the phone:

"The issue that [1st Lt. Ehren Watada] has raised deserves to be publicly debated and considered. And I will use my platform as a member of Congress and chair of the 'Out of Iraq' caucus to highlight the failed policies of this administration and stimulate discussion. . . . Your son has shown great integrity and dignity in his objection to the war in Iraq, and I commend you for working so hard on his behalf."

Ho sighed and said she found the letter to be "disappointing."

But it was something.

Theft Probe Leads To N.Va. Storage Site (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

An investigative trail littered with gold-colored AK-47s, documents labeled "CLASSIFIED" and pistols purported to have been given as gifts to Saddam Hussein led federal investigators here: a Manassas storage center.

Atlantic Self Storage, nestled between Interstate 66 and Route 234, sits across from a Super 8 Motel and is little more than rows of rust-colored garage doors leading to individual units. But according to court documents filed recently in Prince William County, one of the storage units may hold clues for a federal investigation spanning the country.

In a 10-page affidavit for a search warrant, a special agent with the Naval Criminal Investigative Service details how about 100 U.S. government and Iraqi weapons, along with secret documents, may have been stolen and ended up in storage units in California and Manassas.

A Marine gunnery sergeant who once lived in Fairfax County and rented storage units in both locations was placed in pretrial confinement at Camp Pendleton because, the agent wrote, "reasonable grounds exist that he poses a serious threat to the national security of the Unites States."

The gunnery sergeant, Gary Maziarz, is charged with larceny of computer and camera equipment, larceny of weaponry and possession of steroids, according to officials at Camp Pendleton, north of San Diego. He is scheduled for an Article 32 investigation, similar to arraignment, Jan. 17.

Maziarz's attorney, David Brahms, said that his client maintains his innocence and that the affidavit should be seen for what it is: "What it is, is an attempt by law enforcement to convince a judicial official that there is sufficient evidence for a search, but it is not evidence of guilt."

NCIS officials said they could not talk about the case because the investigation remains open.

Maziarz had worked in an intelligence center in Fallujah, Iraq, from February to May 2006, according to the documents. He was also assigned to a program administered by the National Security Agency and had access to information classified as the " 'Top Secret' level and higher," the papers said.

NSA officials did not respond to a request for comment.

This is what is known from the affidavit, filed in Prince William Circuit Court:

On Oct. 27, a colonel at Camp Pendleton reported as missing a large quantity of U.S. Government trophy weapons acquired during the conflict in Iraq.

An internal investigation cast suspicion on Maziarz, and he consented to a search of a storage facility he rented in Carlsbad, Calif., according to the documents.

That's when investigators reportedly found the weapons: gold-colored Russian Dragunov sniper rifles, gold-colored and nickel-plated AK-47s, four Iraqi swords, radios with Arabic writing, foreign helmets and Iraqi plaques. More than a hundred items are listed.

Authorities then searched another unit and an apartment Maziarz rented in Carlsbad. In his apartment, they found steroids and three commemorative Colt 1911 .45-caliber pistols "reputed to have been presented to Saddam Hussein," the agent wrote. In the storage units, they found more foreign weapons, digital cameras, computers and suspicious documents, according to the affidavit.

"Of note, two folders containing approximately 250 pages of material marked 'SECRET' were also discovered in one of the storage units," the agent wrote.

When investigators reviewed the material, they found that most concerned a 2004 "surveillance report of a suspected terrorist by a United States Government Agency."

"In order to avoid declassification of this document, I am intentionally avoiding any further description," the special agent writes, but he adds that these documents are believed "to be genuine and appropriately classified."

The investigation might have ended in California, but agents reviewing paperwork found a 2000 rental agreement between Maziarz and the Manassas storage center, according to the documents. A map was also found that showed an arrow pointing to unit 228 -- a 10-by-15-foot box that costs $164 a month to rent. It is where two agents showed up Nov. 7.

"I believe that Maziarz is using the Manassas storage unit to hold papers and equipment stolen from the USMC in the Northern Virginia area, just as he used the Carlsbad, CA unit," the special agent wrote, adding that the activity may stretch back as far as five years.

In April 2005, a second lock was put on the Manassas unit at the request of Maziarz, according to the documents.

"He asked me to put on another lock and send him the key," the manager, Ernie Jennison, said recently, standing in front of the barbed wire fence that surrounds the facility.

Jennison said the agents came several times and left a list inside the unit of what they took.

According to the search warrant, agents removed 43 items, including foreign and domestic military gear. They also collected objects that would require further scrutiny, including 74 floppy disks and a locked black briefcase.

Taliban Leader Promises More Afghan War (NYT)

By Ismail Khan And Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 4 — In what appears to be the first exchange with a journalist since going into hiding five years ago, the Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, said that he had not seen Al Qaeda's chief, Osama bin Laden, in five years and that he would never negotiate with the United States-backed government of Hamid Karzai in Afghanistan. He also threatened to continue the war until foreign troops withdraw from Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0112704

The statements were made in written response to questions sent by e-mail to the Taliban spokesman, Muhammad Hanif, who often speaks to journalists by telephone from an undisclosed location. Mr. Hanif said that Mullah Omar had written the replies himself and that a courier had returned the answers on a USB computer drive.

Though it was impossible to verify those claims, the statements, if authentic, would be Mullah Omar's first exchange with a journalist since he was driven from power in 2001 by the American-led invasion of Afghanistan. The fugitive Taliban leader, who claims to be at large in Afghanistan, is widely thought to have taken up sanctuary in Pakistan.

Since fleeing his last stronghold in the southern city of Kandahar in December 2001, Mullah Omar said that he had not seen or tried to contact Mr. bin Laden, and that although his movement did not have a specific alliance with Al Qaeda, they were fighting for the same goals.

"I have neither seen him nor have made any effort to do so, but I pray for his health and safety," he said of Mr. bin Laden. "We have never felt the need for a permanent relationship in the present circumstances. But they have set jihad as their goal, whereas we have set the expulsion of American troops from Afghanistan as our target. This is the common goal of all the Muslims."

Asked about the suicide bombers who have carried out over 100 attacks in Afghanistan in the last year, he said they were acting on religious orders from the Taliban. "The mujahedeen do not take any action without a fatwa," he said, meaning an Islamic edict. "They seek fatwas before they take any action in their self-defense."

He denied receiving any outside assistance, and dismissed as Western propaganda that Pakistan was providing assistance and a safe haven to his movement. "We have not received any assistance so far, nor can anybody prove that," he said. "The leadership, resistance and shura are all based here in Afghanistan."

He dismissed Mr. Karzai's effort to convene a grand assembly between Afghan and Pakistani elders and leading representatives to try to forge peace between the nations as a conspiracy by American intelligence agencies. "Only those people who have sold out to foreign forces will participate," he said. "Our participation is absolutely out of question."

"First of all, foreign troops should leave Afghanistan and then the institutions they have created should be dismantled," he said. "Unless that happens, the war will heat up further. It will not decrease."

"The people themselves have risen up to fight the Americans," the statement continued. "Nobody can tolerate this kind of subjugation and sacrilege of their culture and religion. It would be humiliating for anybody to think that the nation does not want to evict American forces. No nation can accept the dictates of a handful of dollar-greedy and treacherous people."

In his replies, he showed himself unrepentant for his refusal to give up Mr. bin Laden to the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and for blowing up the giant Buddhas of Bamiyan in March 2001.

"Our stand to grant refuge to Osama bin Laden was based on principles," he said. "If there were people who were opposed to us giving refuge to him, they should have done so with logic and reason, and not using bullying or threats," he said. The council of clerics, which was the highest authority of the Taliban government, asked Mr. bin Laden to leave, but never had any intention to force him out, he said. "The clerics had declared jihad against the United States in total opposition to his surrender to the Americans," he said.

Asked if the Buddhas' destruction was a mistake in retrospect, he said: "Shariah is Shariah. There is no distinction on whether a certain thing is difficult or easy. A certain number of Muslims have been influenced by other civilizations, and that's why they seem to find Islamic injunctions too difficult." Shariah is the legal code of Islam based on the Koran.

He repeated the same justification that his government had used previously for its harsh strictures that closed girls' schools and forbade women to work, namely that his government was still fighting a war and could not do everything at once.

"Girls' schools were either too few or were nonexistent before we took over," he said. "We were preparing a strategy for girls' education in accordance with the Shariah."

He blamed the anti-Taliban forces of the Northern Alliance and international sanctions for preventing his government from achieving its aims.

"We could have formed a real government had we achieved full and total control over the whole country, and we did manage to run the government in an organized manner with the blessing of Shariah and divine laws," he said. "But if there were problems, those were largely because of the conspiracies of the infidels and foreign enemies, for instance, the impositions of sanctions on Taliban, organizing anti-Taliban forces and preparing them to fight the mujahedeen."

Taliban Leader's Powerful Vanishing Act (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112705

KUCHLAK, PAKISTAN — Where's Mullah Omar?

It has been more than five years since the Taliban's supreme leader, a onetime village cleric, vanished into the trackless terrain outside his fallen Afghan stronghold, Kandahar. And his likeliest source of sanctuary is thought to be the belt of rugged tribal territory straddling the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, where the law of no nation prevails.

In Kuchlak, a dusty desert crossroads in the southwestern Pakistani province of Baluchistan, Mullah Mohammed Omar still is referred to by the title he assumed in 1996, when he and his puritanical Islamist movement seized power in Afghanistan: Amir al-Muminin, or Commander of the Faithful.

Omar's feat of eluding a long manhunt by the Americans and their allies, even with a $10-million bounty on his head, is celebrated here as proof of his mystical powers.

"With all their sophisticated satellites that can see a single needle from high in the sky, they cannot find him," said Fazil Mohammad Baraich, a district amir, or chieftain. "It is no surprise that God almighty protects him, and this increases our faith."

Rumors of Omar sightings abound, and are repeated by locals with an air of satisfied certainty.

"I, myself, have heard on good authority that he is living in a camp" in the military enclave outside Quetta, said Mohammed Ashiq, head of a merchants association in that provincial capital.

"And," Ashiq said, leaning forward conspiratorially, "I hear that he has gotten fat. Very fat."

During the Taliban's rule, it was Omar who ordered such stringent measures as the banishment of women from schools and public life, and the destruction of one of Afghanistan's greatest cultural treasures, the giant Buddha statues at Bamian.

He outlawed simple pleasures such as music and kite flying, even as he decreed, disastrously for his country, that the Taliban would provide aid and shelter to Osama bin Laden, who likewise has remained at large.

A Taliban presence

In tribal communities such as Kuchlak, sympathy for the toppled militia is defiantly undiminished. Many townspeople are of the same Pashtun clan as Omar, who by most accounts has never flown in an airplane and has rarely strayed from his homeland.

The cult-like devotion to Omar in the mosques and makeshift classrooms of the tribal territories helps ensure a steady supply of Taliban fighters. The militia's white flags flutter over Kuchlak's small, desolate graveyard, where the names of slain fighters are scratched into bare rock.

Little boys trudge through the town's rutted streets, bearing bags of bread donated to the town's many madrasas, or Islamic religious schools. On Kuchlak's edge, single tracks, equally suitable for wandering goats or militants on motorbikes, fade into a horizon the color of khaki, the Pashto word for dusty.

Across the border in Afghanistan, allied military commanders say they are putting increasing pressure on the Taliban leadership, most notably with a precision airstrike on Dec. 19 on a lonely road in Helmand province that killed Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani, a senior deputy to Omar.

Tracking Omar "is certainly a priority, and this kind of success shows we have the potential to reach those at his level," said Maj. Dominic Whyte, a spokesman for North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces.

But if Omar has taken shelter in Pakistan, he may be out of the reach of coalition guns. An airstrike in October on a madrasa in the Pakistani tribal region of Bajur, which left dozens dead, triggered a heavy anti-American and anti-government backlash.

For that reason, a strike on a madrasa or village thought to be harboring Omar would be politically explosive unless American forces were absolutely certain that he, or a similarly high-profile target, was present.

Kuchlak, 10 miles north of Quetta, is a convenient way station for anyone looking to move surreptitiously in and out of the tribal belt.

One road out of town leads north to the Afghan border and continues to Kandahar. Another, with only a single police checkpoint in more than 100 miles, leads northeast to the tribal area of Waziristan, where Pakistani authorities have struck controversial truces with tribal elders that prevent troops from pursuing militants.

Because of Omar's longtime aversion to being photographed — a policy he was said to have adopted on religious grounds — few in the border hinterlands would be in a position to positively identify him. His missing right eye was his most recognizable characteristic, but allied military reports say he may have been fitted with a glass eye.

In any event, many observers believe that betrayal from within Omar's tribal milieu would be unthinkable. For one thing, it would violate the rigid Pashtun code of behavior, which places a premium on clan honor and the unquestioning protection of guests. For another, any traitor probably would pay with his life, and with the lives of his family.

Political questions

Omar's role in the Taliban leadership, whether as figurehead or active military commander, is widely debated among analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0112706

Last week, before the beginning of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, Western news agencies received a statement from a purported spokesman for Omar, in which the Taliban leader boasted that his fighters would drive foreign troops out of Afghanistan.

The possibility that Omar has been sheltered in Pakistan raises thorny political questions for President Pervez Musharraf. Pakistan became a crucial U.S. ally after the Sept. 11 attacks, but the motives and loyalties of its government are under increasing Western scrutiny.

The Taliban movement, in its early days, was nurtured by Pakistan's intelligence service, and some observers doubt that Omar could have survived this long without its continued help. But others say no hard-and-fast proof has emerged that Omar is hiding on the Pakistani side of the border.

"He could be in Afghanistan, or he could be in Pakistan," said Rahimullah Yusufzai, a longtime Taliban watcher based in the Pakistani frontier city of Peshawar.

To admirers, the near-completeness of Omar's vanishing act after fleeing his gaudily appointed compound outside Kandahar in late 2001 is a triumphant rebuttal of the allies' characterizations of him as a simpleton.

"If that is the case," said Baraich, the amir, "then why has he been able to hide so well, and for so long?"

Pakistan Premier Wants Afghan Refugees To Return Home (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 4 — Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, said Thursday that he wanted the three million Afghan refugees still living in Pakistan to go home as one way to end the problem of insurgents using the country as a haven.

It is the first time Pakistan has been so blunt in demanding that the Afghans, to whom it has served as host for more than 20 years since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, leave.

Mr. Aziz arrived here for talks with the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, in an effort to smooth tensions between the neighbors, but after more than two hours Mr. Karzai acknowledged that relations were only growing worse.

"Unfortunately, the gulf in relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan is getting wider, and it is not getting narrower," Mr. Karzai said after their meeting.

The two leaders emerged with no agreement on the main areas of contention, namely Pakistan's plan to fence and mine the border, and Afghanistan's project to convene two tribal gatherings, or jirgas, of national representatives from both countries, to try to foster peace between the countries.

Shortly before the meeting, Pakistan announced that it was going ahead with a plan to fence and mine the long mountainous border. Afghanistan has repeatedly condemned the project as a diversion from the real problem of terrorism, which it says is being incubated in Pakistan. Pakistan has also dragged its feet on organizing the tribal gatherings, promising only to form a commission to work on the idea.

"The Afghan people want to remove all those obstacles which create the divide in our relations," Mr. Karzai said. "Those obstacles are created by terrorist activities which are hindering Afghanistan's reconstruction and making our schools burn.

"Security will not come to Afghanistan unless together we and Pakistan, with good and friendly relations, become tough in the fight against terrorism," he added. He said he wanted to hold the tribal jirgas so people could speak their minds.

Without offering specifics, Mr. Aziz said the two leaders agreed to work on resettling three million Afghan refugees back in Afghanistan and removing the sanctuary that refugee camps provide to insurgents.

"Refugee camps on our side of the border sometimes are safe havens for elements who are from Afghanistan and take safe haven there after conducting activities," he said.

He also defended Pakistan's plan to fence and mine the border as one way to restrict the movement of people who represent a threat to security. "We believe that selective fencing and mining can help achieve the objective," he said, adding that the fence and mines would not prevent the ordinary crossing of local tribes.

Medical Teams Saving More Troops (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

The killed-in-action rate in the Iraq-Afghanistan wars is half what it was in World War II and a third less than Vietnam and Desert Storm, according to internal Pentagon documents that say battlefield medical teams are doing a better job of stabilizing the wounded and getting them to doctors.

DOJ_NMG_0112707

"We have better battlefield medicine," Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, told The Washington Times yesterday. "We are reviving and resuscitating many, many more of our soldiers who would have died in previous conflicts."

The improvement may be little solace to the families of the American troops who have died or been seriously wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Pentagon, however, says it has put in place a first-rate system for saving life -- and limb.

The briefing papers show the killed-in-action rate is 12.5 percent for the current wars compared with 25.3 percent for World War II and 18.6 percent for Vietnam/Desert Storm. Dr. Winkenwerder, a trained internist, said the rate is based on the number of combatants who died of wounds before reaching a treatment center. He said the standard has been the same for each war.

Dr. Winkenwerder ticked off a number of improvements. Medics now carry resuscitation gear. Each soldier and Marine, not just medics and Navy hospital corpsmen, are issued tourniquets to stop bleeding.

"We had anecdotal reports of service members who died, unfortunately, because there was no tourniquet available until the medic got there," he said.

Medical teams have also worked on arriving at the scene of injuries, in most cases caused by a roadside improvised explosive device (IED).

"It used to be the 'golden hour,' " he said. "Now we are trying to get down to the 'platinum 15' because what kills so many people is hemorrhage, massive hemorrhage."

New ways of treating the wounded emerged with the creation in 2003 of the Joint Theater Trauma System (JTTS). It involves a constant "lessons learned" data analysis designed to come up with better tactical medicine

Until JTTS, for example, doctors were sometimes missing football-type concussions that occur in troops impacted by an IED.

Dr. Winkenwerder said the "few thousand" medical personnel in Iraq is the smallest in recent wars because many wounded and diseased personnel are flown out of the country to hospitals in Germany and the U.S.

From January 2005 to November, the military evacuated nearly 15,000 troops -- 23 percent for battle injuries, 21 percent for nonbattle injuries and 56 percent for diseases. During that same span, the military treated 80,448 patients in theater.

The briefing charts, which were compiled in December for presentation to retired military analysts, also credit new technologies, such as improved body armor, ballistic eyewear and hearing protection. It cites better-armored Humvee vehicles and better detection of IEDs, which are responsible for 80 percent of the Army's killed in action.

In the run-up to the Iraq invasion, the Pentagon failed to predict or prepare for the deadly insurgency that attacks military troops and civilians daily. Soldiers and Marines early on lacked armored Humvees that could blunt the force of IED blasts. The Army embarked on a crash program to produce armor kits for existing vehicles and to assemble armored Humvees from scratch.

The Pentagon also created a special unit, the Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization, and gave it more than $2 billion to find technologies and tactics to find and defuse IEDs.

The internal Pentagon briefing comes as the U.S. military suffered 115 combat deaths in December, the most since November 2004 and the third deadliest month since the March 2003 invasion to oust Saddam Hussein. Total U.S. deaths yesterday stood at 3,005 for Iraq and 357 for Afghanistan.

The number of wounded has reached more than 23,000 in Iraq and Afghanistan. This includes 759 amputees: 497 who lost a leg, arm, hand or foot; and 262 who lost a finger, toe, or part of a hand or foot, the Pentagon says.

The Battle Of Iraq's Wounded (LAT)

By Linda Bilmes

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

THE NEW YEAR brought with it the 3,000th American death in Iraq. But what's equally alarming — and far less well known — is that for every fatality in Iraq, there are 16 injuries. That's an unprecedented casualty level. In the Vietnam and Korean wars, by contrast, there were fewer than three people wounded for each fatality. In World Wars I and II, there were less than two.

That means we now have more than 50,000 wounded Iraq war soldiers. In one sense, this reflects positive change: Better medical care and stronger body armor are enabling many more soldiers to survive injuries that might have led, in earlier generations, to death. But like so much else about this war, the Bush administration failed to foresee what it would mean, failed to plan for the growing tide of veterans who would be in urgent need of medical and disability care. The result is that as the Iraq war approaches its fourth anniversary, the Department of Veterans Affairs is buckling under a growing volume of disability claims and rising demand for medical attention.

So far, more than 200,000 veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan have been treated at VA medical facilities — three times what the VA projected, according to a Government Accountability Office analysis. More than one-third of them have been diagnosed with mental health conditions, including post-traumatic stress disorder, acute depression and substance abuse.

DOJ_NMG_0112708

Thousands more have crippling disabilities such as brain or spinal injuries. In each of the last two years, the VA has underestimated the number of veterans who would seek help and the cost of treating them — forcing it to go cap in hand to Congress for billions of dollars in emergency funding.

The VA system has a reputation for high-quality care, but waiting lists to see a doctor at some facilities now run as long as several months. Shortages are particularly acute in mental health care. Dr. Frances Murphy, the VA's deputy undersecretary for health, recently wrote that some VA clinics do not provide mental health or substance abuse care, or if they do, "waiting lists render that care virtually inaccessible."

The VA also runs Vet Centers — 207 walk-in neighborhood help centers that provide counseling to veterans and their families. These popular, low-cost centers have already treated 144,000 new veterans. But they are so understaffed that nearly half are sending veterans who need individual therapy into group sessions or placing them on waiting lists, according to a recent report by the House Veterans' Affairs Committee.

At the same time, wounded veterans trying to obtain disability checks are being tied up in a bureaucratic nightmare. The Veterans Benefits Administration has a backlog of 400,000 pending claims — and rising. Veterans must wait from six months to two years to begin receiving the money that is due to them while the agency plods through paperwork. The staff eventually helps veterans secure 88% of the benefits they ask for — but in the interim, thousands of veterans with disabilities are left to fend for themselves.

The situation is about to go from bad to worse. Of the 1.4 million service members involved in the war effort from the beginning, 900,000 are still deployed on active duty. Once they are discharged, the demands for medical care and counseling will skyrocket, as will the number of benefit claims. The Veterans for America organization projects that VA medical centers may need to treat up to 750,000 more returning Iraq and Afghan war veterans and that half a million veterans may visit the Vet Centers.

And then there is the cost. After the Persian Gulf War in 1991, half of all veterans sought VA medical care, and 44% filed disability claims. Assuming that this pattern is repeated, the lifetime cost of providing disability payments and healthcare to Iraq and Afghan war veterans will likely cost U.S. taxpayers between $300 billion and $600 billion, depending on how long the war lasts.

President Bush is now talking about spending more money on recruiting in order to boost the size of the Army and deploy more troops to Iraq. But what about taking care of those soldiers when they return home? The VA's solution is to hire an additional 1,000 claims adjudicators to cut the backlog.

A better idea would be to stop examining each application and instead automatically accept all disability claims, then audit a sample (like the IRS does for tax filings) to weed out fraud. Or at a minimum, simple claims should be fast-tracked and settled within 60 days. We should also place more counselors and more claims experts in the Vet Centers and harmonize recordkeeping so veterans can move seamlessly from the Army's payroll into VA hospitals and outpatient care.

One of the first votes facing the new Democratic-controlled Congress will be another "supplemental" budget request for $100 billion-plus to keep the war going. The last Congress approved a dozen such requests with barely a peep, afraid of "not supporting our troops." If the new Congress really wants to support our troops, it should start by spending a few more pennies on the ones who have already fought and come home.

DOJ:

J.Lo Honored By People En Espanol (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK - Jennifer Lopez is among the entertainers selected by People en Espanol for its "100 Most Influential Hispanics" issue, which honors those who have made an impact in the Hispanic community.

Lopez, who graces the cover of the magazine's February issue, on newsstands Friday, says "being an example to others is a big part of my work."

The 38-year-old singer-actress also says she would like to have children someday.

"I come from a strong family, so of course I want to have one," Lopez tells the magazine. "But I do have my own family: my immediate family, my husband and his children. I get to share in all of that. I am very lucky to have that."

Marc Anthony, who didn't make the list, and Lopez were married in 2004. The 37-year-old singer has two sons, 5-year-old Cristian and 3-year-old Ryan, with ex-wife Dayanara Torres, and a 12-year-old daughter, Arianna, from a previous relationship.

"I have tried to calm down the past couple of years since I got married," Lopez says. "I have actually grown as an artist and as a person. I realized that everything I was doing leaned towards my roots ..."

DOJ_NMG_0112709

Lopez tops the list of entertainers, which also includes Antonio Banderas, Carlos Santana, Eva Longoria, George Lopez, Gloria Estefan, Ricky Martin, Salma Hayek and Shakira, among others.

The magazine also honors filmmaker Alejandro Gonzalez Inarritu (culture/the arts), Attorney General Alberto Gonzales (politics/public affairs), businessman Carlos Slim Helu (business), MTV President Christina Norman (media), Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim owner Arturo Arte Moreno (sports), sociologist Aida Giachello (science and technology/health) and teacher Bertha Flores (education).

Lopez' screen credits include "Selena," "Maid in Manhattan" and "Monster-in-Law." She has recorded her first Spanish language CD, "Como ama una mujer," which is slated for release this spring.

"When I see all of this, I say to myself: `Wow! I didn't know I had so many things inside,'" she says. "I am happy to have taken the time to appreciate it."

ON THE NET

Jennifer Lopez: http://www.jenniferlopez.com/

People en Espanol: http://www.peopleenespanol.com/pespanol/

Hopi Recommended For US Attorney Post (AZREP)

By Billy House, Republic Washington Bureau

Arizona Republic, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - A Hopi woman who has served most of her career as a federal prosecutor n Arizona is being recommended to President Bush as a potential nominee to become the next U.S. Attorney for the District of Arizona.

Diane J. Humetewa, 42, who is now the senior litigation counsel and tribal liaison under retiring U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton, was recommended to the White House Thursday by Republican Sens. Jon Kyl and John McCain.

Humetewa could not be reached. A Justice Department spokesman said she would not be immediately commenting.

advertisement

She would be the first Native American U.S. Attorney in Arizona if nominated by Bush and confirmed by the Senate. Officials were researching whether she would also be the nation's first Native American U.S. Attorney.

"I am proud to recommend Diane to serve our country in this noble role. As a native Arizonan, Diane has a sound appreciation for the culture and legal issues unique to the region," said McCain. Humetewa served as a counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Indian Affairs from August 1993 to March 1996, when McCain was chairman of the panel.

"Her distinguished career in public service, her experience as a prosecutor, and work on behalf of crime victims make her an ideal nominee for this role," added Kyl.

Humetewa is married and a 1993 graduate of the Arizona State University College of Law. She began her career with the U.S. Attorney's Office as a victim advocate for then-U.S. Attorney Stephen M. McNamee in 1987, and has served no less than six U.S. Attorneys, according to a news release announcing the appointment.

White House officials said they have no timeframe for considering McCain and Kyl's recommendation.

Charlton was appointed U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona on Nov. 12, 2001, by President Bush. He announced last month that he is quitting as U.S. Attorney to enter private legal practice at the end of January. He is to be a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy.

"I think Diane Humetewa is an outstanding recommendation. She's proven herself to be a great prosecutor and an individual with a very balanced sense of judgment," said Charlton. "As Tribal Liaison, Diane has developed outstanding relationships with the Native American community and as an early advocate of victim's rights she has ensured that victims of crime are well represented in the federal system."

Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz., was among those recommending Humetewa's appointment.

"She is a remarkable and impressive attorney and her record speaks for itself. Her work in the Arizona U.S. Attorney's office for the last decade has distinguished her within the law enforcement community," said Shadegg.

Reach the reporter at billy.house@arizonarepublic.com or 1 (202) 906-8136. Read his blog on Washington politics at dcblog.azcentral.com.

Low-profile Demeanor In A High-profile Job (MDGAZ)

By C. Benjamin Ford, Staff Writer

Maryland Gazette, January 5, 2007

U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein's willingness to share credit draws a lot of fans Friday,

BALTIMORE — U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein has the polite manner and looks of a friendly youth pastor.

DOJ_NMG_0112710

But county prosecutors across the state describe Rosenstein as nose-to-the-grindstone federal prosecutor who has raised the profile of the office through frequent news conferences and aggressive prosecutions ranging from corporate corruption to gang crimes.

Since his appointment in May 2005, Rosenstein has brought innovative ideas to the office, including bringing the first racketeering charges against members of the street gang MS-13, said Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler (D).

''This U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein is one of the best that we've had here in Maryland in recent times," said Gansler, who was Montgomery County's top prosecutor for eight years and an assistant U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C., before that. ''He's a prosecutor's prosecutor."

Federal prosecutors obtained racketeering charges against 22 suspected Mara Salvatrucha members in August 2005 — the first use of the RICO statute for street gangs in Maryland. Under the 1970 Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization statute, members of an organization can be convicted for involvement in all the crimes committed by the group.

Federal prosecutors worked closely with Montgomery's prosecutors in going after members of the violent gang, Gansler said.

Rosenstein ''came to the office weeks after taking over," Gansler said. ''We discussed our mutual concerns and the reality of the gang problem."

When the MS-13 indictments were handed down in August 2005, Rosenstein praised the work and cooperation of the state's attorneys and police departments in Montgomery and Prince George's counties as well as the FBI and other agencies.

Praising colleagues has become a hallmark of Rosenstein's tenure in Baltimore.

''He's very good about spreading out the love," said FBI Special Agent Michelle Crnkovich of the Baltimore field office. ''He has no problem thanking everybody for their contribution, and he lists everybody involved. He's very good about giving credit."

Sharing credit pays off

Rosenstein said he holds news conferences in order to keep the public informed about what is going on and to send a message to would-be criminals about the legal risks they face.

''When a drug dealer who thinks he's going to face a five-year sentence arrives in federal court and learns he faces a possible life sentence, I almost feel sorry for him," Rosenstein said.

Giving credit is also important to the morale of law enforcement officers, who do not make a lot of money and do not always get the recognition they deserve, he said.

Rosenstein was once asked by one of the prosecution supervisors in his office whether it was a good idea to put so much emphasis on the work of others. ''A week afterwards, the supervisor received a letter from a police captain thanking him for his division being mentioned," Rosenstein said.

While some have speculated Rosenstein, a registered Republican, plans to use his office as a springboard for political office, he laughs at the idea.

''I've never been involved in partisan politics," he said. ''As a teenager, I ran as a judge of elections. That's it. I've prosecuted politicians. I think it's important for prosecutors, particularly of public corruption, that you remain out of partisan politics."

Rosenstein said he respects ''honest politicians" even though he has no interest in joining their ranks. ''It just doesn't interest me."

''Rod Rosenstein is a career prosecutor," Gansler agreed. ''He doesn't have a political agenda. He's not in it for glory. He's trying to do the right thing and anyone who is a career prosecutor knows it's not one guy. It's a team effort."

Eighteen months into his job, Rosenstein, 41, already dreads its end. ''I love this job," he said. ''It's a wonderful opportunity to make a difference."

George W. Bush appointed Rosenstein in May 2005 to replace the controversial Thomas M. DiBiagio, who resigned in January 2005.

At the time, Rosenstein was the principal deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's tax division in Washington. U.S. attorneys serve four-year terms at the will of the president.

''The irony about this job is it's one of the best jobs in law enforcement, but after you serve one term or two terms, it's over," Rosenstein said.

Held in high regard

Unlike his predecessor, Rosenstein has drawn praise from Democrats and Republicans alike. Some accused DiBiagio of launching investigations against Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend and the Democratic Baltimore City Council for partisan purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0112711

"I like what I know of Rod Rosenstein," said Stephen H. Sachs, a Democrat who was U.S. attorney for Maryland from 1967 to 1970 and Maryland attorney general from 1979 to 1986. "He has a very good reputation as a professional. He comes out of Justice, as you know, and friends of mine in Justice all thought well of him in the tax division."

From 1995 to 1997, Rosenstein worked as an associate independent counsel under Kenneth W. Starr, investigating allegations against President William J. Clinton (D). He left that job in 1997 when U.S. Attorney for Maryland Lynne A. Battaglia, a Clinton appointee, hired Rosenstein as assistant U.S. attorney.

"I thought he was very capable, very intelligent and very able at that time and I've seen nothing to dissuade me from that," said Battaglia, who was appointed to the Maryland Court of Appeals, the state's highest, in January 2001.

Baltimore city State's Attorney Patricia C. Jessamy (D) said Rosenstein has been on target in assisting the city's efforts to crack down on gun crimes.

"We've renewed some initiatives we had that were lagging," she said, citing Project Exile, which prosecutes owners of illegal firearms.

Under Rosenstein, there is more cooperation between city and federal prosecutors, Jessamy said. Federal prosecutors can review a Baltimore case and provide a federal "letter of intent to prosecute" which gives the city prosecutors leverage to get defendants to plead guilty to avoid facing federal prosecution later, Jessamy said.

"He's doing a fantastic job," said former Frederick County state's attorney Scott L. Rolle (R), who had been considered a leading candidate for the U.S. attorney's opening in 2005. "We've had a number of dealings with his office and they were very attentive, very eager and willing to help. It's been great and better than it's ever been since I've taken over 12 years ago — no disrespect to the other U.S. attorneys. It's much more of a cooperative spirit."

That cooperation could serve him well when his term expires and he looks for support in his next endeavor.

Rosenstein is interested in becoming a federal judge; several years ago, he applied for an opening.

It is rare for a former U.S. attorney to return to the ranks as an assistant U.S. attorney, he said.

"I've been in government 17 years," said Rosenstein, who became a federal prosecutor after graduating from Harvard University's law school where he was editor of the law review. "I've never had to worry about where my next paycheck is coming from. It's always been the Department of Justice."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors End Case In Long AOL Fraud Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Federal prosecutors concluded their accounting-fraud case against two former AOL executives yesterday afternoon, signaling that the long-running trial soon may end after unusual twists including a mistrial for one of the defendants.

The case, which began in an Alexandria federal courtroom in mid-October, is one of the longest criminal trials ever in a jurisdiction that is widely known as "the rocket docket" for its speedy and efficient justice, legal analysts said.

More than three dozen government witnesses testified about complex accounting tricks that hearkened back to early 2001, when the technology boom had turned into a bust. At the time, the Dulles Internet service provider struggled to show revenue and advertising gains by making questionable deals with dot-com business partners in which no revenue changed hands.

"There was an intense focus to get revenue," testified Jason Witt, a manager in AOL's aggressive and freewheeling business affairs unit, which has been disbanded. "It's probably the greatest pressure I've seen since ever."

A number of witnesses recounted how the AOL defendants -- former business affairs executive Kent D. Wakeford and former Netbusiness unit vice president John P. Tuli -- felt squeezed between the expectations of their employer to close more deals and demands from dot-com clients who themselves were struggling to stay afloat.

Witt, for example, said Wakeford told him not to put terms of a deal in writing. He also spoke of a 2002 meeting with Tuli in the AOL parking garage in which they discussed whether regulators had begun to inquire about AOL's dealings with two high-tech business partners. Defense lawyers contend that the accounting treatment on the deals had been vetted by experts in the company and by far-higher-ranking executives.

But the trial perhaps is most notable for the absence of the former AOL officials who led the business-affairs operation, such as David M. Colburn and Eric Keller, whose names came up regularly in testimony and who once had been the focus of government investigation. Time Warner, which absorbed AOL, agreed to pay more than $500 million to settle joint civil and criminal charges two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0112712

Neither Colburn nor Keller was charged with a crime. The five-year statute of limitations against them expired early last year. Prosecutors told U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. with the jury outside the courtroom that the U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of Virginia continues to investigate whether Keller misled investigators in sworn testimony to securities regulators. But there have been few, if any, signs of an active criminal investigation. The Securities and Exchange Commission, which has the power to seek the return of bonuses and other compensation, continues to scrutinize a number of former AOL executives.

The courtroom drama eased with the departure more than a month ago of its most colorful presence, Las Vegas entrepreneur Charles E. "Junior" Johnson. Johnson founded PurchasePro.com, a software manufacturing company that prosecutors say made a series of sham deals with AOL in early 2001 in an effort to stave off financial doom.

Johnson, who entertained spectators and courthouse personnel with his lively stories, was removed from the trial in November and a mistrial was declared for reasons that remain secret. Prosecutors say they intend to retry Johnson, who is accused of directing subordinates to destroy e-mail messages and forge accounting documents. That leaves his former employee Christopher J. Benyo as the only PurchasePro representative sitting at a defense table next to the former AOL executives.

Defense lawyers could wrap up their case in the next several days, putting their clients' fate in the hands of a jury that has remained attentive despite the trial's sometimes plodding pace. Earlier this week, five jurors dressed in business attire took notes and pored over documents, although a few panelists' eyes wandered as the morning dragged. So far, none of the three defendants has said he will testify in his own defense. Their lawyers will ask the judge to dismiss the charges against them in arguments today.

Central to the prosecution case are former PurchasePro executives R. Geoffrey Layne and James S. Sholeff, both of whom pleaded guilty in early 2005 and agreed to testify against their former business associates. Layne and Sholeff said they conspired with Johnson at the Bagel Cafe in Las Vegas in April 2001 to forge documents that allowed the company to reach revenue goals after the financial quarter had ended.

Their accounts over the course of the trial mostly implicated Johnson. They testified that they shredded documents and destroyed computers at his direction, then buried the ashes or raked the pieces into Sholeff's yard. Layne and Sholeff also mentioned conversations with Wakeford and Tuli, who were under heavy pressure to close revenue gaps at AOL.

Defense lawyers for the former AOL executives attacked the veracity of both witnesses and suggested that they misled the jury to get shorter prison terms. Layne is serving a sentence of more than four years. Sholeff has yet to begin serving an already reduced sentence of four months in prison and four months of home detention.

Mark J. Hulkower, a partner at the District's Steptoe & Johnson who represents Tuli, hit Layne with question after question about his history of lying to friends, lawyers, and prosecutors, as well as accepting payments from Junior Johnson to cover large gambling debts.

"There is nothing left of Geoff Layne," Judge Kelley said in a private conference last month at the bench, as he brushed back attempts by Hulkower and Wakeford's lawyer, Henry W. Asbill, to introduce a vulgar e-mail message that would have further assailed the witness's credibility, according to trial transcripts.

As in many business-fraud cases, the outcome may depend upon how indirect and sometimes-murky testimony resonates with the jury. Sholeff, testifying that he had to change the date on yet another contract in early 2001 to ensure that the company could book revenue in the first quarter, said he tried to make a joke to Wakeford at the time. "I said, 'I guess I have to go commit another crime,' " Sholeff said.

How did Wakeford respond? asked prosecutor Charles F. Connolly.

"He kind of laughed," Sholeff said. "It was a nervous kind of laugh."

Gadflies Get Respect, And Not Just At Home Depot (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

For decades, activist shareholders were an entertaining, but largely ignored, Wall Street sideshow. Disgruntled investors would attend annual meetings to harangue executives, criticize strategies — and protest that their complaints were being ignored. One agitator appeared in face paint and a red nose after executives called him a clown.

Today, however, it seems that activists have captured the center ring and are directing the main event.

On Wednesday, shareholder advocates could claim one of their biggest prizes yet when Home Depot announced the resignation of its chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, long a target of shareholder ire for his large compensation and the company's flagging stock price.

DOJ_NMG_0112713

The main investor who pressed for the overthrow at Home Depot might at first glance seem an unlikely rebel: Ralph V. Whitworth, a lawyer educated at Georgetown and a former campaign worker for President Ronald Reagan who in December announced he had bought about $1 billion of the retailer's stock, or a 1.2 percent stake, through his fund, Relational Investors.

But the rapid success of Mr. Whitworth's campaign against the management and strategy of Home Depot demonstrates how thoroughly activists have moved into Wall Street's inner sanctum. Mr. Whitworth has said he still intended to nominate himself and at least one other candidate to Home Depot's board at its shareholder meeting in the spring.

"There's a lot more respect for investors like me now," said Mr. Whitworth, 51. "I still have to make threats, but now everyone wants to deal with us fast. They realize we've got real power and we're here to stay. "

The shake-up at Home Depot may be just a taste of things to come as shareholders and management at a number of companies, including Brink's, the Borders Group and Applebee's International, square off for battle at annual meetings this spring.

As those fights begin, expect few clown noses.

"Activist shareholders have a power and audience beyond what they've ever enjoyed," said Howard Steinberg, a lawyer who advises corporate boards and deal makers. "They're developing a credible track record, and as a result, more and more managers are forced to engage with them. Activists' time has come."

Since July, activists have pressed successfully to push out chief executives at Pfizer and Sovereign Bank. Institutional investors and mutual funds have set aside hundreds of millions of dollars to invest in underperforming companies with the intention of demanding new board seats or alternative strategies.

Much of that newfound influence is owed to recent legal changes and heightened attention to issues like executive compensation. But it also draws on the fact that many activists have now amassed the wealth, knowledge and networks critical for success.

"For years these guys were seen as politically motivated oddballs or annoying attention seekers," said Nell Minow, editor of the Corporate Library, a research group that rates corporate governance practices. "Now some of those same people control hundreds of millions of dollars and have been around longer than many C.E.O.'s"

Before the 1980s, much shareholder activism was directed by ideological agitators, including unions, religious organizations and populist figures like Ralph Nader, who bought shares in companies as platforms for urging social, environmental or political changes.

The United Shareholders Associations, which Mr. Whitworth helped found in 1986 with the corporate raider Boone Pickens, was one of the first major efforts to organize shareholder activists around profit-minded goals.

Every spring the group would select about 50 companies and begin asking embarrassing questions at shareholder meetings. In 1993, the last year of the group's operation, 25 of 43 of the companies, including I.B.M, reached agreements with Mr. Whitworth.

"The head of General Mills once called me a socialist," Mr. Whitworth said in an interview. "I told him I was the ultimate capitalist. Business people would return my calls for the first time, and it was giving me an entree into a world I otherwise couldn't access."

Foremost among the goals successfully sought by United Shareholders were regulatory changes that made it possible for dissidents to nominate only one or two directors to a board, rather than an entire slate.

By the mid-1990s, corporate raiders realized the rule offered a less expensive way to stage a takeover rather than buying a company outright. When the California Public Employees' Retirement System began looking for a fund that would use activism to increase returns in 1996, Mr. Whitworth and a colleague, David H. Batchelder, founded Relational Investors.

The fund today oversees about $7 billion, all invested in only nine companies that are chosen with an eye toward activist intervention. In most cases, Mr. Whitworth forces his way onto a company's board, either by threatening or staging a proxy fight. Investors say the fund has averaged a return of about 25 percent annually over the last nine years.

Activist shareholders like Relational were further aided by changes in the law. In particular, they say that regulations passed in 2004 requiring money managers and mutual funds to disclose how they vote in proxy elections have forced once-passive managers to become activists.

"There was a sense before that mutual funds in particular just voted with management," said Ann Yerger, executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors. "But post-Enron and Tyco, investors expect money managers to justify their votes now, and to be listening to anyone warning about dangers."

Moreover, money managers and hedge funds are beginning to advertise their activist intentions, bragging that aggressiveness gives them an edge. In November, the noted investor Robert A. Olstein announced formation of an activist fund.

DOJ_NMG_0112714

"We want to have an edge," said Eric R. Heyman, co-manager of the new Olstein Strategic Opportunities Fund. "Our skill is approaching companies and persuading management to adopt certain decisions, sometimes aggressively, and that's why people invest with us."

Another important shift is a court ruling last year making it easier for shareholders to challenge directors nominated by companies.

"Shareholders' toolboxes are getting more and more robust every year," said Ms. Minow of the Corporate Library.

Moreover, as the number of activist investors grows, a vast ad hoc network has formed that makes it more difficult for companies to win a fight. The universe of activist investors has expanded to include hedge funds like Pirate Capital, which is fighting to add its executives to the board of the security company Brink's, and investors like Carl C. Icahn, who failed to gain board seats after a public spat with Time Warner's chief executive, Richard D. Parsons.

When two activist investors, Pershing Square Capital Management and Nelson Peltz, bought large amounts of stock in Wendy's International in 2005, many other like-minded buyers jumped in, according to analysts.

As a result, the board had no choice but to accept activists' suggestions, said James V. Pickett, Wendy's chairman. Ultimately, three representatives of Mr. Peltz's fund joined the board.

"Most of the issues the activists raised at Wendy's were things we were already dealing with," Mr. Pickett said. "They just increased the intensity. But when they own that much of the company, you have to listen to them even if you don't want to."

For Mr. Whitworth, who has grown so wealthy that he once gave a charity $1 million in exchange for Paul McCartney's playing at his wife's 50th birthday party, that kind of access has increased his effectiveness, he says.

After forcing his way onto the board of Mattel, Mr. Whitworth was given a gold-plated Barbie in appreciation by other directors when he left.

But such shifts have also increased his ambitions.

"I was a firebrand; now I've mellowed a lot," he said. "But I'm still young. I look forward to helping a lot more companies become more efficient, whether they like it or not."

Nardelli's 'Severance' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

Few Home Depot shareholders are mourning the departure of Robert Nardelli as CEO this week, and we aren't about to defend his performance. But someone needs to rebut the claim, which is almost as rampant as the Schadenfreude at his fall, that Mr. Nardelli is getting a $210 million "severance" package as a reward for having failed.

"Seeing Red Over A Golden Parachute," declared the Washington Post, in a fairly typical headline. House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank, who wants to turn executive pay into a Democratic campaign theme, piled on by claiming that "Mr. Nardelli's contribution to raising Home Depot's stock value consists of quitting and receiving hundreds of millions of dollars to do so."

The truth is that nearly all of that $210 million isn't severance at all but was part of Mr. Nardelli's original employment contract. In other words, it was part of the package that the Home Depot board offered to lure him in the first place. Keep in mind that when he was hired in 2000 Mr. Nardelli had been a star at General Electric, one of the three executives competing to succeed Jack Welch as that company's CEO. When he lost out to Jeff Immelt, Mr. Nardelli was a hot executive property in a world that isn't exactly full of them.

At the time, too, Home Depot was considered fortunate to get him. The retailer had been growing fast, and in 2000 its shares were near the stratosphere like just about everyone else's at the top of the bubble. The board wanted a CEO who could keep les bon temps rolling, and so it offered Mr. Nardelli a big chunk of shareholder wealth to take the job. And, by the way, the terms were disclosed in the annual Home Depot proxy.

That contract can't be abrogated now simply because the board has concluded it made a mistake. Of that $210 million figure, more than $180 million is owed to Mr. Nardelli as part of his original job offer. That includes $77 million in unvested deferred stock awards, another $44 million in vested deferred shares, $32 million in retirement benefits and $9 million in earned bonuses. Even a $20 million cash payment upon termination was part of his original contract.

The bulk of what could fairly be called "severance" is $18 million in "miscellaneous benefits" that the company plans to disclose in more detail in its 8-K filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission next week. But even that was negotiated in return for Mr. Nardelli signing a non-compete agreement and a four-year pledge not to solicit Home Depot employees or customers. In other words, this is a fairly standard termination deal to protect the company's competitive interests.

We recount all this because it illustrates a reality of corporate compensation too often ignored amid the furor over CEO pay: Top executive talent is hard to find, and boards are willing to pay a premium to get it. Their hiring decisions don't always work out -- whose do? -- but they'll pay a lot to reduce that risk.

DOJ_NMG_0112715

This may be unpleasant for reporters and other egalitarians to hear, but it's a fact of the marketplace. Public-company CEOs face the harshest scrutiny because their pay packages are disclosed, but some of the largest compensation deals these days are being offered by private-equity recruiters. We doubt Henry Kravis or the Carlyle Group are parting with big chunks of their equity because they don't think their CEO hires are worth it.

Home Depot's flat share price aside, one of Mr. Nardelli's flaws was a tin ear for the new politics of CEO pay. The AFL-CIO thinks it has found a populist issue, and its political allies in Congress and at state pension funds are picking up the envy theme as a prelude to 2008. Mr. Nardelli embarrassed the Home Depot board that hired him by letting himself become a target of this campaign, compounding the error by trying to avoid questions at last year's annual shareholder meeting.

It also didn't help Mr. Nardelli that one of the Home Depot directors who hired him is Ken Langone, who also helped to set Dick Grasso's pay at the New York Stock Exchange. This makes the executive "greed" theme music even more fun to play. We're not sure where this latest populist campaign is headed, but the beginning of wisdom would be for the tub-thumpers to stop confusing "severance" with hiring pay.

One Bad Apple (WP)

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

THE SCANDAL at Apple Computer presents a dilemma with no easy solution. On the one hand, the company has changed its story on its use of manipulated stock options, which boosted executive salaries at the expense of shareholders, and Apple still appears to be bending over backward to protect Steve Jobs, its storied chief executive. On the other hand, if Apple's board were to come clean and oust Mr. Jobs, the shareholders would be punished yet again, since Apple is worth more with him than without him. Or, to put the dilemma a little differently: It doesn't seem right to let an executive float above corporate governance rules, but it seems equally perverse to enforce those rules if doing so would damage the investors for whom such rules exist in the first place.

That said, it would be easier to sympathize with Apple's directors if they described this dilemma honestly. Instead, they have dissembled. In October a special committee of the company's board, chaired by former vice president Al Gore, minimized Mr. Jobs's involvement in the granting of backdated stock options -- ones whose issue date is chosen retrospectively and designed to maximize their value to executives. But last week the company offered a subtly different account, explaining that Mr. Jobs had been personally aware of such grants and may have recommended the choice of dates in some cases. Moreover, Apple also disclosed that Mr. Jobs himself had received a large helping of backdated options. The company's documents stated that this award had occurred at a special board meeting. Apple now says that this meeting did not happen.

Apple argues that Mr. Jobs never benefited from his options grant. It has not disclosed sufficient information to determine whether this is true. The options were later swapped for restricted stock that was apparently worth considerably less -- perhaps this was Mr. Jobs's way of refunding the company. But neither he nor Apple has said as much. So for the moment analysts are left wondering why, even if Mr. Jobs deserves the chance to stay on, he does not explicitly reimburse shareholders.

The grant to Mr. Jobs, and the fictitious board meeting, both date from 2001 -- the year before a wave of corporate scandals drove the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance reform through Congress. Like the options backdating scandals at more than 100 other companies, they serve as a reminder of the rule-bending free-for-all that made reform necessary. Half a decade later, some business lobbyists are aiming to roll back Sarbanes-Oxley, and Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has made comments that could signal the administration's sympathy for that agenda. The stench from Apple shows the danger of a return to the old system.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Cite More Favors By Lawmaker (WP)

By Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Federal prosecutors seeking a stiff prison sentence for former Ohio congressman Robert W. Ney have listed previously undisclosed favors that he and his staff provided to clients of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including two Russian energy executives who have been linked to former House majority leader Tom DeLay.

Ney pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy, admitting that he performed official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and skybox sports tickets. He is to be sentenced Jan. 19.

The Republican congressman and his staff offered to aid Abramoff's clients in the summer of 2003 as Ney prepared for a trip to Russia, according to newly released e-mails attached to a Justice Department filing in federal court late Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0112716

Abramoff's lobbying team got the congressman to intervene with the U.S. Consulate in Moscow to help resolve a passport issue for the daughter of Abramoff client Alexander Koulakovsky, the e-mails show.

Koulakovsky and his business partner, Marina Nevskaya, hired Abramoff to help them arrange meetings with DeLay and to lobby for federal aid to their businesses. The Russian executives helped pay for a trip to Moscow taken by DeLay, his wife and aides in 1997.

A charity sponsored by DeLay received a $1 million check from a London law firm linked to the two. Former charity officials told The Washington Post last year the donation originated with Russian oil and gas executives, and was intended to influence DeLay's vote on an issue affecting the Russian economy.

Ney's chief of staff messaged an Abramoff colleague on July 28, 2003, noting that Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz -- who had joined Abramoff's firm -- had told them of the coming trip to Russia. "Anything we can do?" the e-mail asked.

Abramoff's team seized the chance, asking Ney to press consular officials on the passport issue, according to an e-mail that Volz sent to Abramoff. Embassy officials had their own interests in seeing the congressman -- they wanted Ney to meet Mikhail Khodorkovsky, a post-Soviet-era energy tycoon then under pressure from President Vladimir Putin. Ney obliged.

"Bob did not quid pro quo or anything, but decided to become a little more flexible on meeting with Khodorkovsky . . . and they became more flexible on the passport . . . Bob suggested they would have given him the passport ultimately -- no matter what, so he suggested that we just let Alexander and Marina know the consulate gave him the passport because a member of Congress asked for it," wrote Volz, who has also pleaded guilty in the corruption probe.

Ney has acknowledged that shortly after his return from that trip, Volz treated him and a staffer to a stay at a luxury hotel in Lake George, N.Y.

Ex Mass. House Speaker Indicted (AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 5, 2007

(AP) - BOSTON-A former Massachusetts House speaker accused of lying during his testimony in a voting rights lawsuit plans to plead guilty Friday to obstruction of justice, a person familiar with the agreement said Thursday.

The lawsuit had claimed that a 2001 state law that redrew legislative district boundaries discriminated against minorities in Boston while protecting incumbents, including the now-former House speaker, Thomas Finneran.

Finneran's trial on perjury and obstruction of justice charges had been scheduled to begin Jan. 16.

Under the plea deal, Finneran won't face prison time, and federal prosecutors will drop the three perjury counts, the person familiar with the deal told The Associated Press. He will serve probation, pay a fine and agree not to seek political office for five years.

Finneran, 56, has agreed to admit to some, but not all, of the allegations in the obstruction charge, which accuses him of obstructing justice by lying during the trial and in a deposition, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the deal has not yet been finalized in court.

During his eight years as speaker, Finneran was considered the state's most powerful lawmaker. Known for his authoritarian style, he was once dubbed "King Tom" for pushing through a rules change that eliminated term limits for House speakers.

He resigned as speaker in September 2004 and was indicted nine months later on charges that he lied under oath about his role in the state's legislative redistricting. The testimony was before a federal appeals court in 2003 in the voting rights lawsuit brought by a coalition of minority groups.

Separately, Finneran still faces a possible suspension of his law license or disbarment by the state Board of Bar Overseers.

Finneran Faces Loss Of State Pension (BOS)

By Jonathan Saltzman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 5, 2007

As former House speaker Thomas M. Finneran heads this morning to federal court, where he is expected to plead guilty to obstruction of justice, he faces the almost certain loss of his $30,000-a-year pension because of a decision last year by the state Supreme Judicial Court.

The state's highest court ruled unanimously in March that Boston Juvenile Court Clerk-Magistrate John P. Bulger forfeited his pension when he admitted that he lied to two federal grand juries investigating the disappearance of his brother, fugitive mobster James J. "Whitey" Bulger.

DOJ_NMG_0112717

Alden Bianchi, cochairman of a Boston Bar Association committee on pensions, said Finneran's case appears to be a more obvious violation of the Massachusetts law that bars employees from receiving a pension if convicted of a "criminal offense involving violation of the laws applicable to his office or position."

"If you're looking for an example of a clear-cut case, this does seem to be one," said Bianchi, given that Finneran's alleged misdeeds appear to have been directly related to his job.

Legal specialists said Finneran could also face a one-year suspension of his license to practice law.

Once the most powerful Democrat on Beacon Hill, Finneran agreed to plead guilty this morning before US District Judge Richard G. Stearns in exchange for federal prosecutors dropping three perjury charges against him, two sources familiar with the deal told the Globe on Wednesday.

Finneran, who faced 16 to 21 months in prison if convicted on all counts, is expected to serve a term of unsupervised probation and pay a fine to end the protracted legal battle over charges that he misrepresented his role in the creation of a legislative redistricting plan that siphoned voting strength from Boston's blacks and Hispanics.

The case stemmed from his November 2003 testimony in a civil suit brought by the Black Political Caucus and other voting-rights groups that sought to overturn the House's 2001 redistricting plan on grounds it was unfair to minority voters.

Finneran, 56, who has been president of the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council since he left the State House in 2004, also agreed not to seek political office for five years, according to the sources.

Alison Mitchell, spokeswoman for state Treasurer Timothy P. Cahill, who chairs the Retirement Board, said Finneran receives $30,909 a year through his public pension. But she declined to comment about whether he is in danger of losing it until the board reviews the matter, as early as Jan. 25.

The SJC's ruling in the John Bulger case offers him little hope, however.

In that decision, the court said Whitey Bulger's youngest brother violated the "fundamental tenets" of his office when he committed perjury and obstruction of justice even though his lawyers had argued that he acted out of "family loyalty" and his misdeeds were unrelated to his job.

He pleaded guilty in 2003 to two counts of perjury and two counts of obstruction of justice and was sentenced to six months in federal prison. Federal authorities said he falsely testified about contact with his brother, Whitey Bulger.

The SJC concluded that John Bulger's crimes could not be separated from the nature of his work , where duties include administering an oath requiring witnesses to testify truthfully.

Finneran's alleged offenses stemmed directly from his job as House speaker and his testimony in the civil suit on his role in the redistricting plan. A three-judge panel threw out the plan in 2004 and sharply rebuked Finneran in a footnote to the decision, strongly implying that he misled the court when he testified that he had little involvement in the drawing of the district lines. Federal prosecutors charged Finneran in June 2005.

Bianchi said retired state employees have lost their pensions under the law after being convicted of felonies, so he considered it "very likely" that Finneran will lose his. His prominence will only increase the likelihood, he said, given that "regulators will be under a great deal of pressure with this one not to let it slide."

Daniel C. Crane, the state's former bar counsel, said a lawyer's conviction for a felony or misdemeanor results in an automatic referral to the Board of Bar Overseers. The board then decides what discipline is appropriate, a ruling often appealed to the state Supreme Judicial Court.

Speaking generally, Crane said a conviction for obstruction of justice would probably lead to a suspension for at least a year.

Finneran's defense lawyers, Richard Egbert and Thomas Drechsler, separately declined to comment yesterday.

Get Out Of Jail - But Not For Free: Finneran Deal May KO Job, Pension, Law Career (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge, Boston Herald Chief Enterprise Reporter

Boston Herald, January 5, 2007

Disgraced former House Speaker Tom Finneran's expected guilty plea to obstruction of justice charges today will keep him out of jail but has jeopardized his job, pension and future as an attorney.

Sources told the Herald Finneran will leave his $500,000-a-year post at the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council as a result of his pending felony conviction. It was unclear last night whether Finneran will resign or be forced out of the post.

MBC officials declined comment and Finneran did not return repeated calls. His attorney, Richard Egbert, also declined comment.

Under a deal with federal prosecutors, Finneran will be fined and put on probation but will serve no prison time. Prosecutors will also refer Finneran to the Massachusetts Board of Bar Overseers, which will disbar or suspend him from practicing law, a source said.

A felony conviction also means Finneran would lose his $2,575-a-month state pension, which he earned through 26 years of public service. Under state law, a government employee's pension must be cut off if he is convicted of a felony connected to his job. Finneran's potential conviction stems from misleading testimony he gave in a civil trial over the drawing up of legislative districts in 2001 while he was House speaker.

Sources close to the ex-speaker said his decision to plead guilty was made in part to spare embarrassment, with a parade of as many as 40 lawmakers slated to testify. Many had already received subpoenas, including his top aide Charles Rasmussen, sources said.

Finneran, who is expected to land a plum talk-show host gig, could continue lobbying since there are no state laws barring convicted felons from being registered lobbyists, officials said.

The redistricting lawsuit was filed by voting-rights groups who claimed that legislative districts were being illegally drawn up along racial lines. Avi Green, director of MassVote, which was one of the plaintiffs in the suit, said Finneran's guilty plea "sends a message."

"You can't be above any law and that includes the voting-rights laws, no matter who you are. Even if you're the speaker of the House," Green said. "I hope that the legislators on Beacon Hill will look at what happened here and make sure it never happens again."

Former State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (AP)

By Jan Dennis

AP, January 5, 2007

PEORIA, Ill. - A former high-ranking Illinois Secretary of State official was sentenced Thursday to 30 months in prison for helping three janitors pocket nearly $200,000 in state pay for work they didn't do.

Cecil Turner, 60, is the former director of the secretary of state's physical services division. He was convicted in September of four federal counts of wire fraud for allegedly helping the janitors hide the six-year scheme, and two counts of lying to investigators.

Turner also was ordered to pay more than $49,000 in restitution to the state for money the janitors pocketed.

Most of the money will come from pension contributions Turner was ordered to turn over to the court. Turner lost his state pension after the conviction, but will be refunded nearly $46,000 that he contributed to his account.

Turner, of Springfield, showed no emotion as the sentence was handed down by U.S. District Judge Joe B. McDade. But in a tearful statement before sentencing, he denied any part in the scheme.

Turner said he worked hard to turn his life around and help his family and community after serving a year in prison 30 years ago in a scheme in which veterans' benefit checks were stolen from the postal service.

"I would never jeopardize all of that, especially under these circumstances ... Your honor, I did not do this. I swear to you I did not do this," Turner said, his voice shaking with emotion.

Turner's sentence was seven months less than the range of 37 to 46 months recommended in a pre-sentence report.

McDade said he trimmed the federal term based on an inch-thick stack of letters he received citing Turner's long history of work for youth, his neighborhood and community.

But McDade said he also needed to send a message to others in state government that corruption won't be tolerated.

"They must be aware that it's wrong, and when they're caught, they're not going to be able to rely on their good works and their white-collar station," McDade said.

Turner, free on bond, was ordered to report to prison by Feb. 7.

U.S. Assistant District Attorney Patrick Chesley said outside court he was disappointed with the lighter sentence, but called it substantial enough to help chip away at corruption in state government.

"This is a message to the public and to our employees that this administration takes unacceptable conduct very seriously, and if you're caught you pay a price," said Dave Druker, spokesman for Secretary of State Jesse White.

Defense attorney Michael Metnick had sought a 24-month prison sentence for Turner, saying he'd led an "exemplary, outstanding life" since he was jailed three decades ago.

"You hope for the best and expect the worst, although this wasn't the worst, obviously," Metnick said outside court.

Federal prosecutors claimed Turner helped the janitors pocket unearned state pay in exchange for special treatment by city trash collectors in his Springfield neighborhood.

Turner received no financial kickbacks, but aided in the scheme because one of the janitors - Dana Dinora - also worked for Springfield's public works department. He allegedly arranged quick pickups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0112719

Defense attorneys maintained Turner was unaware of the payroll scam they allege was orchestrated by Dinora, one of three former janitors who pleaded guilty in the scheme and agreed to cooperate in the case against Turner.

Metnick called Dinora a con man with a long record of abusing time off. Metnick said Dinora manipulated Turner and took advantage of his lack of experience after White appointed Turner to the $98,000-a-year job in 1999.

McDade called Turner "a good man," but said he traded taxpayer dollars and the public trust for "the power and the appearance of power that came from being able to call someone and get something done."

"This is corruption ... I don't care what kind of perfume you put on it," the judge said.

Turner and the janitors were fired after an investigation uncovered the scheme in 2005. Turner was among 20 department heads in the secretary of state's office overseeing maintenance and janitorial services in state offices, including the Capitol.

Dinora, 53, of Springfield, and two other former janitors - David Medvesek, 57, of Springfield, and Steven Boyce, 58, of Chatham - are scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 25 in federal court in Peoria.

Ad Man Sentenced For Pay-to-play (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 5, 2007

The former CEO of an advertising company was sentenced yesterday to 51/2 months in a halfway house for his role in a pay-to-play scheme at Philadelphia International Airport.

Joseph Evans, who was chief executive officer of Sky Sites Inc., a subsidiary of JCDecaux SA, a French-based media company that supplied indoor, backlit advertising displays to airports, will also serve 51/2 months of home detention.

Evans pleaded guilty to misappropriating company funds to make a political contribution. Three codefendants pleaded guilty to funneling $30,000 in campaign contributions to Mayor Street's 2003 reelection campaign to help secure a contract at Philadelphia International Airport.

In Pennsylvania, corporations are barred from making political contributions.

"In a city where recent events have shown that such subversion is all too common, this is no small matter," prosecutors Joan L. Markman and Joan E. Burnes said in a court filing.

Neither the mayor nor any other public official has been accused of wrongdoing.

The case is part of a continuing FBI investigation into corruption at Philadelphia International Airport and is related to federal authorities' City Hall probe.

In a filing, defense lawyers described Evans as "a fundamentally good and kind man who erred gravely."

"Mr. Evans was motivated solely by a misguided desire to promote Sky Sites and JCDecaux - and did not act for personal gain or profit in any way," wrote the lawyers, David M. Howard and Cheryl A. Krause.

Codefendants Terry Crockett, an architectural consultant, and Eric Selby were sentenced to probation.

Joseph Moderski of Bryn Mawr, a marketing consultant, is to be sentenced in March.

Exec In Pay-to-play Scam Gets Probation (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 5, 2007

In the late 1990s, Joseph Evans was the chief executive of a growing company with advertising contracts at 65 airports in 50 states and a staff of more than 50.

Then, in 2000, he became ensnared in a pay-to-play scheme at Philadelphia International Airport, a "completely misguided attempt" he thought would help his company, he wrote to a federal judge last month.

As CEO of Sky Sites, a unit of the French media giant JC Decaux, Evans approved a sham bonus letter to a consultant to disguise an illegal corporate campaign contribution.

The company then cut a $10,000 check to the consultant, Joseph C. Moderski, who later made a donation to Mayor Street's campaign committee.

Neither Decaux nor Street was charged with any wrongdoing in the case.

Evans, who pleaded guilty to mail fraud last September, was sentenced yesterday by U.S. District Judge James T. Giles to five years' probation on condition that he serve the first 11 months of probation split between time in a community confinement center and his home, tethered to a monitoring device.

He also was fined $10,000, and ordered to repay Decaux $10,000 (which he already has) and perform 100 hours of community service.

Giles said Evans should use the community service to counsel others who might contemplate similar conduct.

DOJ_NMG_0112720

"It gives you an opportunity to use the wisdom you've come to learn in a hard way to perpetuate that lesson," Giles said. "There are those who will now learn of your predicament."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan Markman and Evans' attorney, Cheryl Krause, said they were satisfied with the sentence. Ron Levine, and attorney for Decaux, declined comment.

Evans, 51, could have been sent to prison for 10 to 16 months under sentencing guidelines.

He lives in Oyster Bay, N.Y., with his wife and children and now runs his own business, training dogs to chase geese off fields, racetracks and other properties.

Evans pleaded guilty to a fraud charge in connection with the fake bonus paid to Moderski. Moderski sought the money from Sky Sites in 2000 so he could donate it to Street's campaign, the feds said.

Moderski pleaded guilty to conspiracy and fraud charges last September and is to be sentenced in March.

Two other businessmen were sentenced to probation last October for their roles in the scheme.

The idea behind the scheme was to curry favor with city officials to extend Sky Sites' advertising contract for terminals A-E at Philly International. The contract was later awarded to Clear Channel.

Judge Rejects Herrera Delay (LVRJ)

By Lisa Kim Bach, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, January 5, 2007

Ex-commissioner must surrender on Jan. 12

U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks on Wednesday refused a request to push back the surrender date of former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera, who in August was convicted of charges stemming from political corruption.

"The grounds argued in support of an extension of Herrera's surrender are founded upon arguments of financial hardship and inconvenience," Hicks wrote in a court order. "Given the severity of the defendants's criminal offenses and a surrender date that was more than abundant to prepare for incarceration, the motion is denied."

Hicks said Herrera is still expected to surrender to federal authorities on or before noon on Jan. 12.

In December, Herrera's counsel asked for a 30-day extension so Herrera could help business associate Jonathan Stern with completion of construction for Loft 5, an $80 million residential project that's had unforeseen delays.

The request was opposed by prosecutors, who stressed that surrender is not a matter of convenience for anyone.

Herrera's felony convictions stem from a 2003 indictment that charged he, along with former Clark County commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, Erin Kenny and Lance Malone, accepted cash bribes from former strip club owner Michael Galardi.

Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey were convicted in May of wire fraud and extortion.

Malone has entered a guilty plea but has not been sentenced. Kenny and Galardi, who both testified as government witnesses, also have yet to be sentenced.

Convicted Commissioner In Las Vegas Can't Delay Prison Date (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A former Clark County Commissioner lost a bid to postpone reporting to federal prison to serve his sentence on political corruption charges.

Dario Herrera, 33, will be expected to surrender to federal authorities before noon Jan. 12 to serve four years and two months in federal prison, U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks said in an order issued Wednesday.

Hicks cited "the severity of the defendants's criminal offenses" and said the 20 weeks he granted between Herrera's sentencing in August and surrender "was more than abundant to prepare for incarceration."

Herrera's lawyers asked the judge last month to push back Herrera's surrender date to Feb. 12, saying Herrera needed to help a business associate complete construction of an $80 million residential project.

A former commission colleague, Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, 68, also is due to surrender Jan. 12 to serve 30 months in prison. Kincaid-Chauncey has not sought to delay her surrender.

The two were convicted in May of conspiracy, fraud and extortion. Two other former commissioners - Lance Malone and Erin Kenny - also face sentencing after pleading guilty to taking cash and campaign contributions from Michael Galardi, the owner of three southern Nevada strip clubs.

Galardi also pleaded guilty and is scheduled for sentencing Monday. Malone is set for sentencing Jan. 16. Kenny is due for sentencing March 6.

Kopp Jurors Questioned On Abortion (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 5, 2007

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- Jury selection began Thursday in the federal trial of an anti-abortion extremist who shot and killed an abortion provider, on a charge that could keep him behind bars forever.

The roughly 100 people in the jury pool were questioned about their views on abortion and their knowledge of the the 1998 sniper slaying of Dr. Barnett Slepian. They filled out questionnaires that Kopp, who is representing himself, and prosecutors will use to narrow the field.

James Kopp already is serving a 25-year-to-life state sentence after being convicted of second-degree murder. Federal prosecutors contend that the shooting also violated the 1994 Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act.

Kopp, 52, also is charged with using a firearm during a killing, which carries a maximum sentence of life without parole. The clinic-access count carries a maximum life sentence.

Under his current state conviction, Kopp will be eligible for release when he is in his 70s.

Slepian was shot with a high-powered rifle as he stood in the kitchen of his suburban Amherst home after returning from a memorial service for his father. His wife and their sons were home at the time.

Kopp admitted firing the fatal shot from the woods outside but said he meant only to wound the doctor to stop him from performing any more abortions. He is suspected in four nonfatal shootings of doctors in Rochester and Canada during the decade before Slepian's death.

Authorities hunted 2 1/2 years for Kopp after the shooting, adding him to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999. He was captured in Dinan, France, in March 2001 and convicted two years later on the state charges of second-degree murder.

After parting ways with a number of lawyers, Kopp has been preparing his defense in the federal case from the Niagara County jail. Jury selection was expected to take several days, and opening statements were expected to begin Tuesday.

Since Slepian's shooting, extreme violence against U.S. abortion clinics and providers has steadily waned, according to the National Abortion Federation.

Nab 23 In Mortgage Con (NYDN)

New York Daily News, January 5, 2007

Twenty-three brokers, appraisers and bankers were indicted yesterday in a $3.5 million scheme to dupe banks and other lenders by recruiting "straw" buyers to fill out bogus mortgage and loan applications, Manhattan federal prosecutors said.

Brooklyn brokerages AGA Capital NY, Northside Capital and its successor Lending Universe Corp. earned $4 million in commissions between 2004 and 2006 brokering some 1,000 mortgages and home equity loans valued at $200 million, prosecutors say. The actual losses to banks and other lenders was pegged at $3.5million.

Prosecutors say the defendants identified properties in New York and New Jersey and then purchased them entirely through mortgages or home equity loans.

Money was paid to straw buyers who agreed to fill out phony applications that included misleading information about their income, employment and residence.

Eighteen defendants were arrested yesterday by agents from the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Four more are expected to surrender today and one is a fugitive.

Thomas Zambito

FEDS NAB BROKERS IN FRAUD SCHEME (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, January 5, 2007

January 5, 2007 -- A ring of Russian mortgage fraudsters brokered $200 million in bogus home loans using phony buyers and identity theft, and pocketed more than $4 million in ill-gotten commissions, prosecutors charged yesterday.

The feds nabbed 18 brokers, appraisers and bank employees on fraud charges for ripping off approximately $3.5 million from banks by doctoring mortgage and home-equity loan applications on at least 1,000 properties around the city, New Jersey and elsewhere.

Operating out of AGA Capital, a Brooklyn mortgage brokerage firm, the ring paid straw buyers to pose as legitimate loan applicants, according to an indictment that charges a total of 23 people, some of whom were not yet in custody yesterday.

AGA Brokers Aleksander "Shorty" Lipkin, Igor "Ryzhiy" Mishelevich, Alex "Lyosha" Gorvits and several others are accused of supervising the scheme to submit fraudulent loan applications from 2004 to 2006.

The brokers pocketed between 2 percent and 4 percent in commissions on each sale - to the tune of more than $4 million, the feds alleged.

In some cases, the ring "stole the identities of persons who fit a certain financial profile and submitted loan applications on behalf of these persons without their knowledge," court papers said.

Profits were jacked-up by obtaining artificially inflated appraisals that made it seem as though the homes were worth more than their actual sales prices.

The "buyers" then defaulted on their loans, forcing banks and other lending institutions to either foreclose on the properties or re-purchase the homes at rock-bottom prices, according to the indictment.

The ring members pleaded not guilty to bank and wire fraud charges at an arraignment in Manhattan federal court and were released on bail.

Feds: We Have Scammers Behind Millions In Fraudulent Loans (WNBC)

WNBC-TV, January 5, 2007

An alleged ring of mortgage scammers blamed for $200 million dollars in fraudulent home loans in New York and New Jersey was shut down Thursday by federal authorities.

FBI agents and NYPD detectives escorted the suspects to Federal District Court in Lower Manhattan.

Manhattan federal prosecutors charged that twenty-three people -- many of them Russian nationals -- cheated banks and financial institutions of at least $3.5 million in the two-year-old scheme.

By using straw buyers, hiding their own interest in the properties, submitting fake documentation, obtaining inflated appraisals and providing false financial information, the alleged scammers obtained the loans, according to an indictment brought by the United States Attorney of the Southern District of New York. The ring, which included brokers, appraisers and bank employees, allegedly orchestrated more than 1,000 home equity loans and home mortgages, said the U.S. Attorney.

The charges against the suspects include conspiracy to commit bank and wire fraud. Among the defendants are brokers and processors from AGA Capital NY, Inc. (which changed its name to Lending Universe Corporation) and Northside Capital NY, Inc., Brooklyn-based mortgage brokerages.

This case was investigated by the The Eurasian Organized Crime Task Force, a joint effort by FBI agents and NYPD detectives, and the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency.

Former Benton County Defense Lawyer Enters Plea In Bribery Case (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

YAKIMA, Wash. -- A lawyer accused of taking thousands of dollars from a Kennewick youth program has pleaded innocent to federal bribery and conspiracy charges.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael Leavitt entered a not guilty plea for Jeff L. Finney, of Benton City, and allowed the former defense lawyer to remain free without bond during an initial court appearance Wednesday.

Finney, 50, is charged with one count of bribery and one count of conspiracy to aid and abet in the theft of at least $20,000. Conviction on each charge carries a sentence of up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Shogren said Finney has cooperated for months with the investigation in the case, which the Tri-City Herald reported involves between $50,000 to $140,000 missing from the city of Kennewick's Home Base youth program.

Finney was a lawyer on contract to Benton County defending people charged in county District Court when he allegedly stole money in 2005 that defendants donated to the youth program in exchange for promises of reduced or dismissed charges.

A yearlong FBI investigation focused on Finney and Tyler M. Morris, 36, a former assistant city prosecutor for Kennewick.

Finney and Morris, of Walla Walla, lost their jobs after the newspaper published stories about the missing money. Morris has yet to appear in federal court on similar federal charges.

The Herald discovered that in some cases criminal charges were dismissed or reduced for defendants, but their cash donations, which had been encouraged by Finney and Morris as a way to resolve the cases, didn't make it to the city's Home Base account.

The stories also prompted the cities of Kennewick, Richland, Pasco and West Richland to cancel their own versions of dollars-for-deals programs.

Ex-health Care Company President Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

DETROIT (AP) — The former owner of a Michigan health care company pleaded guilty to federal charges of stealing nearly $800,000 by fraudulently billing Medicare.

Iftakhar Khan, 59, of Bloomfield Hills and his brother were indicted in 2003. They were charged with mail, wire and health care fraud.

Amjad Khan, of Troy, pleaded guilty in August.

Iftakhar Khan pleaded guilty Thursday before U.S. District Judge Nancy Edmunds. He faces up to 30 months in prison at a sentencing hearing set for May 3, U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said.

He was president of Livonia-based Michigan Rehabilitation and Pain Management. The company closed after the FBI and other agencies raided it in 2000.

Amjad Khan operated Warren-based American Home Health Care, which also closed.

The 2003 indictment accused the brothers of bilking Medicare of at least $2 million from 1995 to 1999. It said they sought reimbursement for their wives, who were falsely listed as company executives.

The brothers also were accused of billing Medicare for employees who were hired to provide gifts to doctors to drum up business.

Former Jackson County Executive Charged In Mortgage Fraud Case (AP)

By David Twiddy

AP, January 5, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Former Jackson County Executive Katheryn Shields and her husband were indicted Thursday on federal charges of taking part in a mortgage fraud scheme.

A grand jury charged Shields, 60, and her husband, attorney Philip Cardarella, 59, and nine other people with one count each of conspiracy and 11 counts each of wire fraud.

Federal prosecutors allege that the couple were approached by a group of individuals last fall who offered to sell their home, which was listed at $699,950, for $1.2 million.

The couple was to receive $707,000 of that amount, the remainder being split among other co-defendants and explained to lenders as a "management fee." To get the mortgage approved, the defendants allegedly provided lenders with fraudulent financial information and inflated property appraisals.

Officials said the FBI stopped the transaction from going through.

"This case represents another tragic example of intelligent individuals, including lawyers and prominent elected officials, thumbing their noses at the law in the pursuit of quick and easy cash," U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman said during a news conference Thursday evening.

Meeting with reporters after Schlozman's conference, Shields and her husband denied being part of a conspiracy, saying they had simply tried to sell their house, which had been on the market for 18 months.

"There's nothing illegal about selling your home for more than you list for it," said the couple's attorney, Curtis Woods.

The couple said their signatures were forged on a real estate sales contract. Cardarella also said he knew only a few of the other defendants and that Shields knew none of them.

They also claimed there was a political motive behind the indictment. Shields has survived more than three years of fruitless federal investigations into her work as the county's highest elected official, and the indictment came the day before she planned to file to run for Kansas City mayor - a decision she said she will not change.

"I think I've been subjected for the last three-plus years to political terrorism and I will not give in to political terrorism," Shields said.

Schlozman denied a political agenda: "That never entered into it."

Cardarella and Woods said they demanded Thursday morning to testify before the grand jury, but that Schlozman never got back to them. He said he left a phone message but they never got back to him.

The other defendants include James E. Coleman, 58; Raymond W. Zwego Jr., 58; and James R. Rhoades, 48, all of Kansas City; Larry Barshaw, 56, and Linda M. Thompson-Barshaw, 57, both of Kansas City, Kan.; Monty J. Kinman, 25, of Overland Park, Kan.; Rick A. Peterson, 32, of Lenexa, Kan.; Jeremy Plagman, 29, of Lee's Summit; and Michael Rodd, 52, of Olathe, Kan.

U.S. Death Sentences Drop To 30-year Low (AP)

By Robert Tanner

AP, January 5, 2007

The number of death sentences handed out in the United States dropped in 2006 to the lowest level since capital punishment was reinstated 30 years ago, reflecting what some experts say is a growing fear that the criminal justice system will make a tragic and irreversible mistake.

Executions fell, too, to the fewest in a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0112724

"The death penalty is on the defensive," said Richard Dieter, director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a Washington organization that looks at problems with the capital punishment system.

Death sentences fell in 2006 to 114 or fewer, according to an estimate from the group. That is down from 128 in 2005, and even lower than the 137 sentences the year after the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976. It is also down sharply from the high of 317 in 1996.

A total of 53 executions were carried out in 2006, down from 60 in 2005. Executions over the past three decades peaked at 98 in 1999.

Among the many causes given by prosecutors, lawyers and death penalty critics: the passage of more state laws that allow juries to impose life without parole; an overall drop in violent crime; and a reluctance among some authorities to pursue the death penalty because of the high costs of prosecuting a capital case.

But above all, many said, is the possibility of a mistake, made dramatically clear in recent years. Since the death penalty was reinstated, 123 people have been freed from death row after significant questions were raised about their convictions — 14 of them through DNA testing, according to the Death Penalty Information Center.

"The fact is they've gotten a lot of the wrong guys," said Deborah Fleischaker, director of the American Bar Association's Death Penalty Moratorium Implementation Project. "There's no question that has, in the public, created a lot of doubt about how the death penalty is working."

The turn away from the ultimate punishment also reflects a changing sentiment among juries and prosecutors, too, said Arthur Green, a prosecutor in Bessemer, Ala., outside of Birmingham. He said he considers the risk of executing an innocent person in deciding whether to pursue the death penalty.

"That's one reason I don't do it, except in very, very rare circumstances — one, that I'm convinced he or she did it, and number two, it's a horrible crime," Green said. He has sought and won two capital cases since becoming district attorney in 2001.

Thirty-seven of the 38 states that have the death penalty on their books now also allow for life without parole. Texas enacted such a law in 2005. Life-without-parole laws give another option to jurors who fear that the death penalty is the only way to keep a killer from getting out on the streets again.

The death penalty has also received more scrutiny from lawmakers around the country and the courts.

Illinois is in the seventh year of its moratorium on executions, and executions are effectively halted in New York because of a 2004 court ruling.

Also, questions about whether lethal injection is inhumane have put executions on hold in nine states — Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and South Dakota.

This week in New Jersey, a special commission recommended that the state become the first to abolish the death penalty legislatively since 1976, citing "increasing evidence that the death penalty is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency."

Backers of capital punishment say support for the death penalty remains strong, despite the drop-off in death sentences.

"It's a refinement. I don't think it's an abandonment of the death penalty, but a recognition that the death penalty should be reserved for the worst of the worst," said Joshua Marquis, district attorney in Clatsop County, Ore., and a vice president of the National District Attorneys Association.

"From prosecutors, there's a more discriminating attitude about which cases to bring," he said. "Juries have been much more picky about allocating the death penalty and I think that's an appropriate thing to do."

A Gallup poll in May found that two-thirds of Americans 18 and older support the death penalty. But when asked which is the better penalty for murder, roughly half said life without parole and about half said the death penalty.

Rethinking The Death Penalty (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

New Jersey could take the lead among states in abolishing the death penalty if it follows the recommendation that a legislative commission made this week. It is the right thing to do, and not just because capital punishment is barbaric and a poor deterrent. It has become increasingly clear as the use of DNA evidence has grown that there is simply too great a risk of making an irreversible mistake.

While we would have used stronger language, we applaud the 13-member panel for having the courage to recommend that New Jersey become the first state to abolish the death penalty since states began reinstating it 35 years ago. The commission included two prosecutors, a police chief, members of the clergy and a man whose daughter was murdered in 2000. Only one member, a former state senator who wrote the death penalty law, dissented.

Although it has nine people on death row, New Jersey has had a moratorium on executions since 2005 and has not put anyone to death since 1963. Nevertheless, the panel's recommendation that the death penalty be replaced with life imprisonment without parole is likely to have significant influence both inside and outside the state. It comes as about 10 of the 38 states with death penalties, including New York, have suspended executions and as recent developments, like DNA exonerations and a botched lethal injection in Florida last month, have created a growing unease about executions.

DOJ_NMG_0112725

With Gov. Jon Corzine opposed to the death penalty, and substantial numbers of capital punishment opponents in both houses of the Legislature, there is a reasonable chance the commission's recommendations will become law. That would make New Jersey's criminal justice system more civilized and fair. It could also prod other states to abandon their own use of what Justice Harry Blackmun called the "machinery of death."

No Whitey After All These Years (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, January 5, 2007

With the 12 days of Christmas safely behind us, Boston can pause to reflect on today's 12th anniversary of the disappearance of mobster madman James "Whitey" Bulger.

"The Bulger Task Force . . . continues to dedicate an extraordinary amount of time and effort in the conduct of a worldwide investigation to locate fugitive James Bulger," said Robert Krekorian, executive assistant U.S. attorney.

And what of the alleged sighting of the 77-year-old serial killer in October at a San Diego cineplex screening of "The Departed," starring Jack Nicholson as the questionably fictional head of South Boston's Irish mob?

"We continue to investigate that look-alike lead," Krekorian said, "but at this point in time we have developed no evidence to indicate that it was in fact James Bulger."

The suspected ruthless killer of 19 men and women has officially been on the lam since Jan. 5, 1995, when his arrest became imminent.

Coincidentally, former FBI Boston Special Agent in Charge Kenneth Kaiser will be feted today at the Omni Parker House.

Kaiser, tapped by Washington to serve as assistant director of the FBI's Inspection Division, made finding Bulger "a priority," said Hub office spokeswoman Gail Marcinkiewicz. "He's disappointed that it didn't come to fruition during his tenure here in Boston."

Hunt For Whitey Bulger Still Targeting Hub Kin (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 5, 2007

Decision said near on an indictment

A federal grand jury investigating whether William M. Bulger or his family obstructed efforts to capture his gangster brother, James "Whitey" Bulger , has been extended at least another month, according to two sources familiar with the probe.

Federal prosecutors are nearing a decision on whether there is sufficient evidence to ask the grand jury to indict William Bulger, former president of the Massachusetts Senate and the University of Massachusetts, on perjury or obstruction of justice charges, the sources said.

The investigation is focusing on whether William Bulger, 72, of South Boston, testified truthfully in April 2001 before a federal grand jury that was looking into whether family or friends of the fugitive knew his whereabouts or were helping him evade capture.

The statute of limitations on perjury and obstruction of justice requires that charges be brought within five years, but William Bulger's lawyers agreed to waive the statute to give the grand jury more time to conduct its probe, in hopes that he would be exonerated, sources said. The grand jury has been extended several times since the statute would have expired last April.

Thomas R. Kiley , the lawyer who represents William Bulger, declined to comment yesterday on the investigation. Robert Krekorian, chief of staff for US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan , said, "Obviously we wouldn't confirm nor deny the existence of any grand jury investigation."

William Bulger, who became president of the University of Massachusetts in January 1996, was pressured by Governor Mitt Romney to resign in 2003 after he was publicly grilled about his relationship with his brother by a congressional committee investigating the FBI's mishandling of informants. At the time, Romney said Bulger's answers had often been purposely evasive and that he represented "a cloud" over the university.

Today marks the beginning of Whitey Bulger's 12th year on the run. The longtime FBI informant was warned by his handler, retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., to flee just before his January 1995 federal racketeering indictment. The 77-year-old gangster, one of the FBI's 10 most wanted, is charged with 19 murders. The last confirmed sighting of the fugitive was in London in September 2002, according to the FBI.

William Bulger was subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury in Boston on April 5, 2001, and was granted immunity, meaning that none of his statements could be used against him as long as he told the truth.

According to a transcript obtained by the Globe four years ago, he testified that he had spoken with his brother only once since he became a fugitive, during a pre arranged telephone call he received at the Quincy home of a friend in January 1995 and that he felt no obligation to help authorities catch him.

When asked if he knew whether his younger brother, John "Jack" Bulger , had been in contact with their fugitive brother or his girlfriend, Catherine Greig , William Bulger said, "I have no knowledge of that," according to a transcript of the grand jury testimony obtained by the Globe.

"With respect to your office at the Senate and your office at UMass, do you have any reason to believe that any personnel or staff in any office you've working in since January of 1995 has been contacted in any way by your brother or Catherine Greig?" the prosecutor asked.

"Not that I'm aware of," Bulger responded.

The current grand jury investigation is focusing on whether Bulger gave false testimony to the grand jury in 2001 and, in fact, knew about a 1996 call that Whitey Bulger made to the home of a Senate court officer, while John Bulger and William Bulger's son-in-law were present, according to sources.

In a legal battle that went all the way to the US Supreme Court last year, William Bulger's former law partner, Thomas E. Finnerty , was ordered to testify before the current grand jury about whether Bulger was involved in the earlier alleged plot to thwart the investigation into contacts with his brother, according to sources and court documents.

Finnerty allegedly advised a client, Senate court officer Paul I. Dooley, to lie to a federal grand jury in 1998 about a telephone call he received two years earlier from Whitey Bulger, according to sources and court records.

The FBI knew that either Whitey Bulger or Greig had called Dooley's home because investigators had tracked calling cards used by the couple to make dozens of calls to homes and businesses in the Boston area during the summer and fall of 1996.

However, Dooley lied to the grand jury and didn't disclose that three others were present at his South Boston home for the pre-arranged call: John Bulger, then a clerk magistrate at Boston Juvenile Court; William Bulger's son-in-law, Michael J. Hurley, who was and still is an assistant clerk in the Senate, and Whitey Bulger's associate Kevin J. Weeks, according to sources.

The presence of the others at Dooley's house that day remained a secret from the government until three years ago, even though Weeks became a government witness and John Bulger pleaded guilty in April 2003 to obstruction of justice and perjury for denying he had contact with his fugitive brother or knew about a Florida safe deposit box. He spent six months in prison.

Then in 2003, around the same time federal prosecutors subpoenaed William Bulger's children to testify about possible contacts with the fugitive, Finnerty allegedly advised Dooley to go back to the grand jury and recant his earlier false testimony, according to sources and court records.

When prosecutors tried to force Finnerty to testify, he refused, arguing that attorney-client privilege prohibited him from revealing his conversations with Dooley and William Bulger, who was also a client, according to sources and court records.

The US Court of Appeals for the First Circuit found in July 2005 that an unnamed lawyer, identified by sources as Finnerty, lost his attorney-client privilege for involvement in an effort "to facilitate corruption and frustration of the grand jury inquiry."

The Supreme Court refused a petition by unnamed parties, identified by sources as lawyers for William Bulger, letting the appeals court ruling stand.

Finnerty couldn't be reached for comment. John Bulger declined to comment.

When testifying before the congressional committee in June 2003, William Bulger said he hadn't aided his brother since he became a fugitive. He told the court he had no information that could lead to his brother's arrest.

In the past year, the Bulger Fugitive Task Force has chased leads throughout the world, including in Chicago, Ireland, and California. An unconfirmed tip put him in a San Diego movie theater screening "The Departed" this fall .

Embezzlement Is Found In Catholic Dioceses (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein And Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

A survey by researchers at Villanova University has found that 85 percent of Roman Catholic dioceses that responded had discovered embezzlement of church money in the last five years, with 11 percent reporting that more than $500,000 had been stolen.

The Catholic Church has some of the most rigorous financial guidelines of any denomination, specialists in church ethics said, but the survey found that the guidelines were often ignored in parishes. And when no one is looking, the cash that goes into the collection plate does not always get deposited into the church's bank account.

"As a faith-based organization, we place a lot of trust in our folks," said Chuck Zech, a co-author of the study and director of the Center for the Study of Church Management at Villanova.

DOJ_NMG_0112727

"We think if you work for a church — you're a volunteer or a priest — the last thing on your mind is to do something dishonest," Mr. Zech said. "But people are people, and there's a lot of temptation there, and with the cash-based aspect of how churches operate, it's pretty easy."

Specialists in church ethics said they believed this was the first study to assess the extent of embezzlement in a denomination.

Officials at the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said they had seen the study, which was released just before Christmas and was first reported in the National Catholic Reporter, and were considering ways that parishes could tighten their financial controls.

"The Villanova study does not come as a surprise," said Bishop Dennis M. Schnurr, treasurer of the bishops' conference. "This is something that the bishops in this country have been looking at for some time. They are aware of a need to look for mechanisms that can assist parishes in accountability and transparency."

Mr. Zech and his co-author, Robert West, a professor of accounting at Villanova, did not set out to look for embezzlement. They were conducting a study of internal financial controls in Catholic dioceses and sent a battery of questions to chief financial officers in the nation's 174 Catholic dioceses; 78 responded. Mr. Zech said he was surprised that so many dioceses had detected embezzlement. In 93 percent of those cases, police reports were filed.

He said the survey did not ask who stole the church money. But it did ask who detected the theft, and found that it was most often the parish priest, followed by the bookkeeper, an internal auditor or the parish finance council.

In October alone, three large cases of embezzlement surfaced, including one in Delray Beach, Fla., where two priests spent $8.6 million on trips to Las Vegas, dental work, property taxes and other expenses over four decades.

In the survey, 29 percent of the dioceses reported thefts of less than $50,000.

Most denominations have had cases of embezzlement, sometimes by top officials. In June, the Presbyterian Church U.S.A. fired its second-ranking financial officer, Judy Golliher, after she admitted stealing money that church officials put at more than $132,000.

Many nonprofit organizations that accept cash donations experience theft, and churches are particularly vulnerable, said John C. Knapp, director of the Southern Institute for Business and Professional Ethics, at Georgia State University in Atlanta.

"Churches have a tendency to be in denial about the potential for this conduct in their midst," Mr. Knapp said. "When ethics seminars or ethics codes are proposed in churches, they are often met with resistance from people who say, 'Why in the world would we need this? After all, this is the church.' Whereas in business, people readily recognize that this sort of thing can happen."

The Salvation Army is widely considered exemplary among nonprofits in handling cash collections. The red buckets in which bell ringers collect donations are covered and locked, and all buckets must be returned to a central location, where at least two people count the number and type of bills, coins and checks, said Major George Hood, the charity's national spokesman.

The money must be deposited in the bank within 24 hours, and different people reconcile the initial tallies with bank records, Major Hood said.

In the Catholic Church, parishes and high schools handle many cash transactions, making them vulnerable to theft, the Villanova report notes.

Canon law requires each parish to have a finance council to provide oversight. But Bishop Schnurr, who heads the diocese in Duluth, Minn., said there were no standards for how finance council members were chosen or whether they should have any expertise in accounting or finance.

Only 3 percent of the dioceses said they annually conducted an internal audit of their parishes, and 21 percent said they seldom or never audited parishes, the survey found.

This lack of scrutiny is at the core of the problem, said Francis J. Butler, president of Foundations and Donors Interested in Catholic Activities, a nonprofit organization independent of the church.

"You're taking a lot of risk," Mr. Butler said, "and these days the church cannot afford to take these kinds of risks."

Bishop Schnurr said the study's findings on lack of parish oversight contradicted his experience. But both he and Kenneth W. Korotky, chief financial officer for the bishops' conference, said a committee could soon consider writing guidelines for the composition of parish finance councils and how often dioceses should audit parishes.

But they cautioned that the bishops' conference could not make guidelines mandatory, because each bishop was in charge of administering his own diocese.

Jack B. Siegel, a tax lawyer and expert on nonprofit management who has commented on church fraud on his blog, charitygovernance.com, said he kept a tally of church frauds and was surprised by how many occurred at Catholic churches.

"I got interested because I thought, wait, I've heard a lot about pedophilia, why aren't I hearing about these financial problems," Mr. Siegel said.

DOJ_NMG_0112728

He said he was impressed with the guidelines that the bishops' conference and other Catholic organizations have offered. But he said, "How those standards and guidelines get put into practice is what really matters."

Remain Silent? Some In Custody Spell It All Out (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

The "Beast of Broadway," as the tabloids call him, a successful actor, has been accused of sexually abusing a 15-year-old girl. But his grade-school teacher would be proud of him in at least one respect: He is a good speller.

That much was clear in the two and-a-half page written statement he gave the police after he was arrested, a statement that recounted a behind-the-scenes theater tour for the girl. He wrote these words voluntarily despite a constitutional right to remain silent that is ingrained not only in criminal law, but also in popular culture. But he was hardly the only person arrested in New York in recent years who opened up once the cuffs went on.

A former Women's Wear Daily writer, accused of disguising himself in a firefighter's costume and sexually assaulting a former colleague on Halloween, kept detectives spellbound with his disquisitions on Chinese menus and book rights.

A homeless man accused of stabbing a tourist as he rode with his girlfriend on the subway found that words weren't enough. Asked to sign his confession, he instead sketched a cartoon version of his crime: a pair of lovers' faces — one happy and one sad — and a stormy black cloud floating over a subway train.

Such statements — and occasional illustrations — by defendants in New York City courts are one element of what prosecutors call the V.D.F., more formally known as the People's Voluntary Disclosure Form. To read them is to experience a kind of poetry of everyday criminal life in New York City.

By turns raw, ugly, poignant, defiant, rarely remorseful and almost always damaging, the statements are a window into the criminal process, part of the common language between detectives and suspects.

"It's kind of like the literature of the criminal defendant," said Gerald L. Shargel, a criminal defense lawyer. "The information contained on the V.D.F. is much more rich and colorful than anything the defense lawyer provides."

Because they can be so revealing, the V.D.F.'s are a bane of defense lawyers' existence, and they often try to suppress them so they cannot be used in court.

More technically, the Voluntary Disclosure Form is a rough, preliminary summary of the evidence, which the prosecution is required to give to the defense. There is space for prosecutors to type out information like the date, place and time of the "occurrence."

And there is space for detectives to provide statements made by defendants at the time of arrest, either as summarized by the police, or in the defendant's own writing.

For many people, the urge to explain, if not to confess, is as urgent as it was for Raskolnikov in "Crime and Punishment."

"My name is Paul Cortez," is the Melvillian first sentence of the V.D.F. statement handwritten by Mr. Cortez, a yoga teacher who is awaiting trial as the suspect in the fatal stabbing of a dancer in her Upper East Side apartment.

What follows is a three-page roller coaster ride of love, sex and betrayal, culminating in an alibi. On the day of the victim's death, Mr. Cortez wrote, "I knew something was wrong, so I called back several times." When she didn't answer, he called clients, watched a football game with a friend, "then read a little and went to bed. The next morning about 10:30 I found out from my mom Catherine was Dead."

The last word, "Dead," is capitalized for emphasis.

Prosecutors love to have defendants volunteer an alibi because it shows what they call "consciousness of guilt."

Stacey Richman, a criminal defense lawyer, summed up her advice to any accused who may feel the urge to chat: "You have a right to remain silent. Exercise that right."

When Peter Braunstein, the former Women's Wear Daily writer, was arrested in Memphis in December 2005, he seemed, in one of many Hamlet-like moments, torn about talking. "I really don't think I should talk to you," Mr. Braunstein began, according to his V.D.F. "I think I should do the whole lawyer thing."

And then he kept talking.

"Everybody talks," said Daniel J. Castleman, chief of investigations for the Manhattan district attorney. "Almost nobody doesn't talk. And the reason for that is that people think they can either talk their way out of it or mitigate the crime. It's human nature."

Mr. Braunstein, who is in a mental hospital awaiting trial on charges of kidnapping and sexual abuse, seemed to delight in his celebrity. "Defendant referred to book and movie deals using the name of the complainant several times," the V.D.F. says.

He fantasized about ordering Chinese food. "Defendant stated that after seeing news reports, if he went to a Chinese restaurant, he should order something other than beef with extra mustard because that is what the wanted poster says he orders, but if he did that, it would be too obvious, so he would order beef with extra mustard, but he had not eaten Chinese food for a while."

DOJ_NMG_0112729

Mr. Braunstein did not sign anything, unlike James Barbour, the actor called the "Beast of Broadway," who once played the Beast in "Beauty and the Beast." Mr. Barbour wrote his statement in block letters, correctly spelled, indented and punctuated it, and signed it with a flourish.

Accused of having a sexual relationship with a 15-year-old girl, he wrote, "She told me that she was 16."

Unfortunately for Mr. Barbour, the age of consent in New York is 17.

"That evening we went to a Broadway show, 'George Gershwin Alone,' " wrote Mr. Barbour, who is free on $10,000 bail. "I introduced her to the star of the show, gave her a backstage tour. The relationship stopped suddenly because I thought it was inappropriate and could get dangerous."

Defendants may try to talk their way out of a charge, but do they succeed?

"Never," said Gerald B. Lefcourt, who has defended clients from the Black Panthers to Harry B. Helmsley. "Which is why if it's up to me, every client I have should know they should never, ever, under any circumstances speak to law enforcement unless I'm there."

What Joseph Weir, accused of groping feet on the subway, lacked in spelling skills, he made up for with an almost Gallic appreciation for women. "I complyment woman, I bow down to them, sometime I kiss there feet and grab legs." Mr. Weir, charged with sex abuse, coercion and other less than gallant acts, is due back in court on Jan. 19.

Alexis Quinlin, a swindler posing as a French photographer, actually wrote his statement in French, perhaps casting doubt on those who would contend that the police put words in the mouths of criminals.

"Je m'appelle Alexis Quinlin," wrote Mr. Quinlin, who was convicted of grand larceny and sentenced to up to seven and a half years in prison, but was not lying about being French. He described how he signed a contract under the assumed name of Jean Baptiste Mondino, which was, he admitted, "une grave erreur."

Robert De Niro's housekeeper, Lucyna Turyk-Wawrynowicz, accused of stealing clothes and jewelry from her wealthy employers, made the mistake of giving the police shopping tips. "Anybody can buy a jacket like this at Century 21," Ms. Turyk-Wawrynowicz said after she was taken into custody in June 2005, according to a transcript typed by the police.

An hour later, she was insulting Mr. De Niro's wife, Grace Hightower, saying, "She is mean."

After about three hours, she announced, "The diamonds are in the bathroom."

After requesting a Starbucks skim latte from the detectives questioning her, she threw in the towel.

"I am evil and guilty, but my husband did nothing," she said. "You can cut my hands and head off, but I can tell you he did nothing wrong." She pleaded guilty to grand larceny and last February was sentenced to up to three years in prison.

Others get right to the point.

"I hate Sammy," Kristina Caban said of the man she was accused of branding with an "R," as if he were a bull, according to the police transcript. "He raped me two years ago." Ms. Caban, charged with assault with intent to disfigure permanently, is due back in court on Jan. 11.

Civil libertarians have called for police interrogations to be videotaped. "We've had reports from clients who say they wrote something, but the police officers were dictating it," said Seymour W. James Jr., the lawyer in charge of the criminal practice at the Legal Aid Society. "They're intimidated by the police after hours of questioning."

Sometimes, it takes very little prompting for a defendant to put her foot in her mouth. In her V.D.F., Andrea Schwartz, whom the tabloids have termed "the Brazilian madam," is quoted telling the police as she was arrested: "I'm not a prostitute. I just hook guys up with girls if they want them."

That did not stop prosecutors from indicting her on prostitution charges last June. She is awaiting trial.

CIVIL LAW:

Fat Chance (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The ads for CortiStress said it could reduce your chances of developing Alzheimer's disease. Xenadrine EFX's "thermogenic technology" was supposed to give your metabolism a lift. And TrimSpa said it contained a plant "used by African bushmen for centuries" that could help you lose weight so you could "become all you ever envied."

Those claims are not credible, the Federal Trade Commission concluded, yesterday announcing it will collect about $25 million from the marketers of those popular weight-control pills to settle allegations that they misled consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0112730

None of the products was deemed dangerous to a person's health, and the pills will be allowed to remain on store shelves, FTC officials said. The promoters, however, must change their advertising.

The pharmaceutical company Bayer, which was among the FTC's targets, agreed to pay a $3.2 million civil penalty to settle charges that it violated a previous FTC order that required all health claims for its One-a-Day vitamins be "supported by competent and reliable scientific evidence." In national ads, Bayer claimed its One-a-Day WeightSmart contained epigallocatechin gallate (EGCG), a green-tea extract that can help prevent weight gain in women older than 30 who "can gain 10 pounds a decade, due in part to a slowing metabolism."

Those claims were not "substantiated by competent and reliable scientific evidence," the agency said.

The settlement with Bayer "is a wake-up call to any company that wants to push the envelope," FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said. "Every claim they make they have to have the science to back it up."

Bayer spokeswoman Tricia McKernan said the company never marketed WeightSmart as a weight-loss product and cited three studies supporting the company's claims that EGCG can "enhance metabolism." She said, however, that the company would comply with the agency's orders.

The settlements yesterday were the latest in the FTC's periodic crackdowns on weight-control claims. Since 1990, it has prosecuted more than 100 cases against marketers of flab-busting products, including the promoters of a "tummy-flattening gel" who agreed to pay $3 million last May.

With more than 70 million Americans trying to lose weight and spending $33 billion a year on weight-control products, the market remains lucrative for legitimate operators and hucksters alike. The more than 25,000 dietary supplements on the market are lightly regulated. Their manufacturers are responsible for ensuring that a supplement is safe before it is sold, but they do not need to register their products or get approval. The Food and Drug Administration can take action against unsafe products after the products reach the market. The FTC regulates dietary supplement advertising.

FTC officials said part of the reason consumers fall for phony weight-loss claims is because they see advertisements in major publications like TV Guide, Men's Fitness and People magazine.

"The FTC is asking the media not to run these ads," Majoras said.

Of the settlements the FTC plans to collect, Robert Chinery Jr. and his company, RTC Research and Development, will pay $8 million to $12.8 million for saying Xenadrine EFX was clinically proven to cause rapid and substantial weight loss. Chinery commissioned several studies, but none showed Xenadrine EFX produced substantial weight loss, the FTC said. In fact, one 10-week study showed subjects taking Xenadrine EFX lost fewer pounds than those taking a placebo, the FTC said.

The FTC expects to recover cash and assets worth at least $12 million from Stephen F. Cheng and his company, Window Rock Enterprises, and Gregory Cynaumon and his company, Infinity Advertising, which promoted CortiSlim and CortiStress.

Alexander Goen and several companies associated with him will pay $1.5 million for the marketing of TrimSpa. In addition to TV commercials showing celebrity endorser Anna Nicole Smith romping on a beach, ads for TrimSpa said an ingredient, hoodia gordonii, aided weight loss and described it as a plant used by African bushmen to suppress hunger on long hunting trips. TrimSpa did not admit liability.

Most of the money the FTC is to collect will go toward consumer redress, with the exception of Bayer's penalty, which goes to the U.S. Treasury.

Diet Pill Sellers Fined $25M (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, January 5, 2007

Marketers of four brands of weight-loss pills can keep selling them — but they can't make unproven claims that people will lose weight taking them, the Federal Trade Commission says.

The marketers agreed to pay $25 million in fines and penalties to settle FTC charges that their advertising claimed their popular diet pills would cause consumers to lose weight or reduce the risk of serious diseases such as cancer. The FTC said Thursday the claims were not supported by scientific evidence.

"You're not going to find weight loss in a bottle of pills," said FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras.

Platt Majoras said the pills, still available on store shelves, are not dangerous to consumers' health.

Nancy Metcalf, senior project editor at Consumers Union, said the group has lobbied for years to strengthen federal oversight of weight-loss supplements.

"We have advised people not to take them," she said.

Bayer was fined $3.2 million to settle FTC charges that its advertisements for One-A-Day WeightSmart pills violated an earlier FTC order that required all health claims for One-A-Day brand vitamins to be supported by sound scientific evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0112731

Bayer said that its product was marketed as a multivitamin, not a weight-loss pill, and that it settled to avoid the expense of litigation, the Associated Press reported.

Other pills the FTC cited were:

·TrimSpa. The marketers of this pill — Goen Technologies, Nutramerica, TrimSpa and Alexander Szynalski — will pay $1.5 million to settle FTC charges that their weight-loss claims were unsubstantiated. TrimSpa advertisements featured celebrity Anna Nicole Smith, who claimed to have lost 69 pounds using the pills, the FTC said.

·Xenadrine EFX. RTC Research & Development and Robert Chinery Jr., the marketers of this green-tea extract product, falsely claimed it would cause rapid weight loss, the FTC charged. The marketers will pay $8 million to $13 million to settle the case.

·CortiSlim and CortiStress. Stephen Cheng and his company, Window Rock Enterprises, and Gregory Cynaumon and his firm, Infinity Advertising — the marketers of those products — will surrender $12 million in assets.

The marketers claimed CortiSlim would cause rapid weight loss and that CortiStress would reduce the risk of cancer, heart disease and other ailments, the FTC said.

The companies agreed to limit future ad claims. Their ads ran in magazines and newspapers, on television and on the Internet. Consumers who bought CortiSlim and Xenadrine EFX may be eligible for refunds under the FTC's redress program at www.ftc.gov.

Eli Lilly Settles More Zyprexa Lawsuits (WP/AP)

By Rick Callahan

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

INDIANAPOLIS, Jan. 4 -- Drugmaker Eli Lilly said Thursday that it will settle about 18,000 additional lawsuits alleging it did not adequately warn patients that its anti-psychotic medication Zyprexa carries a heightened risk of diabetes.

Lilly did not disclose the amount of the settlement but said in a statement that it would take a fourth-quarter settlement charge that's not expected to exceed $500 million.

In a June 2005 settlement, the Indianapolis company agreed to pay about $700 million to resolve more than 8,000 similar lawsuits involving Zyprexa, its top-selling drug.

Lilly spokeswoman Tarra Ryker said the new settlement covered more plaintiffs for less money because the 18,000 cases were less viable due to a 2003 Zyprexa labeling change, which addressed the drug's possible diabetes risk.

She said the company plans to go to trial, beginning in April, to defend itself against the 1,200 remaining claims, which she said are not being settled for "various reasons." Lilly declined to elaborate on the specific reasons.

Sales of Zyprexa, which is used to treat schizophrenia and bipolar disorder, accounted for 28 percent of Lilly's $3.86 billion in revenue in the most recent quarter.

Lilly has recently been the subject of New York Times articles that allege the drugmaker played down safety data on Zyprexa. Lilly contends the Times' stories relied on illegally obtained internal documents leaked by a plaintiff lawyer and used selected memos out of context.

Independent pharmaceuticals analyst Hemant Shah of HKS said the new settlement would help Lilly end negative publicity about the drug and allow Zyprexa to recover some of the market share it has lost in the past few years.

"They needed to get this drug off front pages -- get the negative press out of the way -- and one way you do that is settle so you don't have bad news coming out one case at a time," he said.

Most of the lawsuits claimed that before September 2003, the information on Zyprexa labels regarding the risk of hyperglycemia and diabetes was not adequately displayed. Hyperglycemia is a condition in which the blood has elevated sugar levels, typical in diabetics.

Lilly also faces lawsuits filed by the attorneys general of Alaska, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico and West Virginia alleging that it marketed Zyprexa for unapproved uses or hid the risks of weight gain and diabetes, said company spokeswoman Carole Witsken Puls.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

U.S. Justice Department Won't Investigate Portsmouth Jail Death (VAPILOT)

By Jen Mccaffery, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, January 5, 2007

PORTSMOUTH — Federal authorities have declined to investigate the July death of an inmate in Portsmouth City Jail.

DOJ_NMG_0112732

The Federal Bureau of Investigation in Norfolk and the Department of Justice informed city officials in Portsmouth last month that they found insufficient evidence to suggest that federal civil rights laws were violated in connection with Joseph Combs's death.

After six days in the city jail, Combs, 57, died of severe dehydration and acute pneumonia, with bipolar disorder contributing, according to his autopsy.

Portsmouth City Attorney Tim Oksman sent letters to federal authorities in November, requesting a civil rights investigation into his death.

Lamarr Brown , president of the Norfolk-based Organization of African-American Concerns , is speaking for Combs' widow, Granada Combs .

"This is usually the protocol by the FBI in the Hampton Roads area when the death of a black person is concerned," Brown said.

Portsmouth police Capt. Garrett Shelton said he anticipated that police would wrap up their investigation into Combs' death by mid-January.

"There's nothing unusual that has come out of this, from a criminal standpoint," Shelton said.

Police will turn their findings over to Portsmouth Commonwealth's Attorney Earle Mobley and Oksman, as they would in the case of any inmate death, Shelton said.

Reach Jen McCaffery at (757) 446-2627 or jen.mccaffery@pilotonline.com.

Dismissal Of Boys Town Suit Eyed (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

D.C. officials want a federal judge to throw out a civil rights complaint filed by the U.S. Justice Department after a jury deadlocked on whether the city discriminated against a group home for disadvantaged youth on Capitol Hill.

The complaint centered on whether D.C. officials broke federal housing laws and discriminated against the nonprofit Father Flanagan's Girls and Boys Home, also known as Boys Town.

The Nebraska-based group sued the District in 2001, saying city officials kept Boys Town from opening a group home on Potomac Avenue Southeast by stonewalling project applications amid community opposition to the plans.

The Justice Department later joined as a plaintiff in the federal lawsuit.

"There was no direct evidence of handicap or racial discrimination against the Boys Town project," attorneys for the District argued in recent court pleadings. Federal officials declined to say yesterday how they plan to proceed.

"We're obviously disappointed the jury didn't return a verdict for the United States," said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department. "But we continue to think the District of Columbia violated the Fair Housing Act."

John Melingagio, a Boys Town spokesman, said the organization will continue to review the case and that the District's effort to have the case dismissed is "not well-founded."

"We will vigorously resist it," he said. "The bottom line is we're going to continue to advocate for children in the District."

The District sought dismissal of the complaint Dec. 22, and a response from the Justice Department is expected later this month.

A judge granted a mistrial in the case Dec. 8, saying jurors were split on a verdict.

The case began Nov. 27 after years of pretrial motions and depositions by numerous current and former city officials and neighborhood activists.

Among those who testified was Carolyn Graham, a D.C. school board member who previously served as the District's deputy mayor.

In questioning by the government, Miss Graham had testified that she perceived racial undertones to community opposition on Capitol Hill to the Boys Town project.

Attorneys for the District disagreed, noting that the makeup of a group opposing the project, Southeast Citizens for Smart Development, was racially diverse.

D.C. officials also argued that Boys Town ultimately realized a financial gain from the failed project. According to the District, the group sold the property to a developer for a profit of about $8 million after Boys Town decided not to pursue the project.

DOJ_NMG_0112733

ANTITRUST:

Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Nets $105 Million (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, January 5, 2007

The final two defendants in a class action antitrust suit against the top manufacturers of automotive refinishing paint have agreed to pay $39 million to settle claims that they participated in a price-fixing conspiracy, bringing the total recovery in the case to more than $105 million.

In a six-page opinion in In re Automotive Refinishing Paint Antitrust Litigation handed down on Dec. 28, Eastern District of Pennsylvania Judge R. Barclay Surrick granted preliminary approval of the two settlements -- $16 million from Sherwin-Williams Co. and $23 million from PPG Industries -- clearing the way for notices to be sent to the class.

In prior settlements, E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. paid $36 million; Akzo Nobel Car Refinishes, a subsidiary of Dutch chemical giant Akzo Nobel NV, paid $18.7 million; and two related German companies, BASF and BASF Coatings, paid $12 million total.

The plaintiffs in the suit are a class of direct purchasers -- mostly auto repair shops -- that claim in the suit that the paint manufacturers conducted secret meetings in Europe in which they agreed to "fix, raise, maintain and stabilize" the prices of refinishing paints.

The suit alleges that during the 1990s, the price increases for auto refinishing paints continued to rise despite a drop in the prices of crude oil and natural gas -- the principal raw materials used to manufacture refinishing paints.

Dozens of suits were filed in 2001 in the wake of news accounts of the Justice Department's probe focused on Akzo Nobel, which had pleaded guilty in 1997 and was fined $10 million for participating in a separate international conspiracy to fix the price of sodium gluconate, an industrial cleaner.

Two Akzo executives also pleaded guilty, confessing that they had agreed with other manufacturers to "suppress and eliminate competition in the sodium gluconate market from August 1993 to June 1995," according to Justice Department records.

Prosecutors said the two executives and their co-conspirators had set out to fix prices and allocate market share.

When news broke of the Justice Department's probe into possible price-fixing in the market for paint products used in the automotive refinishing industry, Chemical & Engineering News reported that Akzo's annual report stated that it had incurred $26 million in legal and settlement costs in the previous year, and that the company "has set aside $145 million to pay, over the next few years, 'probable costs, fines and civil damages' resulting from its behavior."

Surrick was assigned to hear the case under the federal courts' multi-district litigation program.

Surrick later appointed lawyers from three Philadelphia firms to act as co-lead counsel -- the Law Offices of Bernard R. Gross, Kohn Swift & Graf, and Barrack Rodos & Bacine. He also appointed a plaintiffs' executive committee -- H. Laddie Montague and Merrill G. Davidoff of Berger & Montague; Roberta D. Liebenberg and Donald Perelman of Fine Kaplan & Black; Michael M. Buchman of Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach; and Robert N. Kaplan and Richard J. Kilsheimer of Kaplan Fox & Kilsheimer.

In October 2004, Surrick awarded more than $21.5 million in "interim fees" to the plaintiffs' team from the fund created by the first round of settlements.

In his fee award, Surrick said that allocations of fees to specific firms should be determined by the co-lead counsel "who are most familiar with the work done by each firm and each firm's overall contribution to the litigation."

Rejecting an objection to such an approach, Surrick found that the co-lead counsel "have directed this case from its inception and are best able to assess the weight and merit of each counsel's contribution," and that "leaving the allocation to counsel makes sense from the standpoint of judicial economy."

Visa, MasterCard Settle With Government (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The federal government is set to collect at least $7 million as part of an 11-year-old court battle that pitted retailers against Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard Inc. in a dispute over debit-card fees.

Although plaintiffs in the class-action lawsuit settled the case in 2003, the U.S. submitted a claim only last February. That claim then became the subject of a separate dispute when lawyers representing the plaintiffs contended that the government shouldn't get a piece of the $3 billion settlement fund that had been set up for retailers.

By filing a claim, the government essentially contended that it, like the nation's retailers, had been hurt by Visa and MasterCard rules that required merchants to accept their branded debit cards if they also accepted their credit cards.

DOJ_NMG_0112734

Government facilities-ranging from military PXs to the souvenir shop at the Smithsonian Institution accept plastic. The government's claim had been submitted by the antitrust division of the Justice Department.

Under the settlement, which was announced late Wednesday, Visa and MasterCard will pay a total of $3.5 million to the government. The settlement fund will contribute $3.7 million. The government may receive additional funds later if there is money left in the settlement fund.

Visa and MasterCard said they were pleased that a settlement had been reached.

Brussels Raises Heat On Energy Companies (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

Europe's biggest energy companies face an intensified crackdown by the European Union competition commissioner following an inquiry into the sector that found evidence of collusion and other severe market failings.

In a summary of a 16-month investigation, Neelie Kroes warns she will make "full and combined use" of her powers over mergers, government subsidies and antitrust abuses to tackle the lack of competition in the sector.

Her report, a copy of which has been obtained by the Financial Times, states: "Market concentration has been identified as a major concern for the success of the liberalisation process. The market power of pre-liberalisation monopolies has not yet been eroded."

The final results of Ms Kroes' sector inquiry are expected to be announced next week, along with a broader review of the EU's energy policy that will also look at cutting greenhouse gas emissions and bolstering the security of Europe's energy supplies.

Her assessment will make uncomfortable reading for many of Europe's biggest energy companies, including Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF in France and Eni in Italy. These groups are already the target of Commission antitrust investigations, and have seen their offices raided by Brussels officials at least once during the past seven months.

The report makes clear that they – and other dominant energy groups – are likely to face further pressure from the Brussels regulator in the near future, for example to cede control over gas pipelines and the power grid or to terminate some of their long-term contracts with customers and energy suppliers.

One of the report's most striking findings is the accusation of collusion – or cartel-like activity – among Europe's large energy groups.

"Market partitioning re-mains one of the most serious obstacles to market integration. The fight against collusion between incumbents remains a top priority of antitrust enforcement action," the report says.

The report also warns Europe's energy groups that the Commission will impose tough conditions on any future mergers in the sector "to ensure that the competitive structure...does not further deteriorate". It points out that approval to future deals would likely hinge on commitments to release gas and electricity onto the open market, but warns that Brussels may impose "structural" remedies such as asset disposals.

Ms Kroes ordered the in-depth investigation into the electricity and gas sector shortly after she took over the Brussels competition watchdog in 2004.

She argued at the time that years of liberalisation efforts had clearly failed to deliver tangible benefits to European consumers and businesses.

Though, formally speaking, Ms Kroes is responsible only for analysing the market and proposing solutions based on her powers as competition chief, her report also foreshadows much that will be left to the broader review.

Her report calls for the break-up of integrated energy companies as "the most effective way forward".

S Korea Watchdog Probes Qualcomm (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

South Korean antitrust regulators say they have launched a full-scale investigation into the business practices of Qualcomm, the US wireless chipmaker.

Qualcomm has been the subject of complaints from other chipmakers and handset makers in Europe, Japan and Korea, but the move by the Korean Fair TradeCommission represented the first time that formal action had been taken by the authorities.

An FTC official said a task force had been formed since early in December to step up an investigation into allegations that Qualcomm had used its dominant market position to charge excessive royalties.

DOJ_NMG_0112735

It had received complaints between April and June last year from Broadcom and Texas Instruments, rival chipmakers in the US, and Korea's Nextreaming and Thin Multimedia.

They had alleged monopolistic practices by Qualcomm in bundling multimedia products into its chipsets and not opening up its programming interface to allow others to build complementary software applications.

The official said the FTC could co-operate with its counterparts in Europe and Japan, where Broadcom and TI had also filed complaints.

He added that Qualcomm could face fines or have to cut its royalty rates in Korea if it is found to have abused its market dominance.

A Qualcomm spokeswoman at its San Diego headquarters said the company had not been formally notified of any investigation by the FTC and so could not comment.

Qualcomm owns patents and earns royalties on many wireless technologies. It is best known for developing Code Division Multiple Access (CDMA), a standard that has rivalled GSM in mobile phone networks around the world and formed the basis of next-generation networks.

CDMA is the standard in South Korea and manufacturers such as Samsung and LG make CDMA phones. Antitrust regulators raided Qualcomm's offices in Seoul last April, as well as premises of Samsung and LG, as they sought information on the US company's business practices.

The Korean FTC hasbeen active against US companies with the competition watchdog saying it wants to ensure Korean technology companies have a chanceto grow.

It visited the Seoul offices of Intel last February and fined Microsoft in 2005 for abusing its dominant position in the Korean market.

Qualcomm is also involved in a number of lawsuits at home, principally involving patent disputes with its rival Broadcom.

South Korea Regulator Probes Qualcomm (AP)

By Kelly Olsen, The Associated Press

AP, January 5, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea's antitrust regulator said Thursday it has launched a full-scale investigation into alleged unfair market practices by U.S. wireless technology company Qualcomm Inc.

The Fair Trade Commission early last month formed a task force to push forward a probe into allegations that the company used its dominant position in wireless technology to seek excessive royalties, said Shin Yeong-ho, an FTC official.

San Diego, Calif.-based Qualcomm developed and controls most of the key patents for CDMA, or code division multiple access, a rival standard to the dominant cellular standard GSM, or global system for mobile communications.

CDMA is used in the United States and South Korea. Every cell phone in South Korea has a CDMA chip and handset manufacturers have to pay royalty fees to Qualcomm.

The San Diego-based chipmaker earns money by collecting royalties or licensing the CDMA technology to other chipmakers and phone manufacturers.

Between April and June last year, the FTC received complaints about Qualcomm from Broadcom Corp. and Texas Instruments Inc., both of the U.S., and two South Korean companies, claiming Qualcomm abused its market dominance.

Shin said that if Qualcomm is found to have abused its position to block fair competition it can be ordered to take corrective measures, face fines or both.

A Qualcomm spokeswoman, Emily Kilpatrick, said the company would not comment because it had not been notified by Korean authorities.

In April, when Korean authorities began investigating Qualcomm, the company said its business practices were "lawful and pro-competitive."

Qualcomm is embroiled in legal and trade disputes with a number of rivals that contend it extracts excessive royalty payments, a charge the company vigorously denies. Korea has long been one of Qualcomm's strongest markets, accounting for 32 percent of $7.53 billion in revenue for its fiscal year that ended Sept. 24.

Issues Of Power, Prestige Doom Law Firm Merger (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

New York law firm Dewey Ballantine LLP is best known for its deals practice. But this time, it wasn't able to pull off a deal of its own.

DOJ_NMG_0112736

Merger plans between Dewey and another major firm, Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, founded in San Francisco, fell apart yesterday amid concerns over money, power and prestige. At least 11 Dewey partners had left in recent months, some taking business with them.

The merger had been heralded as one of the biggest in years and notable given Dewey's stature and lucrative Wall Street practice.

"No one issue led to our decision, but in the end we will not be doing the merger," said Ralph Baxter Jr., Orrick chairman, who had aggressively pursued the deal.

In recent years, many law firms have merged to add practice depth quickly and to enter new national and international markets. Firms are particularly keen on adding lawyers in New York, the world's most lucrative legal market, thanks to a steady supply of corporate-deal work. If the tie-up had gone forward, other New York firms might have felt pressure to join the merger frenzy that has long gripped firms based in others parts of the country.

The failure of this merger may make it harder for firms outside New York to find partners there. "New York firms tend to think that mergers will only dilute their brands," says Peter Zeughauser, a law firm consultant who wasn't involved in this deal. "The Dewey/Orrick situation will provide them with more evidence that they have a right to be skeptical."

The failed talks come at a cost for both sides, but particularly for Dewey. With about 530 lawyers and nearly 100 years of history, Dewey boasts ties to banks with major presences on Wall Street, including Credit Suisse Group and UBS AG. Recent clients include Walt Disney Co. in its $7.4 billion acquisition of Pixar Animation Studios, as well as HCA Inc., which was acquired by private-equity firms for $21 billion in one of the largest-ever leveraged buyouts.

But Dewey's star had fallen of late, making it receptive to a merger overture from Orrick. While about twice Dewey's size, at about 1,000 lawyers, and with greater global reach, Orrick is seen by some at Dewey as having a less prestigious practice, a key factor in the legal business.

That a merger Dewey felt compelled to make has failed raises questions about how robust it can remain as an independent entity, said Chuck Fanning, head of partner placement at Major, Lindsey & Africa LLC, a national recruiting firm. "Partners may wonder, why should I join now?" he says. Retention may also prove to be an issue.

Morton Pierce, Dewey's chairman and a deal maker himself as head of the firm's mergers-and-acquisitions group, said, "uncertainty is never good for people. They like to know where they stand. We now no longer have uncertainty. We know we are going forward as a stand-alone institution." He added that Dewey just completed its best year ever, increasing its average profit per partner to $1.4 million from $1.2 million, and that it remains strong despite the defection of partners since the merger was in discussion.

The first big setback came when news of the merger talks leaked in September. As the firms' leadership wrangled over questions of management authority and partners' contributions of capital, lawyers bolted from Dewey, taking business that made the deal attractive to Orrick in the first place -- ultimately sapping Orrick's enthusiasm for a tie-up. At least 11 partners left Dewey, including two of its top mergers-and-acquisitions lawyers and leaders of its bankruptcy and energy practices.

In October the executive committees of Dewey and Orrick announced that they had approved the main terms of the merger that would have created one of the largest firms in the country. They announced a new name -- Dewey Orrick LLP -- and a logo that incorporated a green letter "O" that had been used by Orrick. Messrs. Baxter and Pierce traveled to Europe to visit the firms' respective offices and hold Q&A sessions for lawyers.

But the deal proved to face obstacles, both in management conflicts and cultural differences. Questions over power and money became stumbling blocks. Dewey and Orrick had agreed at the outset that Mr. Baxter would serve as the presiding partner of the combined firm. Later, the two sides differed over whether Mr. Baxter would have sole authority over such key matters as the hiring and firing of office and practice-group leaders.

At one point, Mr. Baxter proposed an 11-person management committee, comprised of six Orrick lawyers and five Dewey lawyers, a term that the Dewey side objected to initially, according to two people familiar with the deal. Mr. Baxter believed that Orrick was financially stronger than Dewey and thus should be entitled to greater management authority, according to a person familiar with the talks.

The firms also had difficulty squaring their respective balance sheets and figuring out how the partners at each firm would contribute an equal amount of capital. One key sticking point was Dewey's generous unfunded retirement plan, which amounts to about a $90 million obligation, according to two people familiar with the plan.

As Dewey partners headed for the exits in recent weeks, Orrick requested that the remaining Dewey lawyers shoulder more of the burden for the plan -- a source of irritation to Dewey lawyers, according to two people familiar with the deal.

While declining to discuss the specific reasons the merger failed, Mr. Pierce said part of the difficulty was that Dewey never had engaged in merger talks before. Some of his partners, he said, wrestled with the basic question: "Is merger the right way to go?" The veteran deals lawyer said it is easier to merge manufacturing companies, where it is only senior executives negotiating with other senior executives. "At service providers, like law firms, every partner is an owner, so it is much more complicated to get buy-in on a transaction."

DOJ_NMG_0112737

As for Orrick, the failed talks represent a blow to Mr. Baxter, who courted Dewey on and off for six years with an eye toward landing the firm's deals practice and a stronger foothold in New York. Failed talks are not new for Orrick. Conversations between Orrick and the New York firm formerly known as Donovan Leisure Newton & Irvine broke down in the late 1990s, though dozens of Donovan Leisure lawyers ultimately joined Orrick.

More recently, talks broke off between Orrick and Cooley Godward LLP of Palo Alto, Calif., which later merged with a New York firm, and with a Washington, D.C., firm formerly known as Swidler Berlin Shereff Friedman LLP that has since merged with another firm.

Orrick has lost few if any partners in response to the merger news. But given Orrick's merger-talk track record, firms now may be leery of dancing with the firm, said Mr. Zeughauser. For Mr. Baxter, he said, "It would have been a huge feather in his cap."

2 Law Firms Call Off Plans For A Merger (NYT)

By Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

One of the biggest proposed law firm mergers of the last year has been called off, the victim of too many insurmountable issues.

The two firms, Dewey Ballantine and Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, announced the news yesterday. The two had been in talks since last fall to join their specialties in mergers and acquisitions and debt financing. The new firm would have been one of the nation's largest legal advisers, with 1,500 lawyers based in New York and San Francisco.

Unlike most merger talks, which are conducted in secrecy, the firms announced in October that their top committees had given preliminary approval to the proposal. At every step in the process after that, the firms expressed confidence that the deal would go through.

The two had already decided upon the name Dewey Orrick for the combined firm. Dewey's chairman, Morton A. Pierce, and Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., would have served as co-chairmen, with Mr. Baxter taking on the additional title of presiding partner.

Partners were to have voted on the deal last month. But as several obstacles proved intractable, those elections were postponed to this month.

"While both firms tried their best to work through these challenges, we were unable to bring the merger to completion," the two firms said in a statement. "No one issue led us to this point."

Among the most visible distress signals was the departure of 10 partners from Dewey since merger talks began. Most ominous were the exits of three lawyers from Dewey's mergers and acquisitions team, including Michael J. Aiello and Jack S. Bodner, who had been considered protégés of Mr. Pierce.

People familiar with the negotiations said the talks had continued as recently as last weekend.

The chairmen of both firms said in interviews that the decision to part ways was mutual.

"We reached a point where we decided it was in the best interest of both organizations to go our separate ways," Mr. Pierce said.

Both chairmen said that they would look for future growth opportunities, but that neither was looking for another merger partner right now.

"When you look at how law firms grow, while mergers have great advantages, it's the statistically least likely way to do it," Mr. Baxter said.

Unlike mergers in other sectors, law firm consolidation involves the joining of companies whose main assets are their people. Orrick is acquainted with such situations, having undertaken merger talks with several firms in recent years, including Coudert Brothers in 2005 and Donovan, Leisure, Newton & Irvine in the late 1990s. None of those talks came to fruition, though Orrick subsequently hired lawyers from those firms.

The dilution of brand names, unclear lines of authority and unfunded pensions are among some of the issues that may have played a role in the talks' demise, said Peter Zeughauser, a law firm consultant who did not work on the deal.

Unfunded pensions have long been a concern in the merger of law firms because partners inevitably bristle at taking a pay cut to help new colleagues' retirement plans. Several consultants and lawyers at other firms previously questioned whether Dewey's unfunded pension system would pose problems for the deal.

"It's not at all uncommon for an unfunded retirement plan to be a deal breaker," Mr. Zeughauser said.

DOJ_NMG_0112738

A person familiar with the negotiations also pointed to questions over management authority. Though the deal had been labeled a merger of equals, it was clear that Orrick would retain control over crucial matters, the person said.

Both Dewey and Orrick have long histories. Dewey is a storied New York adviser whose name comes from Gov. Thomas E. Dewey. Orrick is one of San Francisco's oldest law firms, founded in 1863.

Both have prominent corporate deal-making and litigation practices. Dewey, a 550-lawyer firm, is known as a specialist in mergers and acquisitions, having advised on major deals like the hospital operator HCA's $33 billion leveraged buyout. And Orrick, with more than 950 lawyers, is considered a leader in debt financing and capital market transactions and restructurings.

Last year proved profitable for the two firms, with both claiming profits of about $1.4 million per equity partner. Dewey earned $408 million in gross revenue and Orrick pulled in $666 million for the 2006 fiscal year, both showing improvement over 2005.

LSE Holder Raises Its Stake (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

LONDON -- The second-largest shareholder in London Stock Exchange PLC added to its stake in the company, indicating that some investors still expect Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. to raise its offer for the London market operator, even as LSE's shares have fallen closer to Nasdaq's current offering price.

Heyman Investment Associates, an investment vehicle of U.S. businessman Samuel Heyman, said it had increased its stake in LSE, Europe's largest exchange by the value of stocks traded, to 9.65% from 9.60%.

LSE's share price has drifted down 1.8% during the past three days to close at £12.87 ($25.10) yesterday; it is now just 3.5% higher than Nasdaq's offer of £12.43 a share. Analysts believe that if LSE's share price falls below £12.43, enough hedge funds will sell their shares to Nasdaq to give it the 50% it says it needs to take over the London exchange.

The decline in LSE's share price comes amid light holiday trading volumes, which can exaggerate price movements, and amid broader selling recently in exchange companies around the world.

Nasdaq has been pursuing LSE for months and has amassed nearly 29% of the company. Some investors now fear that if Nasdaq doesn't win control of LSE, it will sell its stake, pushing LSE shares much lower. That possibility has spooked some investors into selling LSE shares in recent trading sessions. A spokesman for LSE declined to comment.

Nasdaq has acknowledged to LSE investors that selling its stake is one of several options it could pursue, some of these shareholders say. Other options would include waiting a year and bidding again for LSE when British takeover rules would allow it to do so, or setting up a rival exchange to the LSE in London. Some of LSE's largest shareholders also are convinced that Nasdaq has the financial firepower to come back with a higher price on its current offer, which LSE has so far rebuffed.

LSE also is expected to issue a second defense document to back up its view that Nasdaq's offer considerably undervalues its business. This document may include details of partnerships that LSE has talked about with other exchanges. Joint ventures with exchanges in emerging markets may be particularly attractive given LSE's success in attracting listings from developing markets. LSE, for instance, has in the past talked to the Bombay Stock Exchange about partnerships.

ENVIRONMENT:

Parks Agency Leaves Controversial Book On Shelf (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

When complaints emerged in 2004 over the sale of a creationist account of the formation of the Grand Canyon in National Park Service bookstores, Interior Department officials said they would review whether the book should be pulled from the shelves.

But there was no formal review, in part because of differences of opinion among the Park Service's own specialists, said David Barna, a spokesman for the agency, in an interview yesterday.

When officials got together to discuss the book, the geologists and natural resource specialists would say, "Get this book out of here," Mr. Barna said. "But the education and interpretation people would say: 'Wait a minute. If your science is so sound, the fact that there are differences of opinion should not scare you away.' "

In the end, no formal action was taken, and the book remains on sale because, Mr. Barna said in a written statement, "It is not our role to tell people what to believe."

DOJ_NMG_0112739

The Park Service issued the statement after an organization of state and federal natural resource managers, Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, or PEER, said it had filed a Freedom of Information Act request concerning the agency's handling of the book, "Grand Canyon: A Different View."

The group received a letter saying a review of records "did not locate any documents responsive to your request," which Mr. Barna confirmed, saying "there's no real record."

Jeff Ruch, executive director of PEER, said the Park Service was advancing a particular religious view by keeping the book on sale, and was also deceiving people about it, by repeatedly saying that it would be reviewed.

"If the question is religious values, they ought at least to be honest about it," Mr. Ruch said.

The book was assembled by Tom Vail, who operates Canyon Ministries, which offers canyon river tours with a creationist bent.

The book maintains that the heavens and the earth were created in six days about 6,000 years ago and that the canyon was formed in a divine flood sent to wipe out "the wickedness of man."

Scientists say that earth is billions of years old and that the canyon has been carved over millions of years by the action of the Colorado River.

In his statement, Mr. Barna notes that Park Service management policies require reliance on "the best scientific evidence available" and, as a result, rangers tell visitors that "the Colorado River basin has developed in the past 40 million years."

But the guidelines also say that material available from concessionaires in national parks should adhere to the standards used to evaluate Park Service materials.

When the book appeared on Park Service store shelves, there were objections from a host of scientists, including the agency's own geologists, who said it "repudiates science."

In the interview, Mr. Barna said a new interpretive center would open at the canyon this summer, offering a more detailed explanation of the canyon's development, told in scientific, not religious, terms. He said this investment in science shows where the agency stands.

But in an interview yesterday, Mr. Ruch said selling the book was one of a number of efforts to promote the views of fundamentalist Christians in the park, "not Buddhists or Muslims or anyone else."

"This is government establishment of religion in a fairly fundamental way, if you pardon the pun," Mr. Ruch said.

A Revitalized Chesapeake May Be Decades Away (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The multibillion-dollar cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay, which government officials had pledged would succeed by 2010, will likely miss that deadline by a wide margin -- and, at the current pace, might drag on for decades more, an Environmental Protection Agency official acknowledged yesterday.

Rich Batiuk, an associate director of the EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program, made that projection at a meeting of the Chesapeake Bay Commission, an advisory group that includes state officials from Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania.

His talk was a blunt, and public, admission of something that the EPA had conceded in an agency report last year. A pledge to "save the bay," made six years ago in the so-called Chesapeake 2000 Agreement, is falling drastically short. "If we go at the current rate that we're doing, we're talking about restoring the Chesapeake decades from now, a generation or two," Batiuk said.

The news means a continued struggle for one of this area's most cherished bodies of water, one that Washingtonians turn to for seafood, sailing, recreational fishing and weekend scenery. It is also bad news for such Chesapeake tributaries as the Potomac River, where the pollution and runoff bring mud, algae blooms and dangerous chemicals on the way to the bay.

Batiuk's assessment was not news to many environmentalists, who have said for years that roads and suburbs in the watershed were growing too fast and that cleanup efforts at farms and sewage plants were moving too slowly for the deadline to be met.

Some of them said yesterday that they were heartened that the EPA was admitting the shortfall but wished the acknowledgment had come sooner.

"Duh," said Roy Hoagland, a vice president of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, after hearing Batiuk's talk in Annapolis. "We've been arguing for at least four years that in order to reach those goals, they need to accelerate implementation [of cleanup efforts]. . . . That is not new information."

Bay cleanup has a history of broken deadlines. In 1987, local and federal officials pledged to clean up the estuary by 2000. The current agreement, written after the first one failed, was signed by the governors of Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania, the mayor of Washington and the administrator of the EPA.

DOJ_NMG_0112740

The officials pledged to make enormous improvements in everything from low-oxygen "dead zones" to underwater grasses to oyster populations.

In the 6 1/2 years since, Batiuk said, there have been notable successes: The northern bay has seen a huge regrowth of the grasses, which provide oxygen and shelter for aquatic life. Changes at sewage plants around the watershed have reduced their output of nitrogen and phosphorus, two pollutants linked to dead zones downstream.

But the overall picture, Batiuk said, shows a cleanup effort that is far off the pace set out in 2000. Crab populations are still below historic levels. The amount of oxygen, which fish and crabs need to live, is just 29 percent of the goal set for 2010, he said. The bay's native oysters are at just 7 percent.

Even underwater grasses, which are doing slightly better than other indicators, stand at just 42 percent of the level they're supposed to reach by 2010.

"If you draw that line out there," Batiuk said, pointing to the slow upward trend in their population, "you're at about 2040 for the grasses to come back."

One major reason for the shortfall, Batiuk said, was rapid population growth in the bay's watershed, which stretches 64,000 square miles from southern Virginia to Cooperstown, N.Y. An additional 800,000 people moved in between 2000 and 2005, bringing more neighborhoods, more cars, more lawns -- all sources of bay pollutants -- and canceling out improvements, he said.

But environmentalists have also blamed local governments, and the bay program itself, for not being more aggressive.

They have said the past six years have been consumed by research efforts and voluntary pollution-reduction programs, when new laws or stringent enforcement might have accomplished more.

One advocate of a more confrontational approach was sworn in as Maryland's attorney general Tuesday: Douglas F. Gansler (D), who has pledged an "all-out assault" on bay polluters. The Chesapeake Bay Foundation has also pushed the Maryland legislature to do more in the new session, calling for a "green fund" of up to $50 million a year for pollution-reduction projects.

Batiuk's talk yesterday reflects a serious shift in rhetoric for the EPA's bay program. For years, program officials had maintained that the 2010 goal was still within reach.

But last year, bay program Associate Director Mike Burke said, officials were asked to submit goals for an EPA-wide strategic plan. Employees would be evaluated on their progress toward the goals, Burke said.

If the 2010 deadline is not met, officials said, state governments could be made to compile a "pollution budget" for the bay, listing what is coming downstream now, where it comes from and by how much it needs to be reduced.

In the meantime, a new Chesapeake agreement, with another deadline, could also be worked out.

But the past two decades have soured some people on agreements. Bernie Fowler, a former Maryland state senator who has been an outspoken voice for the Patuxent River and the bay, said he was tired of people making promises that the bay would be fixed soon.

"A lot of those very people have left the planet and haven't seen it done," said Fowler, who is 82. "I don't want that to happen to me."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Rehnquist Drug Dependency Detailed (AP)

By PETE YOST,

AP, January 5, 2007

A physician at the U.S. Capitol prescribed a powerful sleep aid for William Rehnquist for nearly a decade while he was an associate justice of the Supreme Court, according to newly released FBI records.

The records present a picture of a justice with chronic back pain who for many months took three times the recommended dosage of the drug Placidyl and then went into withdrawal in 1981 when he abruptly stopped taking it.

Rehnquist checked himself into George Washington University Hospital, where he tried to escape in his pajamas and imagined that the CIA was plotting against him, the records indicate.

Although Rehnquist's drug dependency was publicly known around the time he was hospitalized in 1981, the release of the FBI records provides new details.

The justice was weaned off Placidyl in early 1982 in a detoxification process that took a month, according to the records. The hospital doctor who treated Rehnquist said the Capitol Hill physician who prescribed Placidyl for Rehnquist was practicing bad medicine, bordering on malpractice. Both doctors' names were deleted from the documents before they were released.

DOJ_NMG_0112741

The FBI documents were prepared in 1986 when Rehnquist - who began serving on the court on Jan. 7, 1972 - was nominated for chief justice, years after his problems with the drug had ended. They were released by the agency in response to requests under the Freedom of Information Act. The agency said one of the seven folders of Rehnquist documents could not be found.

A psychiatrist told the FBI that Rehnquist's family in 1981 noted "long-standing slurred speech which seems to coincide with administration of Placidyl," one FBI interview report stated. The psychiatrist also indicated that Rehnquist's chronic back pain led to his heavy use of such substances as Darvon and Tylenol 3, which the psychiatrist said also played a part in Rehnquist's condition.

An attending physician at the U.S. Capitol detailed Rehnquist's problems with Placidyl for the FBI, saying that prior to his seeing the justice in 1972, Rehnquist was prescribed the drug by another doctor for relief from insomnia. The attending physician told the FBI he continued to prescribe Placidyl for the entire 10-year period that he treated Rehnquist.

The physician said that Rehnquist had been prescribed 500 milligrams of Placidyl per evening, but that Rehnquist was actually taking 1,500 milligrams each night. The doctor said this increased consumption may have coincided with Mrs. Rehnquist's illness and treatment for cancer.

Rehnquist had told the physician that he was taking one pill before going to bed and he would take other pills if he awakened during the night.

The physician indicated that he decided to discontinue the drug's use and to try another medication. Rehnquist said the new medication was not strong enough, an FBI interview report stated. The physician said he then prescribed a substitute and then another, at which point Rehnquist went into the hospital.

The hospital doctor who successfully weaned Rehnquist from the drug told the FBI that the toxicity of Placidyl causes blurred vision, slurred speech and difficulty in making physical movements. Once a patient stops taking the drug, the withdrawal symptoms of delirium begin, which is what happened to Rehnquist at the hospital.

The doctor who helped Rehnquist get off the drug said the justice's wife was highly upset and felt that the prescribing physician and the pharmacist who filled the prescription were probably intimidated by such high-ranking officials as Supreme Court justices and senators and probably would have agreed to almost any request.

Copyright 2007 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

More Politics News
Bush Puts Finishing Touches on Iraq Plan
1 hr ago
2008 Chatter Fills the Halls of Congress
1 hr 6 mins ago
Lawmakers to Debate 'Pay as You Go' Rule
41 mins ago
Bush to Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy
41 mins ago
Nancy Pelosi Basks in Historic Day
41 mins ago
Ex-Dem. Party Boss Blasts Kerry in Book
29 mins ago
Idaho Gov to Pay for Jet Ride to Arizona
Patrick Sworn in As Mass. Governor
10 hrs ago
Local
Nancy Pelosi Basks in Historic Day
Nuclear Agency Head Dismissed for Lapses
Lawmakers to Debate 'Pay as You Go' Rule
Bush Puts Finishing Touches on Iraq Plan
Bush to Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy
2008 Chatter Fills the Halls of Congress
Statement May Allow Gov't to Open Mail
Bush Makes Light of Earlier Gaffe

Bush Looking at Global Warming Ideas
Today's Most Popular
1. Congressman uses Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson in ceremony
2. School Shooting Suspect Held on $1M Bail
3. Statement May Allow Gov't to Open Mail
4. Yanks, D-Backs Agree on Big Unit Trade
5. Somalis, Ethiopia Battle Islamic Militia
6. Bush to Give Iraq War Plan Next Week
7. Reports: Bush to Replace Top Generals
8. 1870s Dead Horse Photo Sparks Mystery
9. Calf With Two Faces Born at Va. Farm
10. Bush Talks About Iraq, Saddam Execution local sponsors
This browser does not support inline frames.
Add News to Your Website | RSS | News by Topic | Contact Us | Join Examiner | Copyright | Terms of Use | Privacy Policy
Advertise with Examiner: In Print | Online
National Atlanta Baltimore Boston Chicago Cleveland Dallas Denver Detroit Houston Indianapolis Los Angeles Miami
Minneapolis - St. Paul New York Philadelphia Phoenix Pittsburgh Portland San Diego San Francisco San Jose Seattle St. Louis Washington DC

Sedative Withdrawal Made Rehnquist Delusional In '81 (WP)

By Alan Cooperman
The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist took a powerful sedative during his first decade on the Supreme Court and grew so dependent on it that he became delusional and tried to escape from a hospital in his pajamas when he stopped taking the drug in 1981, according to newly released FBI files.

The files also show that during both of Rehnquist's confirmation battles -- when he was first named to the court by President Richard Nixon in 1971 and when President Ronald Reagan nominated him as chief justice in 1986 -- the Justice Department enlisted the FBI to find out what witnesses lined up by Senate Democrats were prepared to say.

The FBI this week released 1,561 pages from its files on Rehnquist in response to Freedom of Information Act requests filed after his death in September 2005. Privacy laws forbid disclosure of such files during the person's lifetime.

The fact that Rehnquist checked into George Washington University Hospital for a week in late December 1981 to be treated for back pain and dependence on a prescription drug was previously known. Journalists had noted that fall that Rehnquist's speech was sometimes slurred on the bench, and The Washington Post reported on the hospitalization.

But the files reveal dramatic new details about the length and intensity of the addiction. During its routine 1986 investigation of Rehnquist's background, the FBI concluded that Rehnquist began taking the drug Placidyl for insomnia after back surgery in 1971, the year before he joined the court. By 1981, he apparently was taking 1,500 milligrams each night, three times the usual starting dose.

Placidyl, known generically as ethchlorvynol, is a sleep-inducing drug that is not usually prescribed for more than a week at a time. It is not an opiate and is not a painkiller, but it is addictive, and withdrawal can cause hallucinations and temporary memory loss.

Doctors interviewed by the FBI told agents that when the associate justice stopped taking the drug, he suffered paranoid delusions. One doctor said Rehnquist thought he heard voices outside his hospital room plotting against him and had "bizarre ideas and outrageous thoughts," including imagining "a CIA plot against him" and "seeming to see the design patterns on the hospital curtains change configuration."

At one point, a doctor told the investigators, Rehnquist went "to the lobby in his pajamas in order to try to escape." Ultimately, the doctors concluded that the withdrawal symptoms were so severe that they began giving Rehnquist the drug again and slowly lowered the dosage until he quit taking it entirely Feb. 7, 1982.

By 1986, the files show, all the doctors interviewed by the FBI said the former drug dependence should not affect Rehnquist's future work on the court, and it did not become an issue in his confirmation as chief justice.

Alexander Charns, a lawyer in Durham, N.C., who was among the scholars and journalists who received the documents this week, said that in his view, they contain evidence of "the ongoing use of the FBI for political purposes, not only in the sixties and seventies but well into the 1980s."

Because the FBI withheld some documents on national security grounds and because many of the pages it released are heavily edited, "no one can be entirely certain what happened and why" when the FBI conducted its background investigations, Charns said.

But in the files that have come to light, he said, there is a clear partisan tilt. "You don't have Democrats calling up the FBI saying, 'We need to know what the Republican witnesses are going to say about Rehnquist' the way you have Republicans calling up saying, 'We need to know what the Democratic witnesses are going to say,' " Charns said.

FBI spokesman Paul Bresson declined to comment on any documents released by the bureau. "We don't expand beyond what has been released, because that's all the information that's been released pursuant to the law," he said.

However, Bresson denied that the FBI's background investigations for judicial nominees are partisan in any way.

"We are not political; we are apolitical. We're just trying to find the facts," he said. "It's a very rigorous process that involves investigating both people who are going to say very favorable things and people who may not. We don't make suitability judgments. . . . We report the facts to the agency that has requested the background check, in this case the White House."

The files indicate that in 1971, the Nixon administration was deeply concerned about hostile witnesses to Rehnquist's confirmation after the Senate's rejection of two previous Supreme Court nominees, Clement Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell.

In an October 1971 memo, an aide to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover said Deputy Attorney General Richard Kleindienst had telephoned to request a "criminal background check" on two Phoenix residents who were expected to testify against Rehnquist's nomination.

The Post reported at the time that the FBI was stirring controversy by questioning potential witnesses against Rehnquist, including Harvard Law School professor Laurence Tribe. When a Harvard official complained that the interviews were "seriously intimidating," Kleindienst wrote back that the questioning was impartial and that "any assumption that interviews were conducted with a view toward 'intimidation' is completely unjustified."

In 1986, the FBI files show, Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, asked the FBI to interview witnesses who might testify about allegations that Rehnquist had "challenged" blacks waiting in line to vote in Phoenix in 1962. Rehnquist was a legal adviser to the local Republican Party at the time.

Thurmond's request was relayed to the FBI by John R. Bolton, who was then an assistant attorney general and who recently stepped down as ambassador to the United Nations after the Senate did not act on his nomination. Although an FBI official warned that the bureau might be accused of "intimidating the Democrats' witnesses," Bolton approved the request and wrote that he would "accept responsibility should concerns be raised about the role of the FBI."

Bolton said in a telephone interview yesterday that there was no political bias in the investigation, because the request actually came from Senate Democrats.

"The Democrats wanted the FBI to interview these people who had raised questions about what Rehnquist had done," he said. "It was an unusual request. It stretches the whole concept of a background check. But Thurmond and the other Republicans on the committee at the time felt we should go ahead because there wouldn't be anything to it and Rehnquist would go ahead and be confirmed."

And that, Bolton added, is what happened. "The FBI didn't find any evidence that Rehnquist had intimidated voters," he said.

Torture Case Defendant Loses 1st Legal Fight (SPT)

St. Petersburg Times, January 5, 2007

A judge rejects Scott Schweickert 's request to throw out statements he made about h elp ing to d rug two men who were then r aped and killed.

TAMPA - Testifying for the first time since his arrest in a case involving allegations of torture, rape and murder, Scott Schweickert accused authorities Thursday of violating his rights by denying him a lawyer when he was first questioned.

But a federal prosecutor said Schweickert's story was false, and he had documents and tapes to prove it.

Schweickert, 41, is accused of helping Steven Lorenzo drug two Tampa men who were later raped and killed. His federal trial is scheduled to begin Monday.

U.S. District Judge Steven Merryday conducted a hearing Thursday on whether statements Schweickert made to law enforcement should be thrown out because his constitutional rights were denied.

Schweickert is charged with conspiracy and assisting in a drug-facilitated crime of violence against Michael Wachholtz and Jason Galehouse, both 26. The two men disappeared the same weekend in December 2003.

Wachholtz's decomposed body was found two weeks later. Galehouse has never been found, but blood identified as his was found on Lorenzo's garage floor.

DOJ_NMG_0112744

Schweickert said he requested a lawyer after he was served with a subpoena on May 3, 2005, to testify before a grand jury in the Lorenzo case.

But when he arrived in Tampa from his home in Peru, Ill., he said he was informed he wasn't entitled to legal representation.

"They told me I was ineligible for an attorney," said Schweickert, who was dressed in an orange prison jumpsuit. "There's no sense in asking for something you can't have."

Schweickert was questioned for nearly seven hours that day by Tampa police and a Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Schweickert's lawyer, Pedro Amador, said those statements should be thrown out because they were illegally obtained.

"It all should have stopped after he requested a lawyer," Amador said.

Schweickert also said he was falsely led to believe he would be granted immunity when authorities told him they would try to assist him if he was truthful.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Porcelli said Schweickert was never given any promises. He also noted Schweickert lied to the grand jury, which would be unnecessary if he felt he had immunity.

Porcelli called DEA agent Scott Albrecht, who testified that Schweickert had been informed of his right to an attorney several times but never requested one. In fact, Schweickert refused an offer to go before a judge to determine whether he qualified for a court-appointed attorney, he said.

Schweickert seemed eager to cooperate, and offered to drive officers around Tampa to show them where Lorenzo had stashed Galehouse's dismembered body. Schweickert also volunteered to draw a crude schematic showing where in Lorenzo's garage Galehouse had been killed, Albrecht said.

After listening to nearly five hours of testimony, Merryday rejected Schweickert's request to throw out the statements.

"The evidence shows that at no time did the defendant request a lawyer," Merryday said.

The hearing continues today with Merryday scheduled to decide whether to allow the prosecution to show pictures and videos found in Lorenzo's house during Schweickert's trial.

Five Men Indicted On Drug Charges (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, January 4, 2007

A grand jury in Baltimore indicted five defendants yesterday after federal drug agents seized 23 kilograms of cocaine last month and arrested the men involved in the delivery to Howard County on conspiracy charges.

The defendants -- Alejandero Arango-Lopez, 38, Jesus Luis Sanchez-Cuevas, 30, Julio Grano, 29, of Reidsville, N.C.; Juan Gonzalez, 29, of Guadalajara, Mexico; and Christopher Devan Towns, 41, of Raleigh, N.C. -- remained in jail. No court dates have been set.

According to court documents, a state trooper in North Carolina stopped the tractor-trailer Arango-Lopez was driving Dec. 18 for speeding. The trooper found cocaine in the vehicle, authorities said.

Court documents show that Drug Enforcement Administration agents learned that Sanchez-Cuevas and Arango-Lopez were delivering the cocaine from California to the truck stop at Exit 35 off Interstate 95 in Howard County. Sanchez-Cuevas and Arango-Lopez were to deliver the cocaine to Grano and others and were to be paid $10,000 each for the delivery, documents said.

Federal agents intercepted the delivery and arrested the men. If convicted, the defendants could receive a maximum sentence of life imprisonment and a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison.

[Matthew Dolan]

Feds Will Help County Go After Gang Members (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post, January 5, 2007

Federal agents will step in to help prosecute local gang members under the nation's racketeering laws, Palm Beach County Sheriff Ric Bradshaw said Thursday.

Members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and probably the Drug Enforcement Administration will go after those responsible for a surge in murders, Bradshaw said. The nation's racketeering law, stronger than the state statute, allows investigators to charge gang leaders who orchestrate a killing even if they did not pull the trigger.

Palm Beach County's murder rate soared in 2006, with 101 people killed, including 36 in the unincorporated area. The year was the deadliest since 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0112745

On New Year's Day, 37 shots were fired from a sport utility vehicle in Riviera Beach, killing 8-month-old Tavares Carter Jr., who was strapped in his car seat. Four adults also were hit as they ran for cover. Two more men were hit in a drive-by shooting on Lantana Road on Wednesday.

Bradshaw revived the county's violent crimes task force a year ago, and hopes that involving federal agents will give local law enforcement even more muscle to dismantle local gangs.

Congress passed the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, or RICO, in the 1970s to crack down on organized crime like the Mafia. But law enforcement agencies have found it a useful way to prosecute gang leaders who trade in illegal drugs and plan murders.

Federal law also helps investigators protect the identities of witnesses. Though Florida law makes all depositions, evidence and information shared between attorneys in a criminal case public record before trial, prosecutors in a federal case can shield their documents. That secrecy can prevent gang leaders from intimidating and silencing witnesses, Bradshaw said.

Federal investigators have used the racketeering law to charge 40 members and associates of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang, and the leader of the Mexican Mafia, who collected a cut of drug sales by Latino street gangs in Orange County, Calif.

Defense attorneys have criticized use of those laws, however, saying that federal agents have used tenuous links and a wide dragnet to win convictions of low-level gang members who were not responsible for violent crimes.

Colombia Extradites 2 Police Officers (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Colombia has extradited to the United States a police officer and a former policeman charged with helping smuggle more than 2 tons of cocaine into the U.S. on cargo flights, U.S. officials said Thursday.

Leonidas Molina Triana, a former major in the Colombia's national police, and Humberto Avila, a patrolman at Bogota's El Dorado airport, were arrested in April as part a joint probe by prosecutors in New York and law enforcement agencies in Colombia, the United States and Mexico.

Four other current and former officers, as well as a commercial airline employee, are expected to be extradited soon, Erin McKenzie-Mulvey, a DEA spokeswoman in New York, told The Associated Press.

Operation "Caso Dorado," or Golden Case, was based on an indictment from a U.S. District Court in New York alleging that Colombia's Norte del Valle cartel -- the country's biggest -- recruited workers at Avianca Airlines and police at Bogota's El Dorado airport to ship cocaine on commercial aircraft.

Authorities said corrupt police officials and Avianca employees falsified paperwork in October 2005 that allowed 901 pounds of cocaine to pass through the airline's cargo facility undetected.

The drugs were seized by law enforcement authorities in Mexico, allegedly en route to the United States.

Shipments totaling nearly 2 tons were intercepted in Mexico in March and April 2006.

If convicted, the defendants face a minimum of 10 years in prison. The charges carry a maximum life sentence, but the United States has assured Colombia that it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from the South American country.

Colombia Extradites Policemen To U.S. (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Two Colombian police officers have been extradited to the U.S. to face cocaine smuggling charges, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) officials said yesterday.

Leonidas Molina-Triana, a former major in the Colombian National Police (CNP), and Humberto Avila, a police officer, are named in a federal grand jury indictment on charges of conspiring to ship more than $50 million in cocaine through the El Dorado International Airport in Bogota to Mexico en route to the United States.

DEA Special Agent in Charge John P. Gilbride, who heads the agency's New York field office, said Colombia's infamous Norte Valle drug cartel recruited Colombian police officials responsible for airport security and employees of Avianca Airlines to facilitate the smuggling of cocaine to the United States.

"These extraditions are a warning to those individuals who smuggle drugs into the United States that the DEA and the U.S. attorney's office will continue to vigorously investigate your organizations to ensure you are brought to justice," Mr. Gilbride said.

"Leonidas Molina-Triana and Humberto Avila both worked for the Colombian National Police, and both betrayed the trust of the public and airline employees," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0112746

The indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in New York, said that in October 2005, Maj. Molina-Triana, Officer Avila and Avianca Airlines employees permitted more than 800 pounds of cocaine with a street value of $10 million to pass through security at the Avianca Airlines cargo facility at El Dorado airport without detection.

It said Officer Avila, who was assigned to the airport, moved the cocaine through security and guarded the drugs for three days in the Avianca cargo facility. The cocaine was then put on an Avianca flight to Mexico City, where it was seized by Mexican law-enforcement personnel.

The indictment also said that in March and April, the Norte Valle cartel used Maj. Molina-Triana and Officer Avila to smuggle more than 3,500 pounds of cocaine valued at $40 million from Bogota to the United States via Mexico. Those drugs were seized by U.S. authorities.

DEA spokesman Garrison K. Courtney said the extraditions are part of "Operation Caso Dorado," a joint investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's Office in New York, the DEA in Bogota and New York, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities.

Mr. Courtney said both men have been ordered held pending trial. If convicted, they face life sentences and a mandatory minimum of 10 years' imprisonment, although the U.S. government has assured Colombia that it will not seek life sentences for suspects extradited from Colombia.

The indictment also seeks the forfeiture of $50 million from the two men.

"Today, more than ever, the integrity of the law-enforcement and airline personnel responsible for the safety of airline passengers and cargo is of critical importance," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia. "When such officials facilitate the smuggling of contraband destined for the United States, they not only violate our criminal laws but also threaten our national security."

Colombia Extradites Two Police Officers To US On Drug Smuggling Charges (VOA)

Voice of America, January 4, 2007

ColombiaTwo Colombian police officers have been extradited to the United States on charges of helping to smuggle more than $50 million worth of cocaine into the U.S. on cargo flights.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Thursday announced the extradition of Leonidas Molina Triana, a former major in Colombia's national police, and Humberto Avila, an active patrolman at Bogota's El Dorado airport.

The indictment alleges that Molina-Triana was one of a number of corrupt officials who helped Colombia's Norte del Valle drug cartel recruit workers at Avianca Airlines, and police at El Dorado airport, to ship cocaine on commercial aircraft.

Authorities say the two men conspired to facilitate cocaine shipments through the airport to Mexico en route to the United States. If convicted, they could face a maximum sentence of life in prison and a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison.

The United States, however, has assured Colombia it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from the South American country.

The DEA says the investigation, known as "Operation Caso Dorado," involved law enforcement authorities from the United States, Colombia and Mexico.

Some information for this report was provided by AP.

IMMIGRATION:

Wisconsin Man, 81, Ordered Deported; Was SS Guard (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 5, 2007

CHICAGO — An immigration judge ordered the deportation of an 81-year-old Wisconsin man accused of serving as a Nazi concentration camp guard, the Justice Department announced today.

Judge Jennie Giambastiani ordered Wednesday that Josias Kumpf be deported to Germany, Austria or Serbia. The department said Kumpf chose Germany, although it was unclear when he would be deported.

Kumpf's attorney, Peter Rogers of Pittsburgh, said his client would appeal the ruling within 30 days as required.

In July, the federal government asked the judge to deport Kumpf, who was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 2005 after a federal judge in Milwaukee concluded he had "personally assisted" in the persecution of prisoners.

Kumpf served as an armed SS guard at Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp in Germany, an SS labor camp in Trawniki, Poland, and at construction sites in occupied France, the Justice Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0112747

Kumpf was born in what is now Serbia, immigrated to the United States from Austria in 1956, and became a U.S. citizen in 1964. The federal judge in Milwaukee found Kumpf didn't disclose he had been an SS guard because he feared it would disqualify him when he applied for a visa to the United States.

In a 2003 interview, Kumpf said he was taken from his home in Yugoslavia as a 17-year-old and forced to serve as a guard, but he didn't participate in any atrocities.

"We do not believe that 'assistance and persecution' would include a gentleman who was involuntarily inscripted into the army, assigned to the SS and then stationed at places where admittedly terrible things happened. My client never took part in them," Rogers said.

TAX:

Suit Says Couple Cost U.S. Treasury Millions (JSO)

By Erinn Deshinsky, OF THE JOURNAL STAR

Peoria Journal Star (Central Illinois), January 5, 2007

The Reddys of Seneca own two tax services

SENECA - The Justice Department has brought a federal lawsuit against a Seneca couple accused of costing the U.S. Treasury more than $13 million in faulty income tax returns.

The suit, filed Dec. 29 in U.S. District Court in Chicago against Royanne and Neal Reddy, seeks to permanently bar them from preparing federal tax returns for others. Their companies are advertised as specializing in tax service for trucking and construction companies.

The Reddys own Royanne's Tax Service in Marseilles and Royanne and Company in Princeton. The couple has prepared more than 9,000 returns since 2002, according to a Justice Department news release.

The Reddys were not available for comment Thursday. The lawsuit alleges 70 of these returns, which were prepared by the Reddys or their employees, required adjustments and 64 returns contained improper deductions of as much as $30,000. The suit also says the savings from the under-reported returns averaged to about $2,775 per customer.

The Reddys are accused of fraudulently fabricating or inflating business expenses to reduce customers' incomes. They are also accused of fabricating income for some customers so they could receive earned income tax credits.

The suit also claims the couple provided false documents to IRS agents auditing their customers' returns.

The Justice Department said that if it wins the suit, the Reddys must give the government a list of their customers' names, addresses, e-mail addresses, phone numbers and Social Security numbers.

Erinn Deshinsky can be reached at 686-3041 or state@pjstar.com.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Take Control Of Congress (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 5, 2007

In a day of ceremony and historic change, Rep. Nancy Pelosi became the nation's first female House speaker on Thursday as Democrats eagerly took control of Congress for the final two years of President Bush's term.

"The Democrats are back," rejoiced Pelosi, and she immediately set the rank-and-file to work passing tougher ethics rules.

As is customary, the opening moments of the 110th Congress produced pledges of bipartisanship at both ends of the Capitol. Yet Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid signaled a new political order when they swiftly challenged Bush over the war in Iraq.

"No issue in our country is more important than finding an end to this intractable war," said Reid, D-Nev. "Completing the mission in Iraq is the president's job, and we will do everything in our power to ensure he fulfills it." Bush is expected to announce a revised strategy next week for the war, which has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 members of the U.S. armed forces.

The two houses convened at the stroke of noon, under Democratic control together for the first time since 1994.

That meant a return to power for men long used to wielding it. Liberals such as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Rep. John Dingell of Michigan are committee chairmen again, for example.

And it brought reduced circumstances to others — no one more so than Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., just a member of the ranks after eight tumultuous years as speaker.

DOJ_NMG_0112748

By custom, lawmakers brought their children to opening ceremonies in the House, and Pelosi swept into the chamber accompanied by her grandchildren.

Formality reigned, as always, in the Senate, where Vice President Dick Cheney administered the oath of office to 33 new and newly re-elected senators.

Former President Clinton watched from the gallery as his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, was sworn in for a second term from New York.

In a chance encounter, he dodged questions about her presidential ambitions. "I would like not to talk about it today," he said.

It fell to Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the new House Republican leader, to hand the gavel — symbol of the speaker's authority — to Pelosi. "Whether you're a Republican, Democrat or an independent, this is a cause for celebration," he said, noting her place in history.

But he also gave notice to the party she leads, adding, "Republicans will hold the incoming majority accountable for its promises, and its actions."

Across the Capitol, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky took over as leader of minority Republicans, and said it was time to put an end to "a culture of partisanship over principle." He said cooperation was clearly possible on minimum wage and lobbying bills, and he added that he hoped the issues of Social Security and immigration would also yield to compromise.

Reid said he was eager for cooperation, and he arranged for a rare closed-door meeting of all senators before the Senate convened to help set a more cordial tone.

Leader of a slender majority, the Nevadan said, "Some may look at this composition as a recipe for gridlock, but I see it as a unique opportunity. ... We must turn the page on partisanship and usher in a new era of bipartisan progress."

He tempered his optimism when referring to Bush — a man he has previously called a loser. "The president has 22 months left in office. If he wants to accomplish anything, he will have to work with us in Congress to pass bipartisan legislation," he said.

In the two months since the election, both Reid and Pelosi have promised longer hours in Congress, an institution where the five-day work week is a rarity.

While Thursday was set aside for ceremony and celebration in the Senate, the House plunged immediately into work on the agenda that Democrats campaigned on last fall.

Despite Republican procedural protests, Democrats said they had the votes to assure passage of rules changes designed to end what they long called a "culture of corruption."

The changes expand restrictions on privately financed trips enjoyed by lawmakers, prohibit travel on corporate jets and require greater disclosure of earmarks, the pet projects inserted into legislation at the behest of individual lawmakers.

House members would still be allowed to take trips financed by foundations that seek to influence public opinion, but only if the ethics committee approves the travel in advance.

Current rules ban congressional travel paid for by lobbyists or foreign governments, and violations of the existing restrictions played heavily in the scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

House Democrats have an ambitious agenda for the next few weeks. They have pledged to pass bills to raise the minimum wage, expand the opportunity for federally funded stem cell research, make Medicare prescription drugs cheaper, reduce the cost of student loans, implement anti-terror measures and reduce tax breaks enjoyed by the oil industry — all before Bush goes to the Capitol on Jan. 23 for his State of the Union address.

The Senate operates on a far slower pace, but Reid has said he will attempt to complete work on the early measures. Legislation to crack down on lobbyists will be the first bill brought to the floor next week.

At least one measure — the stem cell legislation — faces a veto threat. Republicans have also hinted Bush would reject a measure that orders the administration to muscle drug companies into lowering their prices for prescriptions filled under Medicare.

Democrats Elect First Female Speaker, Pass Lobbying Reforms (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrat Nancy Pelosi of California took the oath of office Thursday as the nation's first female speaker of the House of Representatives, calling it "an historic moment for the Congress and for the women of this country" and "a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years."

As Democrats retook control of the House and Senate after a dozen years out of power, they moved immediately to pass lobbying and ethics reforms in the House and to establish their top 10 legislative goals in the Senate. Republicans in both chambers tried to walk a line between graciousness and pushing to hold Democrats to their pledges to include them as full partners in legislating.

DOJ_NMG_0112749

Above all, the opening ceremonies of the 110th Congress were Pelosi's to relish.

After addressing the Congressional Black Caucus in the morning, the wealthy, 66-year-old liberal from San Francisco arrived in the House chamber around noon with her family in tow. She sat beside House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., whom only weeks earlier she had failed to displace in favor of her friend, Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa.

Democrats and many Republicans gave her a standing ovation.

Above, the gallery was dotted with celebrities, including actor Richard Gere and singer Tony Bennett.

Former House members with reason to celebrate slipped back onto the floor. They included Pat Schroeder, the Colorado feminist, and John Burton of San Francisco. Burton's late brother Phil and late sister-in-law Sala each previously served in the congressional seat that Pelosi has held since 1987. They cultivated her to replace them.

As members called out their votes for speaker, Pelosi cradled the newest of her six grandchildren, a boy born days after the November election, and tried to manage the other little ones, who were busily swinging a microphone and oblivious to the import of the moment.

Pelosi defeated Republican John Boehner of Ohio on a party-line vote, 233-202. She thanked her husband, Paul, and their five children "for giving me their love, support and the confidence to go from the kitchen to the Congress."

In a well-received speech before handing over the gavel to Pelosi, Boehner, the House Republican leader, praised the election of the first female speaker, saying, "Whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, today is a cause for celebration."

He called for a respectful debate between the parties, telling Pelosi, "May the best idea win."

He also warned, "If there is one lesson that stands out from our party's time in the majority, it is this: A congressional majority is simply a means to an end. The value of a majority lies not in the chance to wield great power but in the chance to use limited power to do great things. The moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

Pelosi, grinning, waved the gavel, but said, "I accept this gavel in the spirit of partnership, not partisanship."

"By electing me speaker," she told her colleagues, "you have brought us closer to the ideal of equality that is America's heritage and hope. For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling."

Pelosi touched on the Iraq war only briefly, saying Americans had rejected the idea of an open-ended commitment of troops there.

"It is the responsibility of the president to articulate a new plan for Iraq that makes it clear to the Iraqis that they must defend their own streets and their own security, a plan that promotes stability in the region and that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces," she said.

After the ceremonies, House members moved to begin voting on an ethics package that's meant to correct some of the excesses of the previous Congress, including scandals that led to the prosecutions of at least two congressmen and of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The House passed the first portion of that package overwhelmingly Thursday night, 430-1, with Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., the only opponent. It largely would ban meals, gifts and travel from lobbyists. It also would ban members from taking free rides on corporate jets. A second portion of the package, which would require lawmakers to identify which "earmark" spending projects they request and to curb deficit spending, is to be voted on Friday.

With her ascent, Pelosi, a Roman Catholic whose late father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., served in Congress and as mayor of Baltimore, also becomes the first Italian-American speaker and the first speaker from California.

As the roll call for speaker was counted, Republicans simply called out Boehner's name, but several Democrats expounded on why they were voting for Pelosi: "on behalf of my three daughters" or for "the first woman speaker and a daughter of Italy" or in memory of female leaders such as Harriet Tubman and Rosa Parks.

Some of the more poignant shouts came from members of the Black Caucus, who are looking ahead to a year when African-Americans will hold more positions of power in the House than ever, including Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., as majority whip and Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., as chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee.

Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., D-Ill., said Pelosi's election was a major step in "the struggle for equality." Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a civil rights leader in the `60s, called it a "historic day when the eyes of the nation are upon us."

Thursday's swearing-in ceremony was the peak of a weeklong celebration for Pelosi that included being an honored guest at the Italian Embassy, attending Mass at her alma mater, Trinity University, and praying with soldiers.

After she was sworn in, she headed to a $1,000-per-ticket concert and fundraiser for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, featuring Bennett, famous for "I Left My Heart in San Francisco," and other singers.

DOJ_NMG_0112750

On Friday afternoon, she's scheduled to be in Baltimore's Little Italy, where she was raised, to have a street named in her honor.

The Senate's opening was more low-key, but symbolically positive. Before being sworn in, members of both parties held an unofficial joint caucus in the old Senate chamber and came out of the historic room pledging to work in a bipartisan manner.

"I know that you're not accustomed, members of the press, to people getting along, working together, but Senator McConnell and I believe that this is a new day in Washington," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., with Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., smiling by his side.

McConnell said the meeting was "a chance for many of our members to express some of their quiet frustrations that we get past the level of partisanship that we've witnessed in recent years and develop stronger personal relationships as well as work across the party aisle."

After the swearing-in ceremonies, Reid introduced the Democrats' first 10 bills for the 110th Congress. Overhauling Congress' ethics system topped the agenda, followed by raising the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour.

Democrats also plan to introduce bills to change the Medicare prescription-drug program, act on the 9-11 commission's recommendations, fund stem cell research, repair the nation's immigration system, strengthen the military, address rising college tuition, force Congress to tighten budget rules and develop an energy policy.

Nancy Pelosi Basks In Historic Day (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, January 5, 2007

Surrounded by kids as well as cheering lawmakers, Nancy Pelosi marveled aloud at her long journey "from the kitchen to the Congress."

Six times a grandmother, now second in line to the presidency, Pelosi said her ascension to become the first female House speaker in history was the culmination of 200 years of struggle for women as well as a personal victory.

"We have made history, now let us make progress for the American people," she said.

It was her coming-out to the nation, and Pelosi, 66, sought to introduce herself not only as the San Francisco liberal decried by Republicans, but as Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi, Italian-American Catholic, mother of five and native of gritty Baltimore, where her father was mayor.

She arrived on the House floor Thursday with all six grandchildren in tow, including baby Paul Michael Vos, born to her daughter Alexandra in early November.

"I was raised in a large family that was devoutly Catholic, deeply patriotic, proud of our Italian-American heritage, and staunchly Democratic," Pelosi said. "My parents taught us that public service was a noble calling."

After her election by a vote of 233-202, the chamber's Democratic-Republican breakdown, a beaming Pelosi stood holding her sleeping infant grandson — who did not stir — and shook hands as she accepted congratulations from her fellow House members.

Minutes later, cheers erupted in the chamber as House Republican leader John Boehner handed her the speaker's gavel. Pelosi always has said she wants to be judged by her abilities, not her gender, but she happily acknowledged the importance of her achievement.

"By electing me as speaker you have brought us closer to the ideal of equality that is America's heritage and America's hope," Pelosi said. "This is an historic moment — for the Congress, and for the women of America. It is a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years. Never losing faith, we waited through the many years of struggle to achieve our rights."

"For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling," she said. "For our daughters and our granddaughters now, the sky is the limit."

Boehner, in handing her the gavel, said: "For more than 200 years, the leaders of our government have been democratically elected. And from their ranks, our elected leaders have always selected a man for the responsibility and honor of serving as speaker of the House. Always, that is, until today."

Onlookers in the packed visitors' galleries included actor Richard Gere and singer Tony Bennett, crooner of "I Left My Heart in San Francisco," along with hometown partisans.

"We look forward to the rest of the country appreciating the real San Francisco values, of diversity and a city of dreamers," said San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom. "You can only exploit the gay community so much. ... They're going to see there's so much more to San Francisco."

Everywhere Pelosi went Thursday supporters marveled at her achievement, especially other women.

Outside the Library of Congress, leaders from the National Organization for Women greeted her with a giant congratulation card. The message: "Way to Go!"

DOJ_NMG_0112751

Newly elected Democratic Rep. Jason Altmire of Pennsylvania brought his wife, Kelly, and daughters Natalie, 8, and Grace, 5, to witness Pelosi's swearing-in and pose for photos with her.

"I'll make sure they understand the significance of it," Kelly Altmire said of her daughters. "I don't know if they get it yet, but they will."

Pelosi began her history-making day at a prayer service with her husband, Paul, at St. Peter's Catholic Church near the Capitol. She was met by a small knot of anti-abortion protesters carrying signs reading, "You can't be Catholic and pro-abortion." She walked by without acknowledging them.

Attending the service with her were Boehner and other Republican leaders her party put into the minority in the November election. Also there was new House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland, a one-time Pelosi rival elected by House Democrats to be her No. 2 over her protests.

She later attended a ceremonial swearing-in of the Congressional Black Caucus, where the incoming leader of the 43-member group, Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, D-Mich., made clear the pressure the new speaker will face. "She must deliver because black people delivered that we might have this majority," Kilpatrick said.

Thursday evening, Pelosi was being feted at a $1,000-a-head concert hosted by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee at the National Building Museum with performances from Carole King, Bennett, Wyclef Jean and others.

Pelosi attended Mass on Wednesday at Trinity University, where she's an alumna, and dined that night at the Italian Embassy.

Friday begins with an open house event across from the Capitol. Then she heads to Baltimore, where part of the street where she grew up in Little Italy is being dedicated in her honor: Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi Via.

Pelosi was raised there, the daughter of New Deal Maryland Rep. Thomas D'Alesandro, who later became the city's mayor. She didn't run for the House herself until 1987 after marrying Paul Pelosi, a wealthy businessman, moving to San Francisco and raising her children.

In Congress Pelosi displayed the tough politicking of her childhood environment. She wrung loyalties, counted votes and muscled aside Hoyer to become the Democrats' second-in-command, and then Democratic leader in 2002.

Civility, Synergy Top Order In Senate (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Pledges to forge a new era of civility and bipartisan cooperation in the U.S. Senate abounded yesterday as Democrats took control of the chamber for the first time in 12 years.

"The majority my party holds is slim: 51-49," Majority Leader Harry Reid said in his opening address on the Senate floor. "Some may look at this composition as a recipe for gridlock, but I see it as a unique opportunity -- an opportunity for Democrats and Republicans to debate our differences and seek common ground.

"We must turn the page on partisanship and usher in a new era of bipartisan progress," the Nevada Democrat said.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell struck an equally conciliatory tone when he addressed the chamber, promising a spirit of teamwork to "find bold solutions to big problems."

"The challenges ahead will not be met if we do nothing to overcome the partisanship that has come to characterize this body over the past several years," said Mr. McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

"A culture of partisanship over principle represents a grave threat to the Senate's best tradition as a place of constructive cooperation. It undermines the spirit and the purpose of this institution."

He went a step further.

"I stake my party to a pledge: when faced with an urgent issue, we will act; when faced with a problem, we will seek solutions, not mere political advantage," Mr. McConnell said.

Mr. Reid's speech included a list of the majority's first 10 bills, which included the potentially divisive measures of authorizing federal funding of stem-cell research and reworking the Medicare drug benefit.

He also vowed to make ending the Iraq war a top priority, despite a possible confrontation with the White House and Senate Republicans.

"No issue in our country is more important than finding an end to the intractable war," Mr. Reid said.

The Senate leadership teams even made a tangible gesture of cooperation, holding an unprecedented bipartisan caucus yesterday morning in the Old Senate Chamber.

Still, the two parties have been at loggerheads for years, most recently with the Democratic minority filibustering judicial nominations, the elimination of the death tax and confirmation of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0112752

Leaders on both sides of the aisle acknowledge not only that the two-vote margin is forcing them to act more cordially at the outset of the 110th Congress, but also that they must pass legislation fast in these salad days before Washington is overtaken by campaign politics for 2008.

The Democrats' narrow majority also is made tenuous by the slow recovery of Sen. Tim Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat who remains at George Washington University Hospital after a Dec. 13 brain hemorrhage. He still needs a ventilator, and doctors say he may need months to recover.

Mr. Johnson's death or resignation from the Senate likely would result in South Dakota's Republican governor appointing someone from his party to complete the term. Republicans would then control the chamber with a 50-50 split and Vice President Dick Cheney, the president of the Senate, able to cast the tie-breaking vote.

"There is going to be a great effort to work together to pass the major things we agree on," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican and chairman of the Senate Republican Policy Committee. "If we disagree, disagree agreeably and try to produce results."

She predicted the civility would last long enough to pass ethics reforms, a deficit-reduction plan and tinker with Social Security, the longtime third rail of American politics.

"We ought to be able to find common ground on Social Security," she said. "We are headed for a train wreck."

Mr. Reid's first 10 bills did not include Social Security reform. The minority, however, will be allowed to submit the next 10 bills.

Reid Takes Center Stage, But He's Hardly The Star Of The Show (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Harry Reid is often called the man from Searchlight, Nevada. Nobody has ever called him the man from Spotlight.

The soft-spoken Democrat became the most powerful figure in the United States Senate yesterday. But the newly minted majority leader was quickly eclipsed -- not just by the ascent of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi but even by Bill Clinton's trip to the men's room.

Minutes before Reid assumed power yesterday, the former president, in the building to see his wife sworn in for a second term, sauntered into the Senate press gallery in search of a urinal. Reporters swarmed, some abandoning their seats in the chamber where they had been waiting for Reid.

"They told me the closest restroom was in the press gallery," Clinton explained.

Reid was bound to be overshadowed yesterday. Pelosi was the first woman to become speaker in American history. Reid was merely the 20th man to become Senate majority leader since the position was created 87 years ago.

Pretty much everybody regarded the Pelosi ascent as momentous. "Historic event," said the Associated Press. "An historic day," admitted Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio). "An historic moment," claimed Pelosi herself. Only an article in Reid's home-state Las Vegas Review-Journal called his elevation "historic."

Part of the disparity, however, was less about history than style. Pelosi scheduled four days of parties for her installation -- a festival Republicans dubbed the Pelosi-Palooza -- including an extravaganza featuring Tony Bennett, and a street naming for Pelosi in her native Baltimore.

And Reid? "In Searchlight, we don't have street names," he said.

Reid, a mild-mannered Mormon, consented to not a single party in his honor this week. Instead, he assembled senators from both parties yesterday morning for a private moment of bonding in the Old Senate Chamber. Reid emerged with the minority leader, Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, walking so close together their hands almost touched. "Senator McConnell and I believe this is a new day in Washington," Reid announced.

"I think Harry's got it right," McConnell answered.

After a couple of perfunctory questions, the reporters grew silent. "One more question?" Reid asked. Nobody volunteered.

"When we're not fighting, they're not asking any questions," observed Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Over on the House side, lawmakers and spectators gave Pelosi a raucous standing ovation. She waved and blew kisses. On the Senate floor, packed with old-timers including John Glenn and Walter Mondale, Reid entered mostly unnoticed. He shook a few hands, drummed his finger on his desk and hitched up his pants by the belt. Senators, meanwhile, waved up to President Clinton, who was sitting in the second row of the public gallery with his daughter and mother-in-law, greeting a line of fans and talking on a cellphone until he noticed the opening prayer had started.

The attention quickly shifted -- to Robert Byrd. The 89-year-old West Virginia Democrat, beginning his ninth term, wore a red-white-and-blue tie and punctuated the opening prayer with shouts of "Yes!" and "Mmmhmmm!" and "Yes, Lord!" and "Yes, in Jesus's name!" When he was sworn in, he twice cried out "Hallelujah!" and then "Amen!" Minutes later, he was installed as

DOJ_NMG_0112753

Senate president pro tempore, the majority party's most senior member. "Yeah, man! Yeah, man!" he shouted. "Hallelujah!" "I do, so help me God!" he shouted when the oath was administered. "Yeah, man!"

His colleagues were amused. Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) at one point pretended to tilt a bottle into his mouth, though it was unclear whether Byrd was the target of that gesture.

Then there was Reid. He bowed over his desk for the prayer. He silently escorted senators for their swearing-in. Then, in his first utterance as majority leader, he spoke the immortal words "Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum."

When he started his speech, Reid spoke in a barely audible voice, and his colleagues' chatter drowned out his oration. "Please," the presiding officer said with a bang of the gavel, "the majority leader is speaking."

Those who listened to Reid heard a plea for senators to work harder. "Factory workers, shopkeepers in America's malls, schoolteachers, police officers, miners, welders, and businessmen and -women work at least five days a week," he said. "Shouldn't we?"

Evidently not. Just a few minutes into Reid's speech, only 20 senators remained on the floor. Reid's deputy, Dick Durbin (Ill.), typed on his Treo. When Reid started talking about the framers of the Constitution, Clinton left the room -- and most of the remaining spectators followed him.

Outside the chamber, Clinton greeted Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.) and a parade of well-wishers. Spying Byrd, the former president wrapped his arms around the voluble senator. "We love you!" he told Byrd, and then he turned to his mother-in-law. "Meet Hillary's mom."

On the Senate floor, Reid was still laying out, in detail, his 10-point legislative agenda. When he yielded the floor after 30 minutes, only three senators remained, and the half-dozen spectators lingering in the public gallery included Reid's wife.

It was no Pelosi-Palooza -- and that didn't seem to bother the Senate majority leader one bit. "Don't worry about Harry Reid," Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) told reporters. "He'll be okay."

Smiles, Backslaps, Even A Civility Meeting: For A Day, At Least, Bipartisanship Reigns (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Capitol Hill observed a National Day of Comity on Thursday. Against the sober backdrop of war and as Democrats ascended in both chambers, people of both parties spoke of how committed they were to working together and changing the political tone.

And how many times have we heard that before?

“Almost on an annual basis,” said Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, a three-decade veteran of civility vows in the capital. “It’s like our New Year’s ritual around here.”

But maybe this time really will be different. Like 63-degree weather in January (and cherry blossoms out of season), Washington seemed to have flipped on its head, power-wise, karma-wise, at least for a few hours.

There were children and flowers everywhere, and pictures of Vice President Dick Cheney and Senator Edward M. Kennedy mugging together.

And a warm-looking handshake between the only Muslim in Congress, the newly elected Representative Keith Ellison, Democrat of Minnesota, and Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Virginia Republican who had condemned Mr. Ellison’s plan to use the Koran at his ceremonial swearing-in. (Mr. Ellison made history in more ways than one at that ceremony Thursday by using a Koran once owned by Thomas Jefferson.)

And dapper old senators saying things like this:

“The place is like a bubbling bottle of Champagne, overflowing with joy and hope and civility,” said Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia. And to think, this guy is in the minority now.

O.K., so maybe the venerable Mr. Warner was exaggerating a bit. Or indulging in a smidge of sarcasm. But his words and the big smile with which he delivered them neatly captured the spirit of the day.

The Senate’s top leaders, Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, and Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, convened a bipartisan meeting at 9 a.m. to discuss bipartisanship.

“I’m here for the civility meeting,” declared one freshman, Senator Amy Klobuchar, Democrat of Minnesota, as she stepped out of an aide’s Honda outside the Capitol. She pretended to fuss with her hair, as if this were the first day of school and she was nervous. An upper classman, Senator Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa, sat in an idling Cadillac a few feet away.

Nearly all senators showed up for the civility meeting, which was held in the plush and ornate Old Senate Chamber. They left the doors open for several extra minutes so the photographers could come in to take pictures of the smiles and shoulder squeezes and hugs all around.

DOJ_NMG_0112754

After a few minutes, the meeting reverted to the slightly awkward feel of a junior high school mixer, with the boys and girls (or Ds and Rs) repairing to separate sides of the room. There were a few exceptions, as when Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, an independent who caucuses with the Democrats, took a seat next to Senator Johnny Isakson, Republican of Georgia, after working both sides of the chamber.

At the very least, no one was alleged to have acted in an uncivil manner.

"Of course not," reported Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, shocked — shocked — that anyone could even suggest such a thing.

"People want us to stop acting like kindergarten kids," said Senator Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee.

It was an open question as to how long this era of good feeling would last.

"What time is it?" Senator Claire McCaskill, a newly elected Democrat from Missouri, asked just before noon. "It's still early yet."

Not two minutes later, Senator Jim Bunning was asked a question — shouted a question, actually — about this latest of calls for civility.

"We hear them every year," Mr. Bunning, a second-term Republican from Kentucky, said before storming off, uncivilly.

But that was the exception Thursday, as was the seemingly unhinged man who had apparently not gotten the comity memo and interrupted a television interview in the Russell Office Building, shouting profanity as he headed out the door with the Capitol police right behind him.

Back on the House side, fresh-faced Representative Patrick Murphy, Democrat of Pennsylvania, was clutching his 6-week-old daughter, Maggie, and talking about how he had choked up when taking the oath a little earlier.

An Army veteran who served in Iraq, Mr. Murphy said his mind had flashed to his time in the service, the oath he took there. And he nearly teared up again as he rubbed the soft cheeks of Maggie, who was sucking on a "Daddy's Little Girl" pacifier.

"It seems pretty collegial here," said Mr. Murphy, basing his assessment on exactly 90 minutes in the House and on his orientation soon after the election, where a fellow newbie gave up his seat so Mr. Murphy's wife, Jennifer, then very pregnant, could sit down.

"He was a Republican," Mr. Murphy recalled. If only he could remember the nice man's name. "I think he might have been from Florida."

Put it down as a baby step on the comity journey.

Jubilant Democrats Take The Wheel On Capitol Hill (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats took control of both the House and Senate today for the first time in the presidency of Republican George W. Bush — and promptly embraced at least some of the trappings of bipartisanship.

The House made history by electing Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco as its first female speaker, putting her behind Vice President Dick Cheney in the line of succession to the presidency.

Pelosi received the votes of the 233 Democrats who were elected to the House Nov. 7, defeating the Republican candidate, John Boehner of Ohio, who got the votes of the 202 Republicans.

In a sort of inaugural speech to her fellow House members, Pelosi immediately invoked the spirit of bipartisanship.

"In this House we may be of different parties," she said, "but we serve one country."

She recalled the ability of President Gerald R. Ford, a Republican who died the day after Christmas, to work with both parties when he served as a House member from Michigan for 25 years and the minority leader for eight of them.

Boehner struck a similar note. "We want to work with the incoming majority for the good of our nation that we were all elected to serve," he said in introducing Pelosi. "Republicans and Democrats can disagree without being disagreeable to each other."

In the Senate, meanwhile, Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada was selected majority leader, but it will be by the slimmest of majorities — 51 Democrats to 49 Republicans — that he will lead.

Reid convened a closed meeting, in the chamber where the Senate used to meet, for all 100 senators before the new senators were sworn into office. Ordinarily, each party holds its own closed meeting once a week.

After the meeting, Reid and Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the new leader of Senate Republicans, stood side by side as they spoke to reporters.

"Sen. McConnell and I believe this is a new day in Washington, that our efforts are going to be to work in a bipartisan basis, in an open fashion, to solve the problems of the American people," Reid asserted.

DOJ_NMG_0112755

"Harry's got it right," McConnell said. "This opportunity we had in the Old Senate Chamber was a chance for many of our members to express some of their quiet frustrations, that we get past the level of partisanship that we've witnessed in recent years and develop stronger personal relationships, as well as work across the party aisle."

Democratic and Republican senators have traditionally gotten along better than House members, and there were signs of partisan tensions in the House even before Pelosi was elected speaker.

She pressed ahead with her agenda for the House's first 100 legislative hours — over Republican grumbling that she planned House floor votes without the usual committee action first.

The schedule calls for votes Friday on two rules changes — one banning lobbyists' gifts to House members and the other requiring that legislation that would cut taxes or increase spending be accompanied by provisions to prevent an increase in the deficit. The House can adopt the rules changes without action by the Senate.

Next week, the House will begin voting on legislation that will need Senate consent and Bush's signature, including some highly controversial items. At the head of that list is a bill to expand embryonic stem cell research — the subject of Bush's only veto in his six years in office.

Democrats Take Control Of Congress (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In an historic and emotional display of determination and gratitude, Democrats elected the first woman Speaker of the House and took charge of the 110th Congress Thursday, pledging civility but also signaling sharp differences with President Bush over issues like the war in Iraq.

"I accept this gavel in the spirit of partnership, not partisanship," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), taking the heavy wooden gavel from John Boehner, the Republican leader from Ohio.

The 2006 elections dramatically altered the balance of power in Washington, diminishing President Bush's ability to influence legislation and providing Democrats with the ability to set the national agenda.

Democrats vowed to scrutinize Bush's Iraq policy which will be announced next week, as well as pass bills raising the minimum wage, expanding federally funded embryonic stem cell research and allowing Medicare to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies about the price of drugs.

After convening, the House immediately adopted new rules Thursday tightening ethics guidelines by banning lobbyists from giving gifts, meals and tickets to members and their staffs. The rules would also prohibit lobbyists from paying for a lawmaker's travel or providing flights on corporate jets. The measure passed 235-195, largely along partisan lines.

Before turning to legislative matters, the House was enveloped in the centuries-old ceremony of choosing a new speaker and swearing in 435 newly elected members. For nearly an hour, lawmakers rose one by one to cast their vote aloud for either Pelosi or Boehner, with Pelosi easily capturing 233 votes and the top post, which is second in the line of succession to the presidency.

"It's an historic moment for the Congress," Pelosi said. "It's an historic moment for the women of America. It is a moment for which we have waited over 200 years. Never losing faith, we waited through the many years of struggle to achieve our rights.

"But women weren't just waiting. Women were working. Never losing faith, we worked to redeem the promise of America, that all men and women are created equal. For our daughters and our granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling. For our daughters and our granddaughters now, the sky is the limit."

Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.) invoked Rosa Parks, Harriet Tubman and even Jesus Christ as he added his name to the Pelosi tally. Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a legend of the civil rights movement, observed that "the eyes of the nation are upon us."

By contrast, Republicans sat quietly as they inexorably slid from power, with former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) standing grimly at the rear of the chamber in an area normally reserved for lowly backbenchers.

The galleries of both the House and the Senate were packed with family members and celebrities, including former President Bill Clinton, actor Richard Gere and singers Tony Bennett and Carole King, who came to watch the ceremonies.

In the Senate, Republicans and Democrats started their day with a private meeting in the old Senate chamber, where they talked about the need to work together if they hoped to accomplish anything.

"I think it's important to remember that some of the most significant achievements over the last 25 years have been during periods of divided government," said Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the new Republican leader, striking a hopeful note.

That's in part because of Senate rules, including one that requires members of both parties to join forces to pass legislation because they must meet a threshold of 60 votes for anything that is the least bit controversial.

DOJ_NMG_0112756

"The message wasn't just to the Democrats in the last election, it was to the Republicans as well," said Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the assistant majority leader. "People do want a change and the old way of doing things is just unacceptable. I think the Republicans understand that if they continue to play to a draw on issue after issue it won't help them in the future."

Still, Democrats won't have much leverage in the Senate. Their caucus numbers just 51, including an independent, and one Democrat, Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota, is still hospitalized following brain surgery.

Legislation will be far easier to pass in the House, where it takes just a simple majority to get anything done. On Friday, the House is expected to pass pay-as-you-go rules requiring Congress to finance all new spending initiatives in an effort to rein in the budget deficit and the growing national debt.

Much of Thursday's events involved ceremony, but many lawmakers seemed overcome by the significance of electing the nation's first woman as speaker of the House, describing it as a new chapter in American history.

Young children in their finest clothes swarmed around their parents and grandparents on the House floor. Pelosi, in particular, sat with her six grandchildren—including an infant grandson—as her colleagues cast their votes for speaker.

To her right sat Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the new Democratic Caucus chairman, along with his son and two daughters. As he nominated Pelosi for speaker, he described himself as a father of three young children, then turned to give Pelosi a high five.

Even Boehner, the Republican leader, seemed caught up in the history-making moment.

"Today marks an occasion I think the Founding Fathers would view approvingly," said Boehner, just before handing Pelosi the gavel. "My fellow Americans: whether you're a Republican, a Democrat, or an independent, this is a cause for celebration."

For Pelosi, the day was for introducing herself to the nation. That she did, describing herself as the daughter of a Baltimore mayor, the devoutly Catholic offspring of Italian Americans, and the proud mother of five.

Still, Pelosi used the opportunity to stake out the Democrats' approach to policy, not just to celebrate her victory.

"Nowhere were the American people more clear about the need for a new direction than in Iraq," she told the House. "The American people rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end. "Shortly, President Bush will address the nation on the subject of Iraq. It is the responsibility of the president to articulate a new plan for Iraq that makes it clear to the Iraqis that they must defend their own streets and their own security, a plan that promotes stability in the region, and that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces."

Despite those pointed and partisan comments, Pelosi reminded lawmakers about the late President Gerald Ford, who served in the House at a time when Republicans and Democrats worked together.

"He healed the country when it needed healing," she said, urging members to work together. "This is another time, another war, and another trial of our American will, imagination, and spirit. Let us honor his memory, not just in eulogy, but in dialogue and trust across the aisle."

jzuckman@tribune.com

Speaker Pelosi's Ethics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

Ethics in politics is not the same as ethics in real life. Ethics in politics is a martial art. The biggest mistake you can make is thinking that the ethics package proposed by new Speaker Nancy Pelosi is mainly about "cleaning up" politics. Maybe. But it's first of all about cleaning the clocks of the Republicans.

The House Republicans got lazy. Jack Abramoff, Tom DeLay, earmarks, Duke Cunningham, Bob Ney. When Nancy Pelosi saw the Republicans had developed a compulsion to flagrantly throw their weight around, she grabbed them by the lapels of their Hickey Freeman suits, hoisted them into the air and slammed them onto the House floor, shrieking "the most corrupt Congress in history!" That's right. In history.

Ms. Pelosi started the long road to earning a black belt in political ethics (again, not to be confused with ethics as taught at, say, Aquinas College) back in 1987 by studying the Master -- Newt Gingrich. That was the year Nancy Pelosi entered the House as a California freshperson. And that was the year Newt Gingrich turned ethics into a weapon against the imperious Democratic House Speaker Jim Wright, who left in disgrace two years later. "We currently have the least ethical speaker in the 20th Century," said Grandmaster Gingrich. Nancy noticed.

Aficionados of the sport of political ethics will recall another name from that era, Fernand St Germain, then the Democratic chairman of the House Banking Committee at the time of the infamous Savings and Loan crisis of the 1980s, arguably the greatest source of congressional ethical lapses in, well, history. Enough of the ethical backwash from the S&L mess soiled Democrats that when Bill Clinton won the presidency in 1992, his party actually lost nine seats in the House. After the midterm elections two years later, Newt Gingrich was speaker of the House, with a 54-seat swing from Democrats to Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0112757

You think Nancy Pelosi didn't remember all that when one year ago this week Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty? Meet the first Madam Speaker -- in history.

Exploiting this gain, Speaker Pelosi is breaking a champagne victory bottle over the hull of a new set of House ethics rules. If you stare at these rules awhile, eventually you notice that they are less about the members of Congress than about someone else. They are about the bad people who lead the innocent lambs of Congress astray. They are about "lobbyists" and "private interests" and, not least, "corporate jets," which for the modern member of Congress appear to be the rough equivalent of demon rum.

Let us quickly note for the historical record that ever has it been congressional practice to deflect ethics elsewhere. The famous 1978 Ethics in Government Act, passed after Watergate and a Democratic Congress's war with Richard Nixon over spending power, was also aimed at bad people elsewhere, to wit, the executive branch. After Ronald Reagan took office in 1981, a parade of Independent Counsels authorized by the Ethics Act tortured a long series of executive branch officials, with piling on by shocked, shocked committees of Congress. Ray Donovan, Ed Meese, Ted Olson. All were entrapped by the ethics mores Congress wrote into the law.

The set of ethics rules proposed yesterday by Speaker Pelosi should be called the Condé Nast Traveler Ban. One can never underestimate the willingness of the political class to put a whole career at risk for one chance to fly over to play golf on St. Andrews or fly free with the significant other to investigate trade practices at Machu Picchu. Silly as it sounds, Ms. Pelosi, of sophisticated San Francisco, is probably doing the rubes a favor by weaning them off their addiction to free travel and goodie bags.

Her proposed earmark reform scuffles closer to the heart of the real problem. Earmarks, formerly known as pork, are spending items for a discrete interest which a member inserts into a broader spending bill. They aren't illegal, and in a democracy probably shouldn't be. As with campaign contributions, it doesn't matter to me who gives how much to whom, so long as the particulars are posted in public. Now, presumably, that will be the case with earmarks.

The Democrats successfully made earmarking for "corporate interests" the poster boys for a GOP "culture of corruption," but the fact is that the divisions of Beltway lobbyists seeking earmarks also represent cities, universities, state governments and government contractors. What caused this wretched excess? Our hallowed government.

Except for wars, federal spending as a percentage of GDP -- from 1792 until after World War II -- held below 10%. Then from about 1953 onward, it rose steadily to 20% of GDP. The spending itself runs to nearly $3 trillion dollars. These large numbers -- a veil for uncounted agencies, regulatory bureaucracies and federal rules -- represent what conservatives sometimes call Leviathan.

Liberals tend to think that conservatives "hate" government. That's not quite it. Smaller government is -- was -- a conservative principle for a reason relevant to Speaker Pelosi's ethics quest. The idea is to reduce, not eliminate, the switch-points of potential public corruption. If the parsons of the Beltway had wanted to avoid this ethics problem, they would have resisted helping the U.S. government become so crucially important -- for example, FCC rules -- to every nook and cranny of American life. Too late now.

Back in the late '80s during the days of the Keating Five -- one of the scandals that fell out of the S&L fiasco -- former Sen. William Proxmire said of the implicated senators: "These fellas did what senators have been doing for a long time. There's nothing illegal about it. It's just wrong." This is what Ms. Pelosi's rules are aimed at -- sleaze, the painted ladies of public corruption.

When Jack Abramoff was wheeling the system for Indian casinos, his right-hand henchman, Michael Scanlon, a former congressional aide to Tom DeLay, squealed in email ecstasy to a colleague, "Wheez gonna be rich!" Well, yeah, that's gross, but it's the same aspiration with which many Washingtonians drift off to sleep each night now against the warmth of their $2.8 trillion Leviathan. What's a piddling $90,000 bucks in the office freezer?

Nancy Pelosi, who believes big government is gloriously good, put the "most corrupt" GOP on its fat fanny. She has made congressional ethics the first act of her historic speakership. What else is there to say? Good luck, Madam Speaker.

Republicans Take Back-to-Basics Tack (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

On a day when House Democrats celebrated their first taste of power in a dozen years, Republicans eschewed news conferences and raucous receptions yesterday and instead quietly conferred among themselves and observed the traditional Opening Day rites with their families and friends.

DOJ_NMG_0112758

But GOP leaders signaled that they won't quietly fade into the background, and they pledged to promote innovative policies and stay true to conservative ideals -- a path that they hope will lead to victory in 2008. Although they will challenge Democrats on a broad range of domestic and foreign policy issues, they say they won't resort to guerrilla-style tactics or harsh rhetoric.

"We plan to engage in a rigorous, substantive, policy-oriented debate on the issues facing this country," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam (Fla.), the GOP conference chairman. "We will certainly work together when we can, and have respectful disagreements when we can't."

Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) declared, "If we legislate and act like Republicans, we will remind the American people that they voted for a conservative government," noting that at least 60 House Democrats won election this fall in districts that backed President Bush in 2004.

Democrats swept to power in November, winning a majority of 233 to 202 seats in the House and a narrow 51 to 49 seats in the Senate.

Republicans struggled earlier this week to adjust to their new minority status, which is unknown territory for newer GOP House members. In a series of interviews, senior Republicans, particularly in the House, warned Democrats against acting unilaterally in passing their agenda -- a leadership style that the GOP itself used for many years.

In the Senate, Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) and other Republicans vowed to work closely with the new Democratic leadership, beginning with ethics and lobbying reform and an increase in the minimum wage. One of the first bills introduced in the Senate was offered by Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) along with the committee's ranking Republican, Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, to repeal the alternative minimum tax.

Republicans had a mixed legislative record in the past several years and suffered from a series of high-profile corruption scandals that demolished a once-powerful House leadership team, including former majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.). The Republican-controlled Senate also proved to be a black hole for most substantive bills.

The new minority leadership appeared to acknowledge its shortcomings. "I stake my party to a pledge: When faced with an urgent issue, we will act; when faced with a problem, we will seek solutions, not mere political advantage," McConnell said in a floor speech.

For the most part, Republicans spoke of how they could work together with the new majority. House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) struck a congenial tone before handing over the gavel to Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"Whether you are a Democrat or Republican or independent, today is a cause for celebration," Boehner said.

Several Republicans said they hoped the two parties could agree on fiscal issues. Democrats are talking about restoring discipline to government spending, and Bush outlined a plan Wednesday to balance the budget in five years.

"That's an opportunity for bipartisanship," Putnam said.

Republicans who are concerned that the party has veered from its ideological roots after years in the majority say the GOP needs to focus on the conservative ideas that helped it win power more than a decade ago.

"We were elected to the majority with ideas, and we'll come back to the majority with ideas," said Rep. John Linder (Ga.), a close ally of former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and the onetime chairman of the House GOP campaign arm.

But rather than focusing on hot-button issues such as abortion, same-sex marriage and gun rights, most GOP lawmakers said they could win back voters' confidence by espousing fiscal discipline.

"We're going to return to our roots, especially on economic policy, taxes and spending," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan (Wis.). "The era of big-government spending is at an end in the Republican Party."

Although congressional Republicans have deferred to Bush on a host of domestic and foreign policy issues since he took office in 2001, last year's electoral losses may encourage some GOP lawmakers to challenge the president during his last two years in office. Most Republicans marched in lockstep in supporting the president's war policies in Iraq, but with polls showing that the majority of Americans consider the war a big mistake, more Republicans may begin to break ranks.

"There's still some resentment among members at the fact our losses would have been a lot less if they had gotten rid of [Donald H.] Rumsfeld sooner," said Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), referring to the former defense secretary. "The president has to do some serious work with members of the House on the Republican side. People are going to be more independent now. In the past, they had to be part of the team."

In one sign of how Republicans are working to differentiate themselves from the White House, Rep. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.) -- who narrowly won reelection in November -- plans to deliver a major speech on Iraq today .

"I'm from the old school of national security that believes partisan politics ends at the water's edge," said Wilson, a member of the House intelligence committee. "Some of us who are neither cheerleaders nor bomb throwers need to step up on this one."

Staff writer Shailagh Murray contributed to this report.

Bush Practices A Reach Across The Aisle (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A few years ago when President Bush announced plans to dump nuclear waste in Sen. Harry Reid's state, it was a political insult so stinging that the Nevada Democrat responded by calling the nation's commander in chief a "liar."

Now, Reid, the new Senate majority leader, is getting the red carpet treatment. The administration treated Reid to two military plane rides in one week. He was invited to an intimate White House party where Bush politely asked what books he was reading lately.

The contrast is a measure of how deeply ingrained habits of partisan vitriol are being tested -- and may be starting to break down -- as control of Congress changes hands. After Republicans' resounding defeat in the fall elections, Bush and his lieutenants are now paying attention to Democratic power brokers they had all but ignored for years.

The new speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, got a Christmas Day phone call from Bush at home in San Francisco. New committee chairmen are enjoying quality face-time with Cabinet bigwigs. Even potential White House allies from the Democrats' conservative wing had been ignored for the past six years, but they now are being ushered into the Oval Office.Those gestures and other bows to bipartisanship are signs that the swearing in of the new Congress is not just a fresh start for Democrats; it is the end of an era for Bush, who has had the luxury of governing for most of the last six years with his own party in charge of Congress.

Now Bush will have to burnish rusty skills at working across the political aisle. And he is facing partners in government who view him with deep suspicion and have relationships with the White House that range from frigid to nonexistent.

"We hope that when the president says compromise, it means more than 'do it my way,' which is what he's meant in the past," Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., a member of the Democratic leadership, said Wednesday after Bush made a Rose Garden statement calling for an effort to find "common ground."

Bipartisan agreement will surely be hard to find on some of the most difficult issues facing the nation, such as proposals to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq, to shore up the finances of Social Security or to balance the federal budget.

But on other, narrower issues, such as overhauling immigration law and cracking down on pork barrel spending, Bush and Democrats in Congress may be able to make common cause.

"It is in the interests of both to try to cut deals where they can -- Bush because he wants to add some accomplishments to his legacy and Democrats because they don't want to be branded obstructionists in the run-up to 2008," said Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas at Austin.

The White House has been trying to reach out to more Democrats. According to spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore, Bush has hosted at least 10 post-election meetings and receptions for members of Congress, most of them Democrats.

"You'll see even more outreach in the future," she said.

Bush likes to point to his success in dealing with a Democratic-controlled state legislature while he was Texas governor. A key to that success was his alliance with Democratic Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock. But unlike the current lineup of Democratic leaders in Congress, Bullock was a very conservative Democrat who had a close personal relationship with Bush.

Reid is certainly no Bullock. The blunt former boxer didn't stop at calling Bush a liar over his 2002 nuclear waste decision. A few years later, while Bush was abroad, Reid called him a "loser." He apologized to Bush for that comment but never retreated from calling him a liar.

The morning after Democrats won control of Congress, Reid said, he was skeptical when Bush called with congratulations and an offer to work together.

"Mr. President," Reid later said he told Bush, "this is what we talked about two years ago, and we haven't been able to accomplish anything."

Bush seemed to allude to Reid's sharp tongue after meeting with him a few days later. Telling reporters that he and Reid have a lot in common as Westerners, Bush said, "We tend to speak the same language, pretty plain-spoken people, which should bode well for our relationship."

Reid's tone was different recently when he traveled to South America with a congressional delegation. Meeting with leaders of Bolivia and Ecuador who had been fierce critics of Bush, Reid defended the president's policies, according to Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

The White House arranged for Reid and his delegation to fly to and from South America on a military plane. That was not as unusual as the second flight the administration arranged -- for Reid and Assistant Senate Majority Leader Richard J. Durbin, D-Ill., to return from former President Ford's funeral in Michigan by military plane. If Reid and Durbin had taken a commercial flight, they probably would have missed a White House reception Bush hosted for new congressional leaders and their spouses Wednesday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0112760

Durbin, a liberal Democrat, has an affable relationship with Bush. They have an annual tradition of wisecracking with each other as they enter the House chamber together for the State of the Union address, Durbin spokesman Joe Shoemaker said. But at a recent meeting at the White House, sparks flew when Bush compared himself to Harry S Truman and Durbin pointedly took issue with the parallel.

Pelosi and Bush have many hatchets to bury, because they traded personal barbs during the 2006 campaign. Pelosi called Bush "incompetent" and "oblivious." Bush sniped at her claim to "love" tax cuts.

"Given her record, she must be a secret admirer," he said in October.

But after the election, Bush insisted that as political pros he and Pelosi would forgive and forget.

"If you hold grudges in this line of work, you're never going to get anything done," he said.

They share an interest in Darfur, where both Bush and Pelosi have called for an end to genocide. Pelosi briefed Bush when she returned from a trip to the Sudan last March -- but that was the last time she saw him until after Democrats won control of the House, Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said."When she was minority leader, he didn't fully engage her," said a Pelosi associate, who asked not to be named when discussing personal dynamics between the two leaders. "Now he's much more engaged."

Bush has also wooed conservative Democrats known as "Blue Dogs," who might be more willing than liberals to cross party lines. When he invited a small group of them to a December meeting in the Oval Office, Rep. Mike Ross, D-Ark., said he was encouraged by the attention. But he said he told Bush, "Mr. President, I regret it took six years to invite us over for this meeting. I hope it's the first meeting, not the last."

Some lawmakers argue that Bush's best ambassadors to Democrats may be his Cabinet officers. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has been making the rounds among Capitol Hill committee leaders, including House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel Jr. of New York. The two recently had a long lunch at the Treasury to discuss common concerns.

Rangel is also hoping to improve relations between the parties on his committee, which was bitterly split in recent years under the chairmanship of Bill Thomas, R-Calif., who just retired from Congress. Rangel had an hourlong meeting with the new ranking Republican on the committee, Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., of the sort he said he never had with Thomas.

"I never had a conversation with Bill Thomas except at funerals," said Rangel. He added that it may be easier for Congress to craft compromises without a heavy hand from the president. "The best thing the president can do for us is to leave us alone," he said.

Democrats To 'issue Toughest Ethics Reform' (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

The Democratic party took full control of America's legislative branch on Thursday for the first time since 1994, promising to clean up US politics by introducing the "toughest ethics reform in [America's] history".

Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker of the House of Representatives and the first woman to hold that job, and Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, both said that tackling the congressional "culture of corruption" would be their chief priority during the next few days.

The proposals, which are aimed at weakening the notorious links between lawmakers and so-called "K Street" lobbyists that have ballooned in recent years, include a ban on accepting gifts or air tickets from lobby groups and forcing lawmakers to declare their names when they insert in legislation "earmarks" that are sponsored by special interest groups.

According to one widely cited poll, concern over corruption came second only to worry about the war in Iraq among voters at mid-term elections last November. The Democrats also plan to reintroduce the "pay-go" system of budgeting that would compel Congress to fund any tax cut or spending increase with offsetting measures.

"The American people told us that they expect us to work together for fiscal responsibility with the highest ethical standards and civility," Ms Pelosi told the new house, shortly after she was sworn in on Thursday.

"Let us join together in the first 100 [legislative] hours to make this Congress the most open and honest in history."

The two leaders also promised to extend the kind of bipartisan courtesies that they claim Republicans denied them during their 12 years in opposition.

Many commentators have labelled the outgoing Congress as one of the most bitter and divisive in history.

However, Republicans claimed Ms Pelosi had already breached that pledge by announcing she would short-circuit the committee process to push her party's six key electoral promises straight to a vote on the floor of the house within the next two weeks.

These include raising the minimum wage by $2.10 to $7.25 – the first increase since 1997 – and a bill to promote federal funding of stem cell research. They also plan to abolish recent tax breaks and subsidies for oil companies.

DOJ_NMG_0112761

"If you look at the rules changes the Democratic leadership are proposing, they are mostly very positive and long overdue," said Scott Lilly at the Centre for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "But it is hard to understand why the leadership is by-passing normal procedures to push through its "100-hour" promises."

Both Democratic leaders also issued thinly veiled warnings to George W. Bush, US president, to desist from announcing a "surge" in the level of US forces in Iraq.

Mr Bush is expected to announce his "new way forward in Iraq" next week.

Ms Pelosi, whose party commands a 31-seat majority in the 435-strong house, called for a plan "that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces" out of Iraq.

Mr Reid, whose party holds a precariously narrow 51-49 seat majority in the Senate, said: "The president's new plan must ensure the Iraqis take responsibility for their own future, and it must remove our troops from a dangerous civil war.

"Completing the mission in Iraq is the president's job, and we will do everything in our power to ensure he fulfils it."

Senate Feels Heat As House Cranks Up Ethics Overhaul (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Unexpectedly broad ethics rule changes that the House passed Thursday are putting new pressure on the Senate.

The House rules leave what lobbyists say are ample loopholes for those seeking to buy access to lawmakers, mainly through campaign fund-raising. But leaders of the new Democratic majority in the Senate said Thursday that they were reintroducing a much less extensive package of changes passed last year as the starting place for an intraparty debate next week over how much further the Senate should go.

Saying they were responding to voter backlash against Congressional corruption that helped them take control, House Democrats went beyond some of the ethics proposals on which they had campaigned.

The new House rules bar members from taking gifts, meals or trips paid for by lobbyists, or the organizations that employ them. The rules also ban lawmakers from using corporate jets and reimbursing the owners. A further proposal would also eliminate major loopholes from earlier drafts, in requirements for lawmakers to disclose sponsorship of pet spending projects, or earmarks, and tax breaks they hide in complex legislation.

The House Democrats said that in March they would take up the creation of an independent ethics watchdog to police their own conduct, something lawmakers in both chambers had steadfastly resisted.

In contrast, the initial Senate ethics bill would ban only gifts or meals and not trips paid for by lobbyists or their employers. It would not restrict the use of corporate jets. It would require disclosure of the sponsors of only a small fraction of spending earmarks, excluding those added to supplementary material, called Congressional reports, that explain legislative intent or that are directed through federal agencies like the Defense Department. Nor does the Senate bill propose any independent enforcement.

Some senior Democratic aides said the House rules had upped the ante for the Senate.

"They will be embarrassed" if they do not do more, said James A. Thurber, a professor of government at American University in Washington and an expert on Congressional ethics rules who has acted as a consultant to several lawmakers. "When we look at the election, it is a hot issue, so there will be a lot of focus on it in people's minds, and the heat will be on in the Senate."

Announcing his intention to reintroduce the Senate bill that passed last year, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, promissed to "improve that legislation and make additional reforms."

Senior aides in both parties said Mr. Reid was negotiating with Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, to try to work out a bipartisan package of changes. Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said the House actions had no bearing on what the Senate would do.

An overhaul is likely to face strong opposition from veteran senators who resent ethics rules as unnecessary, and helped bring back other changes. But aides to the Senate Rules Committee said they were preparing to match the House ban on meals, gifts and trips paid for by lobbyists or any organization that employs them.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who is chairwoman of the Rules Committee, has said she intends to close some of the loopholes in the current bill's earmark disclosure requirements. And despite personal doubts, she has also agreed to hold hearings on creating an independent enforcement watchdog.

Other Democrats, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, planned to push for a far more drastic overhaul.

DOJ_NMG_0112762

The Feingold-Obama plan would make lawmakers reimburse corporations for use of their jets at the cost of a charter flight instead of the price of a first-class ticket — a step that stops short of the House rules. The bill would also create an independent watchdog as the House Democrats have discussed. And it would prohibit lobbyists or the organizations that employ them from holding lavish events for lawmakers at party conventions.

The Feingold-Obama bill would also require lobbyists to disclose any earmarks they are seeking for their clients, and require lobbyists to disclose any collecting and passing on of campaign contributions — a practice known as "bundling" that currently makes K Street the heart of campaign fund-raising for most lawmakers. Senator Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota, said she and many other newly elected Democrats were working with Mr. Obama, Mr. Feingold and Mr. Reid to pushing for stronger changes, in part because they felt the resonance of the issue on the campaign trail.

"The House bill raises the bar," Ms. Klobuchar said, "but a number of senators have already been talking about their own efforts to strengthen the Senate bill."

Lobbyists, meanwhile, groused that the rules passed in the House would have the unintended consequence of encouraging them to do more fund-raising for House members. The new rules bar lobbyists from treating lawmakers to meals or trips. But the lobbyists can still raise money for lawmakers' campaigns and also join lawmakers at fund-raising events or on overnight trips paid for with those campaign funds. Lobbyists said people seeking access to lawmakers may now have even more incentive to attend fund-raisers because they can no longer simply buy dinner or lunch.

Lawrence W. Noble, a Washington lawyer specializing in political rules, said lobbyists could well feel obliged to attend more fund-raisers. "We still have a system of private financing of campaigns," Mr. Noble said.

Democrats Take Control On Hill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) was elected America's first female speaker of the House yesterday in a raucous, bipartisan celebration of a historic breakthrough, and hours later she presided over passage of the broadest ethics and lobbying revision since the Watergate era.

Democrats took control of the House and Senate after 12 years of nearly unbroken Republican rule, with resolute calls for bipartisan comity and a pledge to move quickly on an agenda of health-care, homeland security, education and energy proposals. Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the soft-spoken son of a hard-rock miner, took the helm of the Senate, after a closed-door session in the Capitol's stately Old Senate Chamber. But with the eyes of history riveted on her, it was Pelosi's day.

"This is an historic moment, for Congress, and for the women of this country. It is a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years," Pelosi proclaimed, to a roaring ovation in the packed House chamber. "For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling. To our daughters and our granddaughters, the sky is the limit."

For Pelosi, yesterday's election was not only the culmination of a long climb by women through the ranks of Congress but also the personal triumph of a hard-nosed partisan, a grandmother of six who methodically plotted the Democrats' return to power after more than a decade in the minority. A House floor where Democrats had been marginalized to the point of irrelevance in recent years was alive with handshakes, smiles, hugs and boisterous children on the Democratic side of the aisle. Republicans, once so confident in what many saw as a permanent majority, sat glumly watching the festivities.

As Pelosi entered the chamber before her formal, party-line election, the House erupted in bipartisan applause. Only Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Tex.), the outgoing chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, remained seated in stony silence. Pelosi's predecessor as speaker, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), sat quietly and unobtrusively in the rear of the chamber, except for one brief moment of recognition.

When House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) rose to present the gavel to the new speaker, he was magnanimous in acknowledging both the roots of Republican defeat last November and the historic import of the moment.

"In a few moments, I'll have the high privilege of handing the gavel of the House of Representatives to a woman for the first time in American history," he told his fellow lawmakers. "Whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, this is a cause for celebration."

He concluded with a warning for Democrats, gleaned from his party's pursuit of power and the lessons learned from defeat: "If there is one lesson that stands out from our party's time in the majority, it is this: A congressional majority is simply a means to an end. The value of a majority lies not in the chance to wield great power but in the chance to do great things."

In what must be another first, the gavel changed hands with a hug and a kiss.

In the Senate chamber, members lined up in groups of four to take their oaths with Vice President Cheney. Former senators, including Democrats John Breaux (La.), Charles S. Robb (Va.) and Jean Carnahan (Mo.), circulated on the floor to offer congratulations. Outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), now retired from the Senate, joked with Sen. Barack Obama

DOJ_NMG_0112763

(Ill.) as the Democratic presidential prospect worked his way through the crowd. Family members crowded the surrounding corridors, including former president Bill Clinton. Democratic Sen. Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.) shouted "Praise Jesus!" during the opening prayer.

The Senate will plunge into its own ethics and lobbying overhaul package next week and then take up legislation to boost the federal minimum wage for the first time in a decade. But it was clear yesterday that the Senate would have no choice but to take a more deliberative approach to the issues the House plans to bulldoze through. Senate leaders pledged bipartisanship, and in a chamber divided 51 to 49 , they will have no choice.

"Now, I know that you're not accustomed, members of the press, to people getting along, working together," Reid told reporters after the closed-door Senate meeting in the morning. "But Senator McConnell and I believe this is a new day in Washington."

Reid nodded to his GOP counterpart, Sen. Mitch McConnell (Ky.). "I think Harry's got it right," McConnell said.

The Senate margin is even more tenuous because Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is sidelined after emergency brain surgery.

Republican leaders decided not to seek special language spelling out the terms of a transition in case of a power shift -- say, if Johnson vacates his post and his state's GOP governor appoints a Republican to replace him. Under that scenario, power would effectively shift to Republicans, because Vice President Cheney would provide the tiebreaking 51st vote. But for Republicans to take parliamentary control, the Senate would have to vote for new organizational rules, a move Democrats could filibuster.

A similar scenario unfolded in January 2001, when a 50-50 Senate convened. In 2001, Democrats demanded a "kick-out clause" in organizing negotiations that would automatically scrap agreements on committee ratios and funding levels and force new organizational rules. But Republicans decided this month against a confrontation that would come from demanding a similar clause.

"Nobody over here talked about that at all," said Don Stewart, spokesman for McConnell.

In the House, Democrats did not skip a beat between formally taking control and getting to work on what they have called their hundred-hours agenda. Last night, the House nearly unanimously approved a broad package of internal rules changes designed to sever the cozy links that have developed between lawmakers and lobbyists.

The changes would prohibit House members or employees from knowingly accepting gifts or travel from a registered lobbyist, foreign agent or lobbyist's client. Lawmakers could no longer fly on corporate jets. In addition, congressional travel financed by outside groups would have to be approved in advance by the House ethics committee and immediately disclosed to the public.

The measures were approved 430 to 1, with only Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) voting against it. This was a remarkable change considering that House Republicans could barely pass a far weaker measure last May and ultimately did not enact any measure because they could not reach agreement with the Senate. But voters in November identified corruption as one of their primary concerns, and the House responded yesterday.

"It's amazing what an election will do," said Rep. James P. McGovern (D-Mass.).

Today, Democrats hope to pass new rules to promote open deliberations in the House, rein in special-interest spending and lawmaker pet projects, and prohibit passage of spending or tax measures that increase the federal deficit.

Over the next two weeks, Democrats in the House plan to enact new homeland security measures, increase the minimum wage, allow federally funded stem cell research, permit the federal government to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, cut student-loan interest rates and fund alternative-energy research by rolling back tax breaks for oil companies.

But Pelosi herself acknowledged that her carefully constructed consensus agenda will not satisfy the angry electorate that swept the Democrats to power. Democrats will have to confront President Bush on the larger, more controversial issues of the day: the war in Iraq, military tribunals that suspend the legal rights of terrorism suspects, and warrantless wiretapping by the National Security Agency.

Her call yesterday for a new direction in Iraq "that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces" elicited strong applause in her party while clearly splitting Republicans, many of whom joined the ovation.

Reid also saw Iraq as the issue of the day and a possible impediment to Democratic plans.

"Iraq is where it is," Reid said. He added: "We're not going to divert our attention from what needs to be accomplished for this country. There are a lot of things that need to be accomplished. And we're going to work on those, in spite of Iraq."

To make it clear that such issues will have to be addressed, Reps. Adam B. Schiff (D-Calif.) and Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) reintroduced legislation on the new Congress's first day to mandate that NSA surveillance once again involve a warrant from a secret federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0112764

"There's a long list where Congress has been abdicating their responsibility, and I suspect the leadership and the chairs will have to quickly get to work," Schiff said.

Democrats are already having trouble reconciling their promises even for the initial hundred-hour blitz. Senior House Democratic aides said a promise to cut student-loan interest rates in half will have to be phased in over five years to comply with a pledge to offset any additional deficit spending with equal spending cuts or tax hikes. The loan pledge is proving just too expensive, and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and the committee's senior Republican, Charles E. Grassley (Iowa) introduced legislation yesterday to immediately repeal the alternative minimum tax, a proposal that would cost the Treasury hundreds of billions of dollars.

Pelosi Sets Aggressive Pace (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As the new, Democratic-controlled Congress convened, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi moved quickly to tighten her chamber's ethics and budget rules, putting pressure on the Senate to do the same.

Ms. Pelosi struck quickly on the ethics front rather than risk the kind of delays that undermined former Speaker Dennis Hastert's bid to tighten lobbying rules a year ago. The California Democrat's aggressive approach establishes what will be an important dynamic between the House and Senate in the opening weeks. On issues from raising the minimum wage to curbing oil subsidies, Democrats know they can't make law without the Senate, but they will use the House to lay down markers on initiatives they see appealing to independents and Republican moderates. 1

The ethics question is especially time sensitive, given the damage Republicans suffered in November for appearing too close to business lobbyists and the low public standing Congress continues to suffer. By using the rules process to make immediate changes, Ms. Pelosi is assured that her party can show progress in the House, whatever happens in the Senate. As a matter of practical politics, any diminishment of the business lobby, which did so much to help the Republican House majority, could make it easier for her party to challenge oil and drug companies, among others.

"This new Congress doesn't have two years or 200 days to renew itself," Ms. Pelosi said after her election as speaker.

Fred Wertheimer, a longstanding advocate of tougher ethics restrictions, said, "The House has laid down the gauntlet to the Senate to pass ethics-rules reforms at least as strong as the House reforms."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

2

House Minority leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) addresses Congress3 before Nancy Pelosi takes the gavel as the country's first female Speaker of the House.

WSJ senior special writer John Harwood discusses the agenda of the 110th Congress4, and notes that, despite recent bipartisan gestures, some thorny issues lay ahead.

Loopholes are sure to remain, but the proposed changes are seen as a major step toward drawing a brighter line between lobbyists and lawmakers. Meals, gifts and travel facilitated by lobbyists would be largely banned, and House members would be prohibited from using even their own funds or campaign donations to pay for below-cost travel on corporate jets -- a favorite perk offered by business lobbyists. Currently, lawmakers must reimburse a jet's owners only at the rate of a first-class ticket.

Labor unions, with fewer planes to offer, have long resented this practice not because of the lower reimbursement but because company executives often accompany lawmakers on such flights and thereby gain valuable access.

As part of the same package, Democrats propose to tighten anti-deficit rules and require greater disclosure of narrow legislative amendments designed to benefit special interests and generate campaign funds from lobbyists. The sheer number of these so-called earmarks exploded under Republican rule. The House Democratic package goes beyond past Republican proposals by demanding greater transparency for spending provisions as well as for tariff exemptions and "rifle-shot" tax breaks, which benefit one interest group.

The new rules would broaden the definition of a spending earmark to include funds for contracts awarded by federal agencies. While the restrictions would apply only to the House, the language will bind House negotiators in future talks on even those earmarks generated by the Senate.

There are sure to be tensions when the Senate turns to the subject next week. New Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) is a frequent user of corporate jets, while the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W.Va.) is famous for his pork-barrel appetite.

Senate Democrats appear reluctant to be as bold as their House counterparts by trying to change rules unilaterally. Instead, the plan is to move with a hybrid package of rules and legislative changes. This strategy is driven ostensibly by Democratic fears of a filibuster, requiring a two-thirds majority to overcome in the case of a rules change.

DOJ_NMG_0112765

Critics counter that the filibuster threat is exaggerated, given the popular support for some of the rule changes; the big question is whether the House action will put pressure on senators to move faster.

Republicans had the same House-Senate tensions, which often paralyzed the party in its final years in the majority. Flush with victory, Democrats are nowhere near such a divide. Yesterday, House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.) and Mr. Byrd announced plans to better align their committees in hopes of approving budget bills on time and preventing disruptions of government operations. The State Department budget now will be considered in both chambers as part of the foreign-aid bill; the Treasury Department and major regulators such as the Securities and Exchange Commission will be dealt with in their own bill.

As Ms. Pelosi is the first woman speaker, her opening day marked both a transition in power and historic moment for the House. "Whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, this is a cause for celebration," said Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio, turning over the gavel.

"This is the people's House...and most of the people don't care which party controls it; what they want is a government that is limited, honest, accountable and responsive to their needs," he said. "The moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

For Democrats, A Choice: Forward Or Reverse? (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Democrats realized their political and legislative dream Thursday. Now they must face reality.

As they take control of the House and Senate, members of the new majority must reconcile diverse ideological factions within their ranks and make a fundamental choice. They can spend their energy trying to reverse what they see as the flaws of the Bush administration and a dozen years in which conservative philosophy dominated Congress. Or they can accept the rightward tilt of that period and grudgingly concede that big tax cuts, deregulation, restrictions on abortion and other Republican-inspired changes are now a permanent part of the legislative framework.

The competing drives were on display amid the constitutional hoopla Thursday and the emotion surrounding Representative Nancy Pelosi's election as speaker, a position filled until now by the likes of Sam Rayburn, Joseph Cannon and Nicholas Longworth — men whose names adorn nearby House office buildings. "We have broken the marble ceiling," Mrs. Pelosi said after she was handed the gavel.

In a meeting with the Congressional Black Caucus earlier in the day, Mrs. Pelosi made her own allusions to the competing tugs on Democrats, noting the party was rooted in its traditions but not hostage to the past. She promised a new direction "for all the people, not just the privileged few," a reflection of the leadership's political and policy calculation that Democrats need to champion the average guy.

"The agenda we have is about restoring economic security to a very vulnerable middle class," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Caucus. "The real activity will be in those areas."

Yet many Democrats contend that President Bush and the Republican-led Congress that was his partner moved the dial too far to the right in many cases. And they believe it will be the work of Democrats to make a significant course correction.

"I think there are a lot of things the people of America want changed," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee and a tough critic of some Bush policies.

Mr. Leahy and others made clear that the new direction had to begin with American policy in Iraq.

But their domestic legislative agenda suggests that they are picking selected fights rather than going for wholesale change. On the economy, they will move swiftly to increase the minimum wage. On social policy, they will challenge Mr. Bush by calling for expanded stem cell research. They will try to pass legislation increasing college aid for the middle class. All of those issues have the twin advantages of broad popular appeal tied to measurable economic impact on individuals.

But Democrats are in no rush to engage in a fight with Mr. Bush over the ideological centerpiece of his domestic policy, his tax cuts. And they have showed no inclination to wade back into the abortion issue, despite its potency among many of their supporters.

"We have to keep our eye on the average American family and sort of push aside the interest groups left, right and center," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "The world has changed, and it demands new solutions, not the old Democrat and Republican nostrums."

But there is no dispute that Mr. Bush's legislative and executive record will get a microscopic examination via a renewed emphasis on oversight, a Congressional function Democrats say was all but abandoned in recent years. And the results of those inquiries could determine what policies Democrats try to unravel if they uncover a strong case against them.

DOJ_NMG_0112766

“The Bush administration has passed an entire architecture of laws that are going to be reviewed,” said Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, one of the most liberal members of the House.

Republicans are waiting to see what develops, uncertain if Democrats sincerely want to join hands and produce some consensus on public policy. Or, as one senior Republican asked, will Democrats hostile to the Bush administration be more like the scorpion in the fable with the frog, unable to resist the urge to sting even if they hurt themselves?

Democrats acknowledge that with their minuscule majority in the Senate and one in the House that is not much larger, they lack the political muscle to go too far in reversing Bush policy even if that was their chief goal. And they already have their hands full with delivering on their own ambitious legislative agenda, following through on their pledges of bipartisanship and ethics overhaul and avoiding anything that costs the party its chance at the White House in 2008.

Leading Democrats say their best direction is forward, concentrating on establishing a new party legacy rather than obsessing with the perceived failings of Republican rule. The test for the party’s newly empowered leadership and the Congressional membership will be whether they can stick to that path.

After The 100 Hours, A War Awaits (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

An unusual number of the people wandering through the tunnels that crisscross Capitol Hill on Wednesday had no earthly idea where they were going. "I think the Rayburn building is this way," one young woman announced to a colleague, as the two of them -- newly minted congressional staff members, I guessed -- strode away down a long corridor. I knew I'd run into them again, and soon, since actually they were just leaving the Rayburn building.

Wednesday was the last day of the "Where am I?" phase of the transition from Republican to Democratic rule on the Hill. Yesterday, with the swearing-in of new members of Congress, began the "Here we are, and now what?" phase, which means things are about to get interesting.

Much history already has been made, starting with the election of Nancy Pelosi as the first female speaker of the House. Rep. Jim Clyburn of South Carolina, an African American, will serve as majority whip. The first Muslim congressman, Rep. Keith Ellison of Minnesota, took his ceremonial oath of office with his hand on a Koran once owned by Thomas Jefferson. Powerful House committees such as Ways and Means, Judiciary, and Intelligence will be led by minorities.

The Senate still looks like an exclusive country club that grudgingly decided to let in a few women and the occasional black guy, but the House looks a lot more like the complicated, diverse country its members are supposed to represent.

With all due respect to the chamber that calls itself the "world's greatest deliberative body," I wouldn't expect much initiative from the new Senate -- the Democrats' one-vote majority isn't enough to get much of anything done, especially with several senators moonlighting as presidential hopefuls. The action is in the House. And that's where the "interesting" part comes in. Pelosi's plan for a blitzkrieg of legislation in the first 100 hours of the new Congress is fine -- most Americans are in favor of a higher minimum wage, expanded stem-cell research, wider availability of student loans and fewer lobbyist-paid golfing trips to Scotland for our elected representatives. Pelosi could toss in a couple of bills supporting motherhood and apple pie while she's at it.

That's not to belittle the Democratic agenda, as far as it goes. But it tiptoes around the big, ugly monster of an issue sitting in the middle of the room -- the war in Iraq. The new Congress is going to have to stop temporizing and stand up to George W. Bush on the war.

"It's time to set aside politics and focus on the future," the president said Wednesday, dusting off the familiar call for bipartisanship that always comes from the losing side in an election. In the current context, it's really a threat to paint congressional pushback on Iraq as electoral gamesmanship. But the nation has made abundantly clear what it thinks of this tragic war. Challenging the president on Iraq isn't partisan politics, it's the new Democratic majority's patriotic and constitutional duty.

So far, we've heard promises that the new Congress will exercise vigorous oversight -- which Congress should have been doing all along. I can understand that Pelosi and her counterpart on the Senate side, Majority Leader Harry Reid, wouldn't want to start by making the ultimate threat: using the power of the purse to cut off funding for the war. But sooner or later, there's going to have to be a confrontation.

Not once has Bush given the slightest indication that he intends any significant change of course in Iraq. Quite the contrary: The expectation in Washington is that soon he will announce an escalation of the war -- increasing troop levels but calling the increase a "surge" and giving the impression that it's a short-term measure. Don't be fooled by the focus-group word "surge," because a two- or three-month increase in troop levels makes no military sense. If and when the president sends more troops to Iraq, they will not soon come home.

DOJ_NMG_0112767

Given that the Democratic Party's fortunes keep rising as Bush sinks deeper into the Iraq quagmire, political expediency might tempt the new leadership in Congress to let the president have his way and reap the rewards in 2008. But that would be wrong. Democrats can't give speeches saying that sending more troops to Iraq without a viable mission is nothing more than a futile sacrifice of young American lives -- and then limit their dispute with Bush to whether he gets to send 3,000 more troops or 30,000.

Very soon, perhaps inconveniently soon, Democrats are going to have to take a stand.

Tax Cuts And The Minimum Wage (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

As the minimum wage moves to the top of the new Congress's agenda, some politicians — mainly President Bush and Senate Republicans — seem incapable of viewing the issue as anything other than a pretext for more tax cuts. This time the lucky recipients would be small-business owners, who the politicians contend will be unduly harmed by having to pay higher wages. So much for ringing in the new.

It has been more than nine years since the government last increased the federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour. During that period inflation has severely eroded the wage's value. Arguing that it is only fair to cut taxes on business owners when the minimum wage goes up is akin to arguing that taxes should have been raised as the wage fell because of inflation. Instead, as the minimum wage has eroded over the past decade, taxes have been cut sharply.

It's even doubtful that the wage increase under discussion — a $2.10 increase over roughly two years, to $7.25 — would impair business. Eighty-six percent of small-business owners surveyed by the Wells Fargo/Gallup Small Business Index said the minimum wage had no effect on their businesses.

There's also no reason to believe that the proposed tax cuts would be aimed at employers of low-wage workers. In 2006, when Congress tried to link the minimum wage to tax cuts, the proposals included an estate-tax cut for America's wealthiest families. One proposal now being considered would allow small businesses to write off a larger part of their attorney fees when they go to court to challenge federal regulations. It sounds like a stretch to us that typical employers of minimum-wage workers — say, restaurants and small factories — are in any great need of relief from the high cost of federal litigation.

And then there's the probability that tax cuts would cost the government far more than a wage increase would ever cost employers, driving up the budget deficit. The Economic Policy Institute analyzed the tax cuts that were linked to an unsuccessful attempt to raise the minimum wage in 2000. Those cuts would have cost $123 billion over 10 years, versus $11.2 billion for the wage increase.

It's that sort of idiocy the new Congress was elected to stop. Chances are good the House of Representatives will eschew tax cuts and pass a clean bill to raise the minimum wage. The Senate should follow suit. And President Bush should sign it.

House Warming (WP)

By David Montgomery And J. Freedom Du Lac

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Despite the promised "new direction for America," getting the money out of politics and all of that, some facts of Washington life appear immutable and eternal.

"One hundred hours to make this the most honest and open Congress in history," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi declared at the beginning of a history-making day -- which ended last night with the Democrat from California presiding over a glitzy fundraiser open to anyone with $1,000 for a ticket.

A few folks in the block-long line of partygoers waiting to get into the National Building Museum -- social activists, feminists, union organizers, fat-cat liberals, Hollywood allies and not a few serious Deadheads -- did sense the cognitive dissonance. They promptly dismissed it in a tidal wave of idealism about the future under the nation's first female speaker of the House.

They had waited a long time for this night to party, nibble on goat cheese ravioli with pumpkin and truffle, wipe their lips with paper napkins embossed in gold with "Speaker Pelosi January 4, 2007," listen to former members of the Grateful Dead sing "Truckin' " and Tony Bennett sing "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

"Democrats are back!" Pelosi said in her remarks during the few minutes reporters were permitted inside. "We are ready to lead, prepared to govern and determined to make you proud."

(A dozen years ago, it must be recalled, Newt Gingrich and the Republicans celebrated their return to power with a $1,000-a-plate dinner. Reporters were allowed in.)

Organizers expected 1,000 to 1,500 guests, with checks to be made out to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Many complimentary tickets were given out, and DCCC spokeswoman Jen Psaki could not immediately say how much money was raised. She said fundraisers are usually closed to the news media, but arrangements were made to allow reporters to hear Pelosi's remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0112768

Outside in the line to get in, their faces illuminated by cellphones and BlackBerrys, people had high hopes.

"I am personally such an admirer of Nancy," said Susan Levine, vice president of a private equity firm in Boston. "I'm a working mom; she raised five children before she went into politics. What she said today about breaking the marble ceiling, I feel like I'm trying to do that every day."

"We're feminists and we're celebrating!" exclaimed Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation, and Martha Burk, money editor of Ms. Magazine, almost in unison.

"The marble ceiling is certainly not broken, but it's nicely cracked," Burk added.

A long column of leaders and organizers from several labor unions walked from nearby headquarters.

"We're celebrating a change in this country," said Larry Cohen, president of the Communication Workers of America, adding that Americans want a "commitment to economic justice" and are "fed up with their voices not being heard."

But how do those ideals jibe with a fancy affair too pricey for most working families?

"I think it's a good question, actually," Cohen said. "I do think getting the money out and getting the people in is what this is about for us."

Ahead in line, Arthur Fullerton, director of development for Covenant House California, pronounced it "a historic night. . . . I think the voices of everyone in the country get to be heard, not just the privileged few."

Like the few with $1,000 to drop?

"That's true," Fullerton said. But he got comped. "You do have folks like me who get invited."

Actor Joe Pantoliano was on the sidewalk marveling about how "stunning" it would be for his mother to have known an Italian American woman was becoming speaker. And actress Heather Thomas disclosed, "I'm 49, I'm not ashamed to say, so I never had those [female political] role models as a child. If you don't have that in your consciousness, you don't know you can do it."

Phil Angelides was in line, looking pleased, despite his recent loss to Arnold Schwarzenegger in the California governor's race.

And there came musician Wyclef Jean, one of the evening's entertainers, with a special composition in store. "I'm writing a freestyle rap on my BlackBerry," he said, whipping out the device to show his notes. Later, during his performance of "Hot Hot Hot," Pelosi would be inspired to dance, and the musician stepped into the velvet-roped area to dance with her.

The speaker, with a grandchild on her lap, also sang along to Carole King's performance of "(You Make Me Feel Like) A Natural Woman."

It didn't hurt turnout that the congresswoman from San Francisco invited members of one of her city's most famous rock bands to headline the affair.

"I am here to witness history in the making, the first woman speaker of the House, and to see members of the Grateful Dead perform," said Jersey City Councilman Steve Lipski.

Which was more important?

"I'll let readers be the judge," said Lipski, who also could recall the date of his first Dead show, 35 years ago.

Scott Orellana, 30, an insurance claims processor from Rockville, dressed in a gray suit with his long hair neatly pulled back, was walking up and down the line holding a cardboard sign that said, "I need a miracle," and holding up one finger -- universal parking-lot Dead code for seeking a ticket.

On the other side, his sign said, "Let me see Nancy Pelosi and the DCCC." "I'm excited about the new Congress. I'm excited about Nancy Pelosi being the first woman speaker of the House," Orellana said. "If I had $1,000 I'd definitely give a contribution, but I don't have $1,000."

At the last minute, just as the party was about to begin, a wired Democrat and fellow Dead fan -- who sheepishly would only be identified as a political consultant -- slipped Orellana a ticket.

The Deadhead got his miracle -- and maybe so have the Democrats gotten theirs.

Women Bask In New Speaker's Shining Moment (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

This was the visual they had dreamed about for years, for decades, for a lifetime. A woman standing on the wooden dais before the high-backed leather chair of the speaker of the House, the gavel in her hand, the American flag draped behind her.

And when Nancy Pelosi made American history yesterday and was formally elected speaker, the raucous cheers that rang through the House chamber came from young girls in Mary Janes, working women in business suits, elderly ladies carrying canes and more than a few men. For hours after the formal swearing-in, the ascension of Pelosi was the topic throughout the corridors of the Capitol. Several women said they looked forward to the State of the Union address later this month because Pelosi would be in the speaker's chair and a woman would share the television screen with the president.

DOJ_NMG_0112769

"For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling," Pelosi told cheering members of the House and their families who crowded into the chamber as the Democratic leader was formally elected speaker of the 110th Congress. "For our daughters and granddaughters today, the sky is the limit."

The day marked the Democrats' return to control of Congress after 12 years as the minority, and the celebrations started early and stretched late. Brunch plates clinked in the Library of Congress, party equipment rental trucks lined Constitution Avenue and bowls of shrimp and platters of finger sandwiches appeared in Capitol offices.

It felt like an inauguration and a homecoming, both at once.

"This is a woman's version of the presidential inaugural," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic consultant who ran Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000.

The historic aspect of the moment seemed to transcend party.

"For more than 200 years, the leaders of our government have been democratically elected. And from their ranks, our elected leaders have always selected a man for the responsibility and honor of serving as speaker of the House. Always, that is, until today," said Rep. John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican who was majority leader in the last Congress and who handed the gavel to Pelosi. "Whether you're a Republican, Democrat or independent, today is a cause for celebration."

Rep. Michael McCaul, a Texas Republican starting a second term, brought his son and four daughters to the floor for Pelosi's election and his oath of office. It didn't matter that the woman of the hour was a Democrat, he said. "It's a good role model for all women, and my daughters can see that they can get to the highest levels of government," McCaul said. The girls, ages 5 to 10 and dressed in identical black velvet and tartan dresses, displayed varying levels of understanding. "It's cool," said Caroline, 10.

Roz Wyman, the doyenne of California Democratic circles and a major backer of Pelosi, said it was hard to describe the importance of the day. "I don't think a lot of people grasp it," said Wyman, who watched the swearing-in from the visitor's gallery and had helped throw a women's tea for Pelosi on Wednesday that featured hundreds of female politicians, donors and activists. " I never thought I would see this day. . . . She's not George Washington, but she is at that seat and she got there because she had a lot of friends who cared, a great organization and she went out and worked for it."

It took nearly two hours for the members to elect Pelosi on a 232-202 party-line vote. They stood one by one, many delivering brief remarks along with their votes. "Just as the biblical Esther was called to save the nation, I cast my vote for another woman called for such times as these," said Rep. Bobby Rush, the Chicago Democrat and former Black Panther. Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.) announced her vote for Pelosi was "for the future of all of our grandchildren and for world peace."

Pelosi sat in the center right section of the House, surrounded by her grandchildren and holding the youngest, 6-week-old Paul Michael, in a white blanket in her arms. She hugged and squeezed any other children who came within range and stood up to kiss a steady stream of well-wishers, including Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.), former Colorado representative Pat Schroeder and former transportation secretary Norman Mineta.

While the Democrats on the House floor were busy shaking hands, rubbing backs and congratulating each other, the Republican members largely sat quietly. Boehner left the chamber for long periods and Rep. J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), the outgoing speaker, stood at the back of the chamber against a railing, hands in his pockets.

The visitor galleries above the House floor were laden with Democratic supporters, donors, lobbyists, women's rights activists and Californians. Sitting among the Pelosi family were several celebrities, including singers Carole King and Tony Bennett and actor Richard Gere, who also appeared at a Democratic fundraiser last night honoring Pelosi at the National Building Museum.

The accessory of the day seemed to be a baby or, if not available, a toddler. Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) carried her 2-year-old granddaughter, Rigby, who was sleeping. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York, one of the new House Democrats, toted her 2-year-old son, Theodore.

"This was a long road and we're finally here," said DeLauro, a Pelosi ally. "The barriers are gone."

The role model herself stood on the dais to swear in the entire House amid a clutch of children, including several of her own grandchildren. She was calm enough to let one of the younger girls hold the newest grandbaby, and she was focused enough to do her work amid their antics, a talent she perfected years ago as a mother of five and grass-roots political activist.

Congress Reopens Under New Management (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Fredreka Schouten, Usa Today

USA Today, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112770

WASHINGTON — In a new twist on an old tradition, the new speaker of the House kissed the minority leader as he handed her the gavel.

Congress convened Thursday for the 110th time in the nation's history, but for the first time with a woman heading one of the chambers, and with Democrats in control of both the House and Senate for the first time in 12 years.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California took the speaker's gavel in what she called "a historic moment for the women of America." Republicans, some members of the Senate and a few former lawmakers joined in the thunderous applause.

"Whether you are a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, today is a cause for celebration," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Among the revelry: Supporters wearing denim and cowboy hats hoisted beers in honor of new Sen. Jon Tester, a farmer and Democrat who defeated incumbent Conrad Burns in Montana. Celebrities including former president Bill Clinton and actor Richard Gere were on hand at the Capitol to see it all.

IN-DEPTH: Ethics in aims | Pelosi leads wave of women | Video | Muslim makes history

The 33 new or re-elected senators who took their oaths included seven women, bringing the total number of women in Congress' upper chamber to a record 16. There are a record 74 women in the House, including three non-voting delegates. Clinton watched as his wife, Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton, was sworn in for her second term as New York's junior senator.

In other developments:

·Vern Buchanan, a freshman Republican from Florida, took his seat despite lawsuits filed to overturn his election by his Democratic opponent, Christine Jennings. Jennings narrowly lost a race in which 18,000 votes were lost because of voting machine errors. Pelosi said the House would allow the trial to proceed and decide whether to let Jennings take Buchanan's place later.

·Senate Democrats convened with their majority narrowed because of the absence of Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., who remains hospitalized after suffering bleeding in his brain last month. Sean Grady, chief of the University of Pennsylvania medical department, told USA TODAY that the latest medical reports on Johnson are "good news" but added it will likely be months before doctors can determine the extent of Johnson's recovery.

Bipartisanship was the watchword. "Be nice," Boehner told members, but bickering surfaced quickly. House Republicans protested Democrats' refusal to allow them to offer alternatives and amendments to an ethics package poised to win House approval today.

"The much-ballyhooed commitment to minority rights is virtually non-existent," said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif.

House Democrats promised Republicans opportunities to amend bills, but now say that won't happen until the House approves six measures that the Democrats promised during the fall campaign to enact in the first 100 legislative hours. That time period is likely to stretch until late this month.

"We view the first 100 hours as essentially a mandate from the American people," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

In addition to the ethics package, which bans travel and gifts paid for by lobbyists, the Democratic bills would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, promote expanded research using embryonic stem cells, rescind tax breaks for the oil industry and cut interest rates on student loans. Other measures would enact recommendations from the 9/11 Commission and allow the government to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices.

The Senate won't act as fast. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., plan to introduce an ethics bill next week.

Pelosi called the Democratic ethics package, formed as a response to recent scandals involving influence-buying by lobbyists, "the toughest ethics reform in history."

The legislation, however, didn't discourage lobbyists from turning out for the round of parties that ushered in the new term. Among them: a $1,000-a-ticket fundraiser for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee that featured Tony Bennett and members of the Grateful Dead.

Rick Carter, a lobbyist for PG&E Corp., a California-based energy company, was navigating a three-page list of receptions. "It's time to set agendas and strategies and see what we can get accomplished," he said.

Joyful Democrats Salute Speaker Pelosi (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

House Democrats unanimously picked Nancy Pelosi yesterday to be their leader and the first female speaker of the House in U.S. history.

DOJ_NMG_0112771

"For our daughters and our granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling," Mrs. Pelosi told a cheering House chamber yesterday, moments after accepting the speaker's gavel. "For our daughters and our granddaughters now, the sky is the limit."

Democrats dedicated their votes to famous feminists, children everywhere and even world peace.

"In the name of Jesus," Rep. Jesse L. Jackson Jr. of Illinois said as he cast his vote for Mrs. Pelosi.

Rep. Jose E. Serrano of New York cast his vote for her in Spanish.

Even Rep. Gene Taylor, the conservative Democrat who had cast a protest vote against Mrs. Pelosi in past leadership elections, dutifully voted for her yesterday. With his vote, Mrs. Pelosi -- whose voting record is considerably more liberal than many fellow Democrats -- got her first unanimous leadership election

So, when Mr. Taylor cast his vote for her, Democrats jumped to their feet in thunderous applause, catching the fair-haired Mississippian a little off guard.

Rep. Maxine Waters of California cast her vote in honor of feminist icons Bella Abzug and Gloria Steinem.

Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, hailed Mrs. Pelosi -- the daughter of former Baltimore Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro -- as "Maryland's favorite daughter, California's pride."

Wearing a burgundy suit, pearls and a broad grin, Mrs. Pelosi sat at her seat waving thanks to those who voted for her. Surrounding her were her young grandchildren in various stages of behavior during the two-hour affair. Sitting in the balcony with the rest of her family was crooner Tony Bennett, who was to serenade her at a celebration concert later in the evening.

After the 233-202 vote was tallied and announced, Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said it was a "high privilege" to hand the gavel to the first female speaker in more than 200 years.

And though the federal government has expanded far beyond the hopes and expectations of the Founding Fathers, he said, they would view the selection "approvingly."

"My fellow Americans, whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, today is a cause for celebration," Mr. Boehner said.

When Mrs. Pelosi assumed the gavel, she promised "partnership, not partisanship," and paid tribute to the troops and former President Gerald R. Ford, who died the day after Christmas.

She also paid tribute to St. Francis of Assisi, the namesake of her hometown of San Francisco who robbed from his wealthy cloth-merchant father to give to the poor.

When Mrs. Pelosi called for a change of course in Iraq, there was jubilant applause from Democrats, while Republicans remained seated and virtually silent.

And she promised -- much as Republicans did when they took power 12 years ago -- to restore fiscal discipline.

"After years of historic deficits, this 110th Congress will commit itself to a higher standard: Pay as you go, no new deficit spending," she said. "Our new America will provide unlimited opportunity for future generations, not burden them with mountains of debt."

Hours later, her caucus unanimously approved a package of new rules that allows Democratic leaders to waive the requirement that three-fifths support be required to raise federal taxes.

"It didn't take long for House Democrats to reveal their true intentions," said Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, Georgia Republican. "They've been in power for a matter of hours, and they immediately signal their plans to raise income taxes on American families. I hope Georgia voters will take a look at who voted against this effort to prevent tax increases."

Sitting quietly at the back of the chamber was outgoing Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, who at one point was recognized for his service. He slowly rose, gave a wide wave and dug his hands deep into his pants pockets to wait for the hearty, bipartisan applause to die down.

During the ceremony, Mr. Boehner also lingered for a moment on the 12 years of Republican rule that ended yesterday.

"There were some great achievements during those 12 years that followed," he said. "There were also some profound disappointments."

Then he offered a brief but sober analysis of Republican failures that caused their downfall. Most Americans, he said, don't care who controls Congress.

"What they want is a government that is limited, honest, accountable and responsive to their needs," he said. "And the moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

Forgive The Cynicism, But This Is Change? (WP)

By Greg Craig

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112772

Forgive the cynicism, Mr. President, but if you were serious about cooperating and consulting with the new Congress, you wouldn't be parading your bipartisan bona fides through the op-ed pages of the Wall Street Journal. You wouldn't be holding news conferences in the Rose Garden telling the world how ready, willing and able you are -- we know you are not eager -- to work with the Democratic Congress. You would instead be meeting privately with Democratic leaders, identifying specific areas where progress can be made and joining with them to come up with a legislative agenda that is truly bipartisan.

To many of us, your post-November conversion to bipartisanship appears to be nothing but spin -- at least so far. You misunderestimate our capacity to remember the way you treated the Democrats when your party ran Congress. We will not soon forget your "my way or the highway" approach. You will forgive us if we pay more attention to what you do than to what you say.

Forgive the early criticism, Speaker Pelosi, but if you were serious about introducing and fostering a new atmosphere of bipartisanship in Washington, you might have waited a decent interval before shoving legislation down the throats of the minority party. You might have been more willing to give Republicans warning about what they would be voting on, and you might even have been willing to consult with them about the substance of those bills. Much of the country agreed with the Democrats' criticism of the highhanded way the Republicans ran the House, and much of the country voted for Democratic candidates in the hope that Democrats would make the legislative process fair and transparent.

Your plan to force members to vote with no opportunity to offer amendments is inconsistent with what Democrats said they would do and what American voters hoped they would do. This is a blindness that will come back to haunt you.

Forgive the gratuitous commentary about presidential politics, but couldn't the candidates do away with exploratory committees and reinstate the old-fashioned announcement? Couldn't they wait a while longer before taking the plunge? It is only five days into 2007, and 2008 seems to be upon us already -- at least in the eyes of the potential candidates. When someone leaks a secret memo showing that private citizen Giuliani is worried about possible scandal in his personal history, and when former Massachusetts governor Romney changes his position on same-sex unions so dramatically, you don't have to be a weathervane to know which way the wind is blowing. And if Sen. Clinton were truly unhappy about being forced to make an early decision on whether to be a serious senator or a serious presidential candidate, she'd take the easy way out of her dilemma: She could just tell the world that she won't make a decision until June or July -- and then live with it. No wringing of hands or whining required.

Forgive the cold water on an otherwise impressive event, candidate Edwards, but why couldn't you have simply announced your candidacy? Your announcement from New Orleans looked like a partisan gimmick, taking advantage of human misery to take a shot at the Republicans. Your genuine concern about the problem of poverty in America is well known. Shouldn't that issue be used to unite Americans, not to divide them?

Forgive me for being hard-boiled, but from my perspective inside the Beltway, it looks like 2007 is business as usual.

In New Senate, The 'Candy Desk' Gets A Kiss-Off (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats back in control of Congress for the first time in years, much is changing in the nation's capital, including a longtime tradition in the U.S. Senate: the "candy desk."

For a decade until his defeat last year, Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican, stocked the desk with donations from home-state candy makers including Hershey Co. and Just Born Inc., maker of Hot Tamales and Peanut Chews.

With Mr. Santorum gone, the desk, which is dipped into by many members, has been turned over to Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican from Wyoming. But his state is better known for bison than bonbons -- and that's a big problem.

Ethics rules forbid members accepting gifts worth $100 or more a year from a single source. One exception covers items produced in a senator's home state -- so long as they're used primarily by people other than the senator or his staff. The provision was crafted to allow senators to offer visitors home-grown snacks, such as Florida orange juice or Georgia peanuts.

In Wyoming, some small outfits sell esoteric sweets, such as chocolates designed to look like moose droppings. But the state doesn't have any big, brand-name candy makers who could step into the breach. As a result, the candy-industry lobbying group, which coordinates stocking the desk, is cutting off the sweets, citing Wyoming's candy deficit and ethics rules.

"We're happy to provide candy if there are [association] members" in the home state of the senator who sits at the candy desk, says Susan Smith, a spokesman for the National Confectioners Association. "It would be difficult for us to do now."

Good Spirit

Hershey, of Hershey, Pa., is taking the kiss-off in good spirit. "We were pleased to be a small part of sweetening up congressional proceedings," says Kirk Saville, a company spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0112773

As it happens, relying on Pennsylvania wasn't an option. Mr. Santorum's successor, Bob Casey, is a Democrat, and the candy desk has by tradition always been located on the Republican side of the Senate chamber, in a heavily trafficked area near the exit to the elevators. The state's other senator, Arlen Specter, a Republican, already has a choice seat toward the front.

Before Mr. Thomas was tapped to take possession, the sweet-tooth crowd erroneously speculated that Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker, the only new Republican senator, would end up with the desk. That might have worked out fine since Tennessee is home to Brach's Confections Inc., which also has operations in Texas, as well as the Standard Candy Co., which makes GooGoo Clusters.

The Senate takes its furniture seriously. It is still using the 48 desks built in 1819 by a New York cabinetmaker to replace those burned by the British during the War of 1812. As new states joined the union, and the Senate grew, new desks of similar design were built. At the beginning of each Congress, desks are reapportioned among Republicans and Democrats and then senators get their choice, based on seniority.

The candy desk -- a tradition, not a rule -- dates to 1968, according to the Senate Historical Office. That's when Sen. George Murphy, the former actor and film executive, began sharing treats from the back row.

He left in 1971, and those who inherited the desk continued his largess. At times, senators asked for specific candy. Others left a few dollars to keep the desk stocked. Over time, the practice became more institutionalized, says Betty K. Koed, assistant historian in the Senate Historical Office. Eventually, the National Confectioners Association, along with the Chocolate Manufacturers Association, began to organize donations.

Because of its location in the back, the seat is generally occupied by junior senators. But Mr. Santorum made a point of keeping the desk even as he rose in seniority to highlight his state's prowess. Pennsylvania companies sent about 100 pounds of candy to Mr. Santorum's office each quarter, says Robert Traynham, the ex-senator's former spokesman. That's equivalent to about 38,000 Hershey's kisses a year.

Continuing the Tradition

Mr. Thomas, who came to Washington in 1989 to take Dick Cheney's seat in the House and was elected to the Senate five years later, vows to continue the tradition -- somehow. "The candy desk has been my favorite for a while," he says. He admits to regularly dipping into Mr. Santorum's stash.

The senator's spokesman, Cameron Hardy, says his boss requested the seat because "he likes the idea of sharing with his colleagues." Yet Mr. Hardy concedes that Mr. Thomas and his staff initially weren't familiar with how the candy desk worked. "I don't think anyone realized it was a big undertaking," he says, or that candy companies played a role in supplying the goodies.

One option is to turn to mom-and-pop shops in Wyoming that make, or re-package, sweets with a frontier flair. Bessie Zeller has a family business, Queen Bee Gardens, in Lovell, Wyo., which produces caramel-like candies from honey. She already sends about 24 pounds of candy, worth about $185, every couple of months to members of the state's congressional delegation. She gets some payment for the goodies. "I don't think we can afford to donate it all," she says.

Mary Ann Kuschel of Cheyenne sells mostly re-packaged candy, such as "moose doodles" (chocolate covered almonds "shaped just like moose droppings") and "bison balls" (round Rice Krispies treats dipped in chocolate, sold in packages of two.) She says her home-based business is ill-equipped to make big donations to the U.S. Senate. "I don't think so," she says. "Not for free."

Senate ethics rules may give Mr. Thomas some wiggle room, allowing him to seek contributions from senators whose states are more richly endowed, something he says he is contemplating. Robert Kelner, who heads the election and political law practice at Covington & Burling LLP, says a candy company could "in theory" send less than $100 worth of candy to each senator over the course of the year and not violate gift limits.

Says Mr. Hardy, the senator's spokesman: "I'm sure we'll get through it somehow."

Miers Resigns As White House Counsel (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 5, 2007

Harriet Miers, President Bush's failed Supreme Court nominee and longtime adviser, on Thursday submitted her resignation as White House counsel.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the president reluctantly accepted her resignation, which takes effect Jan. 31. He said a search for a successor is under way.

Bush nominated Miers in October 2005 to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, but she dropped out under fire from conservatives who questioned her qualifications and would not support her.

Asked why she was leaving, Snow said: "Basically, she has been here six years."

DOJ_NMG_0112774

He said Miers, 61, a loyal adviser to the president for years, has been having conversations with White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten about leaving for some time and both agreed that it was time for a change at the White House office of legal counsel.

At the White House, Miers is known as a diligent adviser, one of the first to arrive and one of the last to leave.

"Harriet is one of the most beloved people here at the White House," Snow said, adding that she was a scrupulous lawyer who aggressively defended the Constitution.

"As somebody said earlier today, 'She put 12 years of service into six years,'" Snow said.

Snow said Miers' departure did not signal the beginning of an exodus of senior officials after six bruising years at the White House. Asked if other officials were poised to go, Snow said, "I'm aware of none and anticipate none."

As White House counsel, Miers works behind-the-scenes overseeing a team of attorneys who provide legal advice to Bush on matters large and small. But when Bush picked her to fill an opening at the Supreme Court, she became a household name, albeit briefly. Her background and every word were scrutinized. Television cameras rolled as she walked up Capitol Hill to meet with lawmakers charged with confirming her as a justice.

She dropped out under fire from conservatives who criticized her for having thin credentials on constitutional law and no proven record as a judicial conservative. That forced Bush to scramble for a new Supreme Court nominee who could calm a conservative rebellion and walk sure-footedly through a Senate confirmation hearing. He turned to Samuel Alito, a federal appeals court judge from New Jersey, who was ultimately confirmed.

Ironically, one of Miers' tasks as counsel was to vet potential nominees for openings on the federal bench — and the Supreme Court.

"Participating in the process to help identify the best nominees for the American people has been among the most rewarding of my experiences," Miers wrote Bush in a resignation letter dated Thursday. "Your commitment to nominating judges who will interpret the law and who know the proper role of a judge has made this nation stronger and our justice system fairer."

Miers, who grew up in Dallas and received her undergraduate and law degrees from Southern Methodist University, was the first woman hired by her law firm, in 1972; first woman president of the Dallas Bar Association, in 1985; first woman president of the Texas bar, in 1992; and first woman president of her law firm, in 1996.

The soft-spoken Miers has described herself as a "Texan through and through." White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove said she can be "tough as nails." Bush once called her "a pit bull in size 6 shoes."

She clerked for a federal judge there and then joined Locke Purnell Rain Harrell, rising to become its first female president. After the firm merged with another, she was co-managing partner of the 400-lawyer Locke Liddell & Sapp.

She was Bush's personal lawyer in Texas, took on the thankless job of cleaning up the Texas Lottery when he was governor, and followed him to Washington to serve as staff secretary until Bush appointed her White House counsel, succeeding Alberto Gonzales when he was named attorney general.

Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up For Battle (WP)

By Peter Baker And R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

President Bush accepted the resignation of White House counsel Harriet Miers yesterday as he remakes his legal team to prepare for what aides expect to be a sustained struggle with a new Democratic Congress eager to investigate various aspects of his administration.

Miers, a longtime Bush loyalist whose nomination to the Supreme Court was withdrawn in 2005 as a result of conservative opposition, led an office that will oversee legal clashes that could erupt if Democrats aggressively use their new subpoena power. Bush advisers inside and outside the White House concluded that she is not equipped for such a battle and that the president needs someone who can strongly defend his prerogatives.

The White House did not announce a replacement but has settled on someone to take on the assignment, according to several advisers who did not disclose the name. Four other lawyers have been hired as associate counsels in recent weeks to fill vacancies, and White House officials have discussed expanding the office, which -- with a dozen lawyers -- is far smaller than it was under President Bill Clinton, who faced legal battles on multiple fronts.

The effort to form a new legal team anticipates a spate of congressional demands for information on politically sensitive topics such as whether officials authorized the abuse of U.S. detainees, whether the administration turned a blind eye to profiteering by politically connected contractors in the Iraq war, how the White House responded to Hurricane Katrina, and whether senior officials complied with the law in ordering heightened domestic surveillance.

At the Justice Department, lawyers in the Office of Legal Counsel have been meeting with counterparts from other agencies to discuss potential points of conflict with Congress and to map out legal strategies for responding to demands for documents and testimony, according to several officials. The department has also held internal meetings on this topic in recent weeks with representatives from the FBI and from Justice's other major components, one official said.

DOJ_NMG_0112775

"They face the question of, to what extent you cooperate or protect presidential prerogatives and withhold documents," said H. Christopher Bartolomucci, a former Bush White House lawyer. "Potentially, it could be a period of conflict with the Hill. . . . It's not necessarily going to be a bloodbath, but it's certainly possible."

Republican advisers have been telling the White House to be ready for war, and many cited Miers as the wrong general. "The White House knew they needed to get a tough street fighter -- that's what this is about," said one such adviser, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to preserve access to the White House.

The advice, according to this person, could be summed up this way: "You guys better lawyer up, and lawyer up in the right way. You better understand the need and the peril and the urgency. . . . You need somebody as tough as [Clinton aides] Harold Ickes or Bruce Lindsey. Because they're coming for you."

Miers, Bush's personal lawyer in Texas, is popular in the West Wing and is admired for her hard work, loyalty and character. But since taking over last spring, White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten had privately expressed doubt that Miers, 61, was right for the job, current and former officials said.

When news reports at the time suggested that she might leave as part of Bolten's initial shakeup, Miers talked to Bush and kept her job, the sources said. After Democrats captured Congress in November, the issue was revisited and some Republicans were told before Thanksgiving that someone else would be brought in.

Miers had told colleagues that she planned to stay until the end of the administration, but after several conversations with Bolten in the past week, she agreed it was time to move on. "We're entering a new era here in the White House, and they both came to that conclusion," a senior administration official said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow praised Miers as "an extraordinarily wonderful human being" and a "ferocious defender of the Constitution" who is leaving because she has been in the White House for six years. In a letter to Bush released by the White House, Miers offered expansive praise for the president while never explaining her departure: "It is hard to leave the tasks at hand. They are gravely important, and I shall miss greatly the arena in which the battles of our times are being fought."

The White House plans to replace her with a lawyer from the outside. Speculation focused on former solicitor general Theodore B. Olson, but he said he had no intention of taking the job. "I'm not going to be replacing Harriet Miers," Olson said yesterday.

Sources said the White House hired a fourth new associate counsel just this week, Michael Scudder, a former federal prosecutor in New York who had been working at the Justice Department on national security issues.

The administration's decision to prepare for battle comes despite an effort by congressional Democrats to discourage public talk of an imminent clash. Mindful of their one-vote margin of control in the Senate and keen to retain the House and capture the presidency in 2008, Democrats say they are anxious to avoid appearing shrill or excessively partisan.

"I'm going to work on the assumption that there won't be a problem in getting information," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee. "There has been [resistance] in the past, but we were in the minority. Now, if the committee requests information, [it] will be acting on behalf of the committee and they have a responsibility to respond. I'm not looking for a confrontation."

Talk of accommodation is undercut, however, by the fact that both parties have firm opposing positions on whether Congress has the right to peer closely into executive-branch deliberations and documents, especially on national security. Led by Vice President Cheney, the administration has long backed a legal theory that the Constitution gives the president considerably more authority than Congress and the judiciary.

In keeping with that view, the Justice Department on Dec. 22 spurned a request by then-incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) for a memo signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to create secret detention facilities overseas. It also rejected Leahy's request for a Justice Department memo detailing the interrogation methods the CIA could use. A letter to Leahy signed by acting Assistant Attorney General James H. Clinger explained that "we are not able to disclose" operational details of the CIA program and said that the interrogation memo constituted "confidential legal advice."

Leahy expressed disappointment on Tuesday that the administration had "squandered another opportunity to work cooperatively with Congress." But Leahy did not say what he would do next, other than promising that his committee "will continue its efforts to obtain the information that it needs" for oversight.

Other Democrats said his cautious approach is in keeping with admonitions to incoming committee chairmen by Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to avoid immediate confrontation. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has issued similar warnings.

However, one sign that relations will be bumpy is a decision by House leaders to give Waxman's committee special authority to force administration officials to sit for depositions, a tool it last had under Republicans in the late 1990s. Waxman said he has not set a firm agenda but intends to focus on "waste, fraud and abuse," the government's response to Katrina, and actions taken by U.S. contractors in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112776

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) is also interested in contracting waste in Iraq and plans to investigate what officials knew about the abuse of detainees, aides said. He has announced plans to hire three new investigators to examine these and other matters.

Staff writers Al Kamen and Dan Eggen contributed to this report.

Miers Steps Down As White House Counsel (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Harriet E. Miers, President Bush's longtime confidante and onetime Supreme Court nominee, has resigned as White House counsel, officials said Thursday.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that Mr. Bush had accepted Ms. Miers's resignation "reluctantly" and that she had tendered it after deciding she was ready for a change after six years in the job. The White House said that a search for a successor was under way and that Ms. Miers would remain at her post through this month.

Mr. Snow said her departure was not the beginning of another round of changes in the West Wing.

"For those who are speculating about any others within the White House proper, I am aware of none and expect none," Mr. Snow said.

Still, her announced resignation came with Mr. Bush poised to name a new director of national intelligence, J. Michael McConnell, a retired Navy vice admiral and director of the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996, and move his current director, John D. Negroponte, to the State Department as its second in command.

Rumors of Ms. Miers's departure date back to the White House shake-up last spring, when Joshua B. Bolten became Mr. Bush's chief of staff and undertook a review of all personnel. Mr. Bolten was said at the time to have raised the possibility of moving Ms. Miers out of the counsel's office, though White House officials denied it.

Mr. Snow said her decision to resign did come after a series of meetings with Mr. Bolten.

"She's been here for six years," Mr. Snow said. "It's hard duty."

Ms. Miers has worked with Mr. Bush since his days as Texas governor and has grown close to him and the first lady, Laura Bush.

Ms. Miers started at the White House as staff secretary after the 2000 campaign and became a deputy chief of staff before moving to the White House counsel's office.

Mr. Bush's decision to nominate her to the Supreme Court in 2005 provoked the ire of liberals and conservatives, who criticized her as a Bush crony who did not have the legal intellectual credentials or résumé the job required. She withdrew her name from consideration but returned to Mr. Bush's inner circle and remained one of his closest advisers.

In her resignation letter, Ms. Miers said her own role in helping Mr. Bush choose nominees for the federal bench was "among the most rewarding of my experiences."

Hers is the latest in a series of departures from the White House by longtime advisers to Mr. Bush. It came just weeks after the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Also last year, the former White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, and Mr. Bush's first chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., both stepped down.

In an interview on Thursday, Mr. Card said Ms. Miers had held three of the most demanding jobs at the White House. "She was in tremendously grueling roles," he said. "None of those responsibilities are 8 to 6, they're 5 to 11, all night long."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Text hereWinning Parties in More Ways Than One

It was a big party for Nancy Pelosi at the stunning Kalorama home of Democratic fundraiser Esther Coopersmith Wednesday night -- it just didn't turn out to be a party with Nancy Pelosi.

The new speaker never managed to pry herself away from another dinner in her honor over at the Italian Embassy. But no matter: Everyone was all atwitter over the other newly ordained superstar who did stop by.

"Isn't it wonderful that Adrian Fenty was here!" gushed one doyenne.

The new mayor somehow made the scene all over town that night. First, the inaugural party for Ward 5 Council member Harry Thomas Jr. at Love nightclub in Northeast. Then a swearing-in reception for school board members at Sumner School downtown. Then the drop-by at Coopersmith's, a party hosted by California's congressional sister act Loretta and Linda Sanchez, and populated by some 250 people at its peak -- reps, diplomats and the Grateful Dead's Mickey Hart and Bob Weir (sporting a Jerry esque gray beard and having a meditative moment spinning an antique globe in the study). Fenty was caught up in the mingling throngs in the foyer but lingered for almost an hour, according to some guests. "In a room with legitimate rock stars, it added another rock star aura to the mix," noted Jim Dau, press secretary to Linda Sanchez.

DOJ_NMG_0112777

And then Fenty was off again, this time to Foggy Bottom to catch the GWU men's basketball victory over Fordham, where he was introduced on the Jumbotron. "The only time in recorded history that a politician was not booed at an athletic event," said his host, WTOP political commentator Mark Plotkin. "But it is his first day on the job."

Hardly an unusual night, said spokeswoman Carrie Brooks-- he kept that pace over two years of campaigning and had at least three such events scheduled last night. Red Bull? "He's a Vitamin Water guy."

Meanwhile, who could blame Pelosi for lingering at the seated dinner her folks hosted for supporters at the packed Italian Embassy, where the 500-some guests included Chris Dodd, Madeleine Albright, Barbara Boxer and Charlie R angel. On the menu -- lamb, vegetables and risotto. On the mike -- James Taylor and Tony Bennett, who sang, of course, "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."Raven Goodwin, a Girl Who Has Her Act Together

Another local kid makes good! Fourteen-year-old actress Raven Goodwin has landed her first regular TV gig on Nickelodeon's new teen comedy "Just Jordan," which premieres Sunday night. The show stars 16-year-old comedian Lil' JJ, with Goodwin playing his wisecracking cousin Tangie. "I'm sooo excited," she told us yesterday. "Tangie is very sassy."

Goodwin caught the acting bug when she was 4 and spent the next decade beefing up her rÃ©sumÃ© with commercials and movies (she got raves for her roles in high-profile indie flicks "Lovely & Amazing" and "The Station Agent") while going to school at Lyndon Hill Elementary School in Prince George's County. The family moved to Los Angeles two years ago, where she did TV ("All of Us," "Everybody Hates Chris," "Malcolm in the Middle") between home schooling.

She's already shot 13 episodes of the Nick series, and will see the premiere with family and friends at a viewing party Sunday night. "I can't wait to see how everything came out," she said. "They should get ready to laugh because the first episode is hilarious."HEY, ISN'T THAT . . .

Wednesday night's full moon brought all sorts of VIPs out on the town:

Â· Laura Bush, Condi Rice, Mary Matalin, Margaret Spellings and Harriet Miers at Cactus Cantina for a surprise birthday party for Karen Hughes. A dozen Bush administration power babes gathered at the Tex-Mex restaurant for fajitas, enchiladas, quesadillas, margaritas and chocolate cake with a "classified" number of candles. (Hughes turned 50 on Dec. 27.) No word on how many hot chilies Miers ate, but she announced her resignation yesterday morning. Hmmmm.

Â· Ne wt Gingrich at DC Coast. The former House speaker and his wife were joined by former Virginia governor Mark Warner. No word on who's running for what.

Â· Pat Leahy and a small group at the Tabard Inn welcoming Vermont's newly minted Rep. Peter Welch.

Â· Jean Kennedy Smith, son William and his family at Nathans, sitting under the David Kennerly photograph of Bobby Kennedy.

First, Do Less Harm (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

Universal health care, much as we need it, won't happen until there's a change of management in the White House. In the meantime, however, Congress can take an important step toward making our health care system less wasteful, by fixing the Medicare Middleman Multiplication Act of 2003.

Officially, of course, it was the Medicare Modernization Act. But as we learned during the debate over Social Security, in Bushspeak "modernize" is a synonym for "privatize." And one of the main features of the legislation was an effort to bring private-sector fragmentation and inefficiency to one of America's most important public programs.

The process actually started in the 1990s, when Medicare began allowing recipients to replace traditional Medicare — in which the government pays doctors and hospitals — with private managed-care plans, in which the government pays a fee to an H.M.O. The magic of the marketplace was supposed to cut Medicare's costs.

The plan backfired. H.M.O.'s received fees reflecting the medical costs of the average Medicare recipient, but to maximize profits they selectively enrolled only healthier seniors, leaving sicker, more expensive people in traditional Medicare. Once Medicare became aware of this cream-skimming and started adjusting payments to reflect beneficiaries' health, the H.M.O.'s began dropping out: their extra layer of bureaucracy meant that they had higher costs than traditional Medicare and couldn't compete on a financially fair basis.

DOJ_NMG_0112778

That should have been the end of the story. But for the Bush administration and its Congressional allies, privatization isn't a way to deliver better government services — it's an end in itself. So the 2003 legislation increased payments to Medicare-supported H.M.O.'s, which were renamed Medicare Advantage plans. These plans are now heavily subsidized.

According to the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, an independent federal body that advises Congress on Medicare issues, Medicare Advantage now costs 11 percent more per beneficiary than traditional Medicare. According to the Commonwealth Fund, which has a similar estimate of the excess cost, the subsidy to private H.M.O.'s cost Medicare $5.4 billion in 2005.

The inability of private middlemen to win a fair competition against traditional Medicare was embarrassing to those who sing the praises of privatization. Maybe that's why the Bush administration made sure that there is no competition at all in Part D, the drug program. There's no traditional Medicare version of Part D, in which the government pays drug costs directly. Instead, the elderly must get coverage from a private insurance company, which then receives a government subsidy.

As a result, Part D is highly confusing. It's also needlessly expensive, for two reasons: the insurance companies add an extra layer of bureaucracy, and they have limited ability to bargain with drug companies for lower prices (and Medicare is prohibited from bargaining on their behalf). One indicator of how much Medicare is overspending is the sharp rise in prices paid by millions of low-income seniors whose drug coverage has been switched from Medicaid, which doesn't rely on middlemen and does bargain over prices, to the new Medicare program.

The costs imposed on Medicare by gratuitous privatization are almost certainly higher than the cost of providing health insurance to the eight million children in the United States who lack coverage. But recent news analyses have suggested that Democrats may not be able to guarantee coverage to all children because this would conflict with their pledge to be fiscally responsible. Isn't it strange how fiscal responsibility is a big concern when Congress is trying to help children, but a nonissue when Congress is subsidizing drug and insurance companies?

What should Congress do? The new Democratic majority is poised to reduce drug prices by allowing — and, probably, requiring — Medicare to negotiate prices on behalf of the private drug plans. But it should go further, and force Medicare to offer direct drug coverage that competes on a financially fair basis with the private plans. And it should end the subsidy to Medicare Advantage, forcing H.M.O.'s to engage in fair competition with traditional Medicare.

Conservatives will fight fiercely against these moves. They say they believe in competition — but they're against competition that might show the public sector doing a better job than the private sector. Progressives should support these moves for the same reason. Ending the subsidies to middlemen, in addition to saving a lot of money, would point the way to broader health care reform.

Medicare Drug Plan's 2nd Year Less Bumpy (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 5, 2007

Patient advocates and pharmacists are reporting fewer glitches as the Medicare drug benefit begins its second year, but they say problems could still crop up in the coming weeks.

Last year, as the drug plan rolled out for the first time, confusion was widespread as Medicare members grappled with the complex new program, facing long waits on telephone lines and computer glitches that kept some people from getting the drugs they needed.

This week, "We're seeing similar problems as we saw in January '06, but they're not as prolific," says Mike James, a Raleigh, N.C., pharmacist and member of the Association of Community Pharmacists Congressional Network, a lobbying group in Washington.

He says pharmacists are reporting hour-long telephone calls to resolve questions about patients' benefits. One popular plan, backed by the AARP, had computer glitches the first two days of the year that added to the backup, he says.

Deane Beebe of the Medicare Rights Center says the quiet first week may be partly a result of some rules put into place last year requiring insurers to provide a 30-day supply of any medication currently used by a member — even if it is not part of the insurer's list of covered drugs.

Insurers are required to notify patients that the supply is temporary and that they need to work with their doctors to switch to drugs that are covered or seek an exception to the coverage.

Beebe says her group has also heard that some lower-income patients eligible for government subsidies that eliminate deductibles and co-payments are being asked for those payments.

"The fact that they are eligible for extra help is not (always) registered in computers," she says.

Because many of the insurers have made changes to their policies since last year, new concerns could crop up in the coming weeks. "It's possible that people will end up trying to get drugs they took all through 2006, but are now not on the formulary and they didn't realize that," says Kelly Brantley at the Health Assistance Partnership, a group that helps support counseling and advocacy programs for senior citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0112779

An analysis by Avalere Health, a private, for-profit research group in Washington, D.C., shows that most insurers did not significantly change the number of drugs covered, but many increased the co-payments patients will make for those drugs. It found:

First Muslim Lawmaker Takes Oath With Quran (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — On the same day Nancy Pelosi became the first female speaker of the House, freshman Rep. Keith Ellison got almost as much attention.

The Minnesota Democrat, the first Muslim elected to Congress, used a Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson rather than a Bible as he re-enacted his swearing-in with Pelosi.

The scene created a human traffic jam near the House floor. About 30 members of Ellison's extended family posed before about two dozen TV cameras, including one from the Arab network Al-Arabiya. James Billington, the librarian of Congress, walked the two-volume Quran, circa 1764, into the Capitol in a shoebox. Ellison's wife, Kim, held it.

Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., took exception last month to the 43-year-old Ellison's planned use of the Quran and said tougher immigration measures were needed to prevent the election of "many more Muslims." On Thursday, the two shook hands and agreed to have coffee.

"I congratulated him on being elected," Goode said, but added, "My concern is I do not want the United States to become a Muslim nation."

"I was glad to meet him," said Ellison, who was born in Detroit and converted to Islam. "The issue is, how can we knock down barriers of religion, color and culture?"

Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, helped engineer the meeting. "They're two good people," he said. "It's an opportunity for healing."

The day's events were enjoyed by Ellison's mother Clida, a Catholic who told the Associated Press she attends Mass daily, and sons Isaiah, Elijah and Jeremiah. Daughter Amirah was "jazzed," Ellison said, "because the speaker is a girl, too. That's what she said."

Ellison Uses Thomas Jefferson's Quran (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, January 5, 2007

Keith Ellison made history Thursday, becoming the first Muslim member of Congress and punctuating the occasion by taking a ceremonial oath with a Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson.

"Look at that. That's something else," Ellison, D-Minn., said as officials from the Library of Congress showed him the two-volume Quran, which was published in London in 1764.

A few minutes later, Ellison took the ceremonial oath with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., at his side. So many of Ellison's family members attended the ceremony that it was done in two takes.

Ellison had already planned to be sworn in using a Quran, rather than a Bible. He learned last month about Jefferson's Quran, with its multicolored cover and brown leather binding, and made arrangements to borrow it.

Although the Library of Congress is right across the street from the Capitol, library officials took extra precautions in delivering the Quran for the ceremony. To protect it from the elements, they placed the Quran in a rectangular box, and handled it with a green felt wrapper once they got it inside the Capitol.

Instead of using surface streets, they walked it over via a series of winding, underground tunnels — a trip that took more than 15 minutes. Guards then ran the book through security x-ray machines at the Capitol.

The Quran was acquired in 1815 as part of a more than 6,400-volume collection that Jefferson sold for $24,000 to replace the congressional library that had been burned by British troops the year before, in the War of 1812. Jefferson, the nation's third president, was a collector of books in all topics and languages.

The book's leather binding was added in 1919. Inside, it reads, "The Koran, commonly called 'The Alcoran of Mohammed.'" Jefferson marked his ownership by writing the letter "J" next to the letter "T" that was already at the bottom of pages, according to Mark Dimunation, chief of the Library of Congress' rare book and special collections division.

DOJ_NMG_0112780

Ellison, the first black member of Congress from Minnesota, was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college. He said earlier this week that he chose to use this Quran because it showed that a visionary like Jefferson believed that wisdom could be gleaned from many sources.

In a brief interview Thursday on his way to a vote, Ellison suggested he had tired of the whole issue of his using the Quran.

"It was good, we did it, it's over, and now it's time to get down to business," he said.

Asked if he was relieved to have it behind him, Ellison said, "Yeah, because maybe we don't have to talk about it so much anymore. Not that I'm complaining, but the pressing issues the country is facing are just a little bit more on my mind right now."

Ellison's mother, Clida Ellison, said in an interview that she thought any controversy over her son's choice was good, "because many people in America are going to learn what the diversity of America is all about."

She described herself as a practicing Catholic.

"I go to Mass every day," she said.

1st Muslim Elected To Congress Takes Office (MCT)

By Kevin Diaz

McClatchy Newspapers, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - A jubilant Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, was sworn in to office Thursday holding his left hand on a leather-bound volume of a Quran that Thomas Jefferson once owned.

In a day of firsts, the 43-year-old lawyer and former Minnesota state representative was sworn in by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., the first female speaker of the House of Representatives.

"It's a day of welcoming," said Ellison, accompanied by his wife, Kim, and their four children, including 12-year-old Elijah, wearing an African kente cloth draped over his suit. "It's a day of more people coming into the process."

"You sure know how to attract a crowd," Pelosi said to Ellison as they prepared for his ceremonial swearing-in in a wood-paneled chamber of the Capitol before hundreds of journalists from around the world, including the Qatar-based TV channel Al-Jazeera.

Replied Ellison: "Maybe they're here for you."

Ellison then held his right hand in the air and placed his left hand on two brown leather-bound volumes of the Quran, which were held aloft by his wife, a teacher at an alternative school in St. Paul, Minn.

Moments earlier, the 110th Congress had been sworn in en masse on the House floor, where Ellison shook hands with Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., who'd criticized Ellison for planning to use the Quran.

Ellison said he followed through with his plan to suggest coffee with Goode, whose district includes Jefferson's historic home of Monticello. He said Goode had accepted.

"I don't anticipate we're going to have any problems," Ellison said. "We're not holding any grudges."

Ellison, characterizing his faith as mainstream American, tried to minimize the media hype over Goode and the Quran.

He challenged an Arab journalists' contention that Americans dislike Muslims and struck a matter-of-fact tone in describing his feelings about making history by swearing on the Quran.

"I haven't really thought about the historical significance of it," he said. "I'm a Muslim. It's my faith."

Ellison's ceremonial swearing-in took place in silence, apart from the sounds of hundreds of camera clicks. The two Qurans, published in London in 1764, then were placed in a white cardboard box and returned to Librarian of Congress James Billington, who walked them through a maze of underground tunnels to the Library of Congress across the street.

"They have to be handled lightly," Billington said. "I'm liable for them."

Ellison, introducing his family to the press, gave a thumbs-up sign and said, "We're here to work for the American people."

Jefferson's Koran Used In Ceremony (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Rep. Keith Ellison, who became the first Muslim in Congress yesterday, said he was proud to take a ceremonial oath of office using the Koran once owned by Thomas Jefferson -- a plan that had triggered criticism.

"The very foundation of our nation, the authors of our Constitution impressed, is religious freedom, and the use of Jefferson's Koran shows that the founders not only knew of the Koran but also used it," said the Minnesota Democrat, who used the historic volume during a ceremonial swearing-in of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican, said, "It was much ado about nothing. All 435 members just took the oath, en masse, without anyone putting their hand on any book."

DOJ_NMG_0112781

Congress members often use the Bible in the numerous ceremonial swearing-ins on the first day of a new session, but the official version is conducted in unison in the House chamber.

Mr. Ellison's plan to use of the Koran drew criticism from Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., Virginia Republican, who sent an e-mail to his constituents saying that the use of the Koran was improper.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies," Mr. Goode said earlier last month.

The debate intensified throughout the Christmas season.

Mr. Goode, who represents Thomas Jefferson's ancestral hometown of Charlottesville, settled the matter yesterday. He congratulated Mr. Ellison on his election victory shortly before the two were sworn in and said he valued freedom of religion.

But he stood by his position.

"While tolerance is a hallmark of our Judeo-Christian nation, it is Islamic fundamentalism that predominates in nations such as Iran and even among many Sunnis and Shi'ites in Iraq, where it can hardly be said that tolerance is the order of the day," Mr. Goode said. "Our country is, has been and will be better off rooted in Judeo-Christian principles."

Mr. Ellison, the first black member of Congress from Minnesota, was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college.

The Library of Congress provided the Koran, which was published in London in 1764, that Mr. Ellison used in a ceremonial oath with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi at his side. So many of Mr. Ellison's family members attended the ceremony that it was performed in two takes.

"Today we are swearing in the largest number of African-Americans in the House of Representatives, and we are so pleased that the first Muslim elected is among them, Keith Ellison," said Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat.

In the Congress there are 155 Catholics, 67 Baptists, 61 Methodists, 44 Presbyterians, 43 Jews, 37 Episcopalians, 26 nondenominational Protestants, 18 nondenominational Christians, 17 Lutherans, 15 Mormons and 47 members of other religions and denominations of Christianity.

Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, Michigan Democrat and chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said, "It was absolutely unfair for [Mr. Ellison] to have to go through this; we all raise our hands to the Lord here," after the CBC leadership was sworn in earlier in the day at the Library of Congress.

Administrator Is Dismissed From Nuclear Security Post (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — The Energy Secretary fired the head of the department's nuclear weapons program on Thursday, citing a series of security failures at national laboratories, including the discovery of a computer device containing thousands of classified documents in the home of a former worker during a drug raid by the police.

The official who was dismissed, Linton F. Brooks, had been administrator of the National Nuclear Security Agency since May 2003. The agency was established in 2000 because of chronic security problems in the weapons program.

The problems continued during Mr. Brooks's service. On Wednesday, the latest in a string of reports by the Energy Department's inspector general criticizing the agency, dated Nov. 27, 2006, was released.

Describing the gaps revealed by the drug raid, in New Mexico, the new report on the Los Alamos laboratory, a center for nuclear weapons research, concluded, "In a number of key areas, security policy was nonexistent, applied inconsistently, or not followed."

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said in a statement on Thursday that lax security "can have serious implications for the security of the United States." Under Mr. Brooks, the agency "has done its best to address these concerns," Mr. Bodman said. But he added, "I do not believe that progress in correcting these issues has been adequate."

Mr. Brooks said in a letter to employees that he would leave "shortly." He recounted how the agency was formed to improve security, and acknowledged: "We have not yet done so in over five years. For much of that time I was in charge of the N.N.S.A."

On Capitol Hill and at the Energy Department, officials said that the department was concerned about oversight hearings planned by the new Democratic leadership of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, said in a statement on Thursday evening, "While it may be appropriate to begin to address the incessant string of security, safety and management lapses at Department of Energy nuclear weapons facilities with the removal of high-level managers, I am afraid that it will take more than a new boss to fix the problems, which are far more systemic and pervasive in nature."

Mr. Markey, long a critic of nuclear programs, promised a vigorous inquiry.

DOJ_NMG_0112782

Among the issues to be investigated was how a computer hacker stole Social Security numbers, birth dates and other sensitive information on 1,500 people at the nuclear weapons agency and why neither those people nor top officials were notified of the problem for nine months.

At the Project on Government Oversight, a nonprofit group based in Washington that has issued a series of reports on nuclear security and that first revealed the drug raid, Danielle Brian, the executive director, said, "We applaud Secretary Bodman's decision to force accountability at N.N.S.A., especially since it has been failing in its mission for years."

But a former subordinate, Gerald E. Marsh, a physicist who recently retired from the Energy Department's Argonne National Laboratory, said he was appalled at the dismissal. Speaking of the weapons complex, Mr. Marsh said, "I thought he was trying to do what he could to keep a declining operation functioning as well as he could."

Mr. Brooks was previously deputy administrator for nonproliferation. He was the United States' chief negotiator for the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty with the Soviet Union, a role in which he had the rank of ambassador. He is a retired Navy officer.

After Breaches, Head Of U.S. Nuclear Program Is Ousted (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman has fired the head of the nation's nuclear weapons program, Linton F. Brooks, because of security breaches last year at weapons facilities, including Los Alamos National Laboratory.

Declaring that it was "time for new leadership," Bodman said in a written statement yesterday that he had asked Brooks to leave his post as administrator of the National Nuclear Security Administration by the end of the month.

The dismissal comes after embarrassing security lapses, including the Oct. 17 discovery of drug paraphernalia and computer flash drives containing highly classified information in the trailer home of a contractor. The items were found by Los Alamos County, N.M., police officers responding to a domestic dispute call.

That led to a harshly critical report in late November by the Energy Department's inspector general, Gregory H. Friedman, who said that security procedures in key areas at Los Alamos were "nonexistent, applied inconsistently, or not followed."

While Bodman refused to elaborate on his statement, the removal of Brooks also comes as Democrats, determined to hold oversight hearings on the nuclear laboratories' security problems, take control of Congress.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said in a written statement yesterday he was "afraid that it will take more than a new boss to fix the problems, which are far more systemic and pervasive in nature." He added that "the new Democratic Congress will exercise the oversight responsibility . . . to get to the bottom of the dysfunctional nuclear weapons complex's problems."

Brooks, the top nuclear security official since mid-2002, is not an expert on computer security. But he has spent four decades working on national security issues, starting as an officer in the Navy and later dealing with nuclear weapons issues at the Pentagon, National Security Council, Navy, State Department and Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in three Republican administrations.

Brooks said in a statement yesterday, "This is not a decision that I would have preferred, but it was made by a thoughtful and honorable man and is based on the principle of accountability that should govern all public service."

In the Bush administration, Brooks has been an advocate of building a new generation of nuclear weapons over the next decade, devising post-Cold War missions for nuclear weapons and modernizing U.S. nuclear weapons facilities, some of which date to the 1940s.

"He was a very intelligent public servant with a great deal of integrity," said Joseph Cirincione, vice president for national security issues at the Center for American Progress, a liberal Washington research group. Cirincione, who strongly disagreed with Brooks, said the security lapses had done little actual harm. "I would feel better if Brooks were being dismissed on policy grounds rather than security grounds."

But the October incident was only the latest of a string of security lapses. Earlier, Brooks had failed to tell Bodman when a computer hacker managed to steal the personnel records and Social Security numbers of 1,500 Energy Department contractors.

The breaches also angered Republican lawmakers. Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, the ranking Republican on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said yesterday that when the Social Security numbers were stolen "it was critical not only that Brooks move swiftly to counteract this sort of security breach but also that he immediately notify the top officials in his department and the people whose data was lost. Instead, he sat on his hands."

In October, Freidman, the Energy Department inspector general, said that the weaknesses in security procedures were "especially troubling since the department and the National Nuclear Security Administration have expended tens of millions of dollars upgrading various components of the laboratory's security apparatus, including vast expenditures on cyber security."

DOJ_NMG_0112783

Bodman had named a department task force to review the inspector general's recommendations and report by Feb. 28.

Nuclear Weapons Administrator Ousted (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

The nation's nuclear weapons chief was fired Thursday, after a long series of security breaches at Los Alamos National Laboratory and other weapons sites had prompted strong criticism of his performance.

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman issued an unusual public statement Thursday saying he had asked for the resignation of Linton F. Brooks, chief of the National Nuclear Security Administration, which operates eight major bomb facilities across the nation.

Late last year, law enforcement agents began investigating classified weapons data that were found along with drug paraphernalia during a police search at a trailer park in Los Alamos, N.M.

That incident was the latest in more than half a dozen breakdowns, including the loss of computer drives, the mishandling of Social Security numbers and financial fraud at the agency.

As the problems mounted, criticism of Brooks sharpened. Last year, Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Texas), then chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Brooks should be fired. Others in Congress also began to question the agency's performance, particularly multibillion-dollar cost overruns and technical setbacks on new weapons research facilities.

In dismissing Brooks, Bodman acknowledged that too many problems had been mishandled.

"I do not believe progress in correcting these issues has been adequate," Bodman said in the statement. "I have decided that it is time for new leadership." He said Brooks would depart this month and an acting administrator would replace him.

The tough handling of Brooks appeared intended to make a strong statement, particularly coming on the first day of Democratic control of House and Senate committees that have oversight of the nuclear weapons complex. In a statement distributed by the Energy Department, Brooks acknowledged that he had failed to head off the problems.

"One reason for forming NNSA was to prevent such management problems from occurring," he said. "We have not done so in over five years. For much of that time, I was in charge of NNSA."

The dismissal was "not a decision I would have preferred," Brooks said, but he praised Bodman's motives. Brooks, 68, has had a distinguished federal career: former Navy nuclear submarine commander, director of nuclear warfare for the Navy, and chief arms reduction negotiator during the Reagan administration. He led the team that achieved the first major treaty with the Soviet Union to reduce nuclear arms.

Barton, among other critics, said Brooks' departure was "long overdue." Barton was particularly incensed over Brooks' failure during a nine-month period to notify superiors that the personnel records and Social Security numbers of 1,500 Energy Department contract employees had been stolen by a computer hacker.

In 2004, most of the Los Alamos lab was shut down for nearly six months at a cost of $370 million when officials thought classified computer drives were missing. Investigators later concluded that the drives never existed. A few years earlier, a major investigation was conducted when two classified drives were discovered hidden behind an office copying machine.

Marylia Kelley, executive director of Tri-Valley Communities Against a Radioactive Environment, a watchdog group in Livermore, Calif., said Brooks was allowing storage of weapons-grade plutonium and uranium in facilities at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory that could not be adequately protected.

"The security deficiencies at Livermore and Los Alamos are systemic and deserve a higher level of attention than NNSA has given them," she said.

Because the No. 2 person at NNSA, Principal Deputy Administrator Jerry Paul, recently left, there is something of a leadership vacuum. Agency officials could not say Thursday who would be running the operation after Brooks' departure.

Nuclear Agency Head Dismissed For Lapses (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman on Thursday dismissed the chief of the country's nuclear weapons program because of security breakdowns at the Los Alamos, N.M., laboratory and other facilities.

Linton Brooks said he would leave in two weeks to three weeks as head of the National Nuclear Security Administration, a post he held since May 2003.

Bodman said the nuclear agency under Brooks, a former ambassador and arms control negotiator, had not adequately fixed security problems. "I have decided it is time for new leadership at the NNSA," Bodman said.

DOJ_NMG_0112784

Brooks told agency workers in a statement, "This is not a decision that I would have preferred ... (but) I accept the decision and you need to do likewise."

He characterized the demand for his resignation as "based on the principle of accountability that should govern all public service."

Brooks was reprimanded in June for failing to report to Bodman a security breach of computers at an agency facility in Albuquerque, N.M., that resulted in the theft of files containing Social Security numbers and other personal data for 1,500 workers.

The theft did not become generally known, nor was Bodman made aware of it, for eight months.

Last fall, security at Los Alamos came into question anew. During a drug raid, authorities found classified nuclear-related documents at the home of a woman with top secret clearance who worked at the lab.

That security breach was especially troubling, the department's internal watchdog said, because tens of millions of dollars had been spent to upgrade computer security at Los Alamos. The lab is part of the nuclear weapons complex that Brooks' agency oversees.

"These management and security issues can have serious implications for the security of the United States," Bodman in a statement announcing Brooks' departure.

While the agency's management "has done its best to address these concerns, I do not believe that progress in correcting these issues has been adequate," Bodman said.

"Therefore, and after careful consideration, I have decided that it is time for new leadership at the NNSA," said Bodman

Bodman said an acting head of the agency will be named soon.

Brooks has more than 40 years of experience in national security and nuclear nonproliferation issues. He led the negotiating team that worked on the START arms reduction treaty signed with Russia in 1991.

Widely respected for his knowledge of nuclear weapons and nonproliferation issues, Brooks nevertheless has been a target of some members of Congress.

When it was learned that Brooks did not inform his superiors for eight months about the computer theft of data on 1,500 employees, Rep. Joe Barton last year sought Brooks' immediate dismissal.

"His departure is long overdue," Barton, R-Texas, said Thursday.

With Democrats now in charge of the House and Senate, there has been talk of hearings into the administration's response to security breaches at the labs.

"It will take more than a new boss to fix the problems, which are far more systemic and pervasive in nature," said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which is considering hearings.

Some lawmakers have criticized Brooks' pursuit of a bunker-buster bomb, a project promoted by Brooks but abandoned last year because of congressional opposition. Others have questioned whether Brooks' agency made a clear enough argument on behalf of the weapon.

At the same time, Brooks' agency has come under criticism for not making enough progress in working out an agreement with Russia for the disposal of tons of weapons-grade plutonium.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said he has been concerned "about the effectiveness" of the agency for some time and that Bodman now "has sent a clear message" that operations need to be improved.

In his message to employees, Brooks bemoaned the lack of progress in solving security problems at Los Alamos, saying the agency was formed "to prevent such management problems from occurring.

"We have not yet done so in over five years," he said.

The agency is responsible for managing the nuclear weapons complex that includes the Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore nuclear weapons research labs. The agency has more than 37,000 employees, most of them contractor personnel.

Congress created the agency within the Energy Department in response to the uproar over the Wen Ho Lee security lapses at Los Alamos in the late 1990s. The belief was that security would improve by putting all nuclear weapons programs under a semiautonomous agency.

But since then, there have been repeated security problems _ most of them at Los Alamos _ from misplaced and lost computer disks containing classified information to alleged misuse of credit cards, and last October's discovery of classified documents in a drug raid.

Agencies Bid Farewell To Retiring "Elders" (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112785

The start of the new year is when the village elders say their farewells across the government. Agencies lose valued, experienced hands; the retirees take on new pursuits.

Doris Hausser, a senior policy adviser at the Office of Personnel Management, used the term "village elder" this week in an interview about her retirement, and it's an apt description of many career public servants as they end their federal journeys.

Many federal employees retire around the turn of the year because provisions in federal retirement and leave laws make it advantageous. Most senior employees are covered by the older of two retirement systems that permits them to receive a pension payment in February if they leave the federal payroll in early January.

Many also retire at this time of the year because it seems the best time to make a break and step aside. Most agencies slow down for the holidays, and that seems to make it easier to say goodbyes and find the time to sort through files and pack boxes.

Their careers underscore the range of occupations in the government and the services provided to the public.

TakeMax Mayfield. The director of the National Hurricane Center in Miami retired Wednesday after 34 years as a government meteorologist. He started his career as an intern and rose through the ranks to become the government's face on television during the hurricane season.

Mayfield's last day included a farewell breakfast where he delivered, as he has for much of the past decade, an appeal for hurricane preparedness. "You may think that you've seen the worst of the hurricanes, but I assure you that you have not," he said. "We have a lot of work to do."

Out West,Louis Dellamonica, an engineer at the Hawthorne Army Depot in Nevada, retired Tuesday after 65 years with the Defense Department. He began his federal career one week after the bombing of Pearl Harbor and has been described by Defense officials as the department's longest-serving civil service employee.

Dellamonica was interviewed in 2002 for an Army oral-history project, and the report summed up his personal philosophy by using his words: "Pride means do-it-yourself to the best of your ability, disregarding whether you are a big wheel, little log, keystone or cobblestone."

Closer to home,Mary Garrett, a secretary for the Food and Drug Administration, retired Wednesday after 44 years of federal service.

Garrett said that during her career, she "had the privilege of working with many wonderful people." She added, "For anyone coming to work for the government today, I would say to dedicate themselves to their job so that it will be rewarding and fulfilling for them."

Her colleague,Wayne Amchin, said Garrett "is loved by lots of people" in the FDA's Parklawn building in Rockville. Garrett took the stairs each day to her 13th floor-office, served as a free notary for co-workers, and brought in bags of cookies on some Mondays when she figured the snack bar had not been restocked.

There are many more retirees, includingJoan S. Williams, an intelligence analyst at the FBI, who retired Wednesday after more than 42 years of service. She began her career as a clerk-stenographer and spent more than 12 years overseas for the bureau.Paul Kaplanlogged more than 39 years with the government. He retired Wednesday from the OPM, where he was a program analyst in workforce planning and policy.

James F. Decker, principal deputy director in the Energy Department's office of science, also retired Wednesday after 33 years of public service. He helped make the Energy office one of the premier science organizations in the world and has been a leading advocate of international scientific cooperation.

Hausser, the OPM's village elder, completed 30 years of federal service Monday. She began at the old Civil Service Commission, which was restructured as the OPM in the late 1970s, and worked in offices focused on research, training and development and performance management.

She became chief policy adviser to the OPM director in 2002 and has been a leading advocate for modernizing federal personnel rules and creating performance-based pay systems -- ambitious goals that she thinks can be achieved without sacrificing the ideals that shaped the civil service.

Hausser, who got a doctorate in organizational psychology and mastered the twists and turns of federal personnel law, said she has no plans for retirement, except to become an "Olie Kolziggroupie," a reference to the Washington Capitals goaltender. It's a natural transition, she said, because she grew up rooting for the Detroit Red Wings and the legendaryGordieHowe.Talk Shows

Craig W. Floyd, chairman and executive director of the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, andBruce Mendelsohn, the fund's acting director of communications, will be the guests on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Michael Ryan, vice president for administration and finance at the Millennium Challenge, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

DOJ_NMG_0112786

Good Times Or Good Governance (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Now that the Democrats have taken control of Congress, President Bush has decided it's time for fiscal discipline and a balanced budget. That's shameless, even by local standards. Who does Bush think was in power when the big deficits of the past six years were created?

A good way for the Democrats to start the new congressional season is to examine just how it happened that the federal government moved from budget surplus to deficit during the Bush presidency. If Democrats can be clear about what went wrong, then maybe (maybe) they can begin to fix it.

An honest budget discussion should start with an admission that the projected surpluses of the post-Clinton years were largely illusory -- in the sense that they were predicated on overly upbeat assumptions about the economy. That's not to diminish the importance of what Clinton and the Democrats did during the 1990s to impose some fiscal discipline. But it was unrealistic to assume that the boom years would continue indefinitely, piling up ever-greater budget surpluses.

The Congressional Budget Office examined the mirage of endless surpluses in a report last year. The CBO studied the gap between the surpluses that were forecast back in January 2001 and the actual deficits that occurred. Profligate tax and spending decisions were part of the story. But the biggest factor was that revenue didn't match the projections that had been made by Washington's favorite economist, Dr. Rosy Scenario. In 2002, the shortfall of revenue for economic reasons was $308 billion; in 2003, it was $381 billion; in 2004, it was $307 billion.

But Rosy Scenario wasn't the only villain in the budget mess. The Bush administration and the GOP Congress made a bad situation much worse -- by enacting tax and spending programs that shredded any semblance of fiscal responsibility.

The Bush tax cuts enacted in 2001 started the process. By CBO estimates, they reduced government revenue from projected levels by $31 billion in 2002, $84 billion in 2003, $100 billion in 2004, $100 billion in 2005 and $126 billion in 2006. Republicans argue that those tax cuts were "pro-growth" and were justified by economic weakness after Sept. 11, 2001. I disagree with that economic analysis, but even if it were right, it doesn't justify the spending binge that accompanied the tax cuts.

The year Bush really busted the budget was 2003, when he embarked on a costly war in Iraq that wasn't funded by a tax increase. Worse, he added a major new welfare program, the prescription drug benefit, that also wasn't funded. The inevitable result was a spending bubble.

CBO numbers show that discretionary spending (which is largely military-related) jumped over projected levels by $120 billion in 2003, $171 billion in 2004, $221 billion in 2005 and $245 billion in 2006. As for the prescription drug benefit, its bite is only now being felt, with the CBO forecasting that it will add $27 billion to projected Medicare spending in 2006 and $40 billion in 2007.

"The lesson of 2003 is that fighting a war, cutting taxes and funding a major new entitlement program all at the same time doesn't work," says Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a bipartisan group that favors balanced budgets. He provided me with the CBO numbers used in this analysis.

After the budget-busting policies of Bush's first six years, the vexing question for the Democrats is whether to clean up the mess by moving the budget back toward balance. President Bush said this week that he has a plan to balance the budget by 2012, but since he simultaneously rejected any tax increases and isn't likely to reduce war spending, it's hard to imagine how that plan could work.

The Democrats have to decide whether on economics, they want to be (forgive the sexist term) the "Daddy Party" of fiscal responsibility. Unless politicians find the courage to trim entitlement spending to what the country can afford, the projections are scary. A 2006 study by the Government Accountability Office noted that if current fiscal policy continues, interest costs on the national debt will rise to 20 percent of gross domestic product by 2045 and overall government spending to nearly 50 percent. That's a recipe for an economic crackup.

The Democrats face the essential political decision as they take their seats: Do they want to make people happy by postponing tough decisions or do they want to get serious about restoring fiscal sanity? Are they the party of good times or good governance? The Bush administration has argued for six years that you can have it both ways, but that's demonstrably not true. So the Democratic moment arrives.

Lagging Judicial Pay (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112787

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. is embracing with gusto a cause championed by his predecessor, William Rehnquist: the need for a substantial pay raise for federal judges. Justice Roberts devoted his second annual year-end report to this issue, and it should be required reading in Congress.

Getting Congress to act promptly on judicial salaries may not be easy, if history is any guide. But Mr. Roberts is right to note the link between maintaining an adequate standard of judicial compensation and preserving the quality and independence of the judiciary, and to prod Congress on this issue.

For starters, an immediate increase in the neighborhood of 30 percent would help make up for dual blows of inflation and Congress's periodic withholding of cost-of-living adjustments. The last time federal judges received a substantial pay raise was 1989.

By statute, a sitting federal trial judge makes $165,200 a year. That's a lot of money, the same pay as a member of Congress. But as the chief justice notes in his report, judges have fallen well behind the American labor force as a whole in keeping up with inflation. Since 1969, a judge's pay has declined by 23.9 percent, adjusted for inflation, while the national average for all wages rose by 17.8 percent.

Federal judges at every level earn significantly less than law school deans, senior law school professors, and even junior associates at some big-time law firms. There is no definitive study, but it cannot be just coincidental that federal judges are leaving the bench at an increasing rate, thereby "threatening the viability of life tenure," as Justice Roberts put it. Considering the impact on a future job could make judges less willing to issue unpopular rulings upholding important rights.

It is tempting to dismiss as hyperbole the chief justice's characterization of this issue as a "constitutional crisis." But the salary issue is a serious one, touching as it does on the two constitutional provisions designed to ensure an independent judiciary — the one granting life tenure, and the other ensuring no reduction in judicial pay.

The chief justice's focus on judicial pay has drawn praise from Senator Patrick Leahy, the new Judiciary Committee chairman and a longtime champion of improved judicial salaries. The nation would be well-served by a comprehensive bipartisan package that grants federal judges a sizable raise, ends the linkage between judicial and Congressional salaries, and requires judges to forgo privately financed junkets that cast an ethical cloud on the courts.

Tax As You Go (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

January 5, 2007; Page Congressional Democrats are dashing out of the gates to establish their fiscal conservative credentials. And as early as today House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will push through so-called "pay-as-you-go" budget rules for Congress. Keep an eye on your wallet.

"Paygo," as Washington insiders call it, sounds like a fiscally prudent budget practice: If government spends more on program A, it has to spend less money on program B, and thus budget deficits will be restrained. We're all for that. But when Republicans proposed exactly that budget rule in recent years, House Democrats voted it down.

Ms. Pelosi has something different in mind. Under her paygo plan, new entitlement programs and all new tax cuts would have to be offset by either cutbacks in other entitlement programs or tax increases. This version of paygo is a budget trapdoor, designed not to control expenditures but to make it easier to raise taxes while blocking future tax cuts.

Supporters of paygo claim it will help restrain entitlement spending. It won't. Paygo doesn't apply to current entitlements that will grow automatically over the next several decades. Ms. Pelosi's version of paygo applies only to new entitlements or changes in law that expand current programs. And on present trajectory, Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security, food stamps and the like are scheduled to increase federal spending to almost 38% of GDP by 2050, up from 21% today. Paygo won't stop a dime of that increase. This may explain why one of the leading supporters of paygo is the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal outfit that favors far more social spending.

Paygo enthusiasts also claim that when these rules were in effect in the 1990s the budget deficit disappeared and by 2001 the budget recorded a $121 billion surplus. Sorry. The budget improvement in the late 1990s was a result of three events wholly unrelated to paygo: the initial spending restraint under the Republican Congress in 1995 and 1996 as part of their pledge to balance the budget; a huge reduction in military spending, totaling nearly 2% of GDP, over the decade; and rapid economic growth, which always causes a bounce in revenues. Paygo didn't expire until 2002, but by the late-1990s politicians in both parties were already re-stoking the domestic spending fires.

What paygo does restrain are tax cuts, by requiring that any tax cut be offset dollar-for-dollar with some entitlement reduction. Congressional budgeteers always overestimate the revenue losses from tax cuts, which under paygo would require onerous budget cuts to "pay for" the tax cuts. As a political matter, those spending cuts will never happen.

First on the chopping block, therefore, would be the investment tax cuts of 2003 that are set to expire in 2010. Last year Democrat David Obey of Wisconsin, the new Appropriations Committee chairman and a prodigious spender, gave this strategy away when he urged paygo rules so he could enact new social spending and pay for it by canceling the Bush tax cuts for those who make more than $1 million.

DOJ_NMG_0112788

Never mind that, in the wake of those capital gains and dividend tax-rate cuts, federal revenues climbed by a record $550 billion over the past two fiscal years. Incidentally, thanks to the current economic expansion and the surge in tax revenues, the budget deficit has fallen by $165 billion in just two years -- without paygo.

Given all of this, it's especially puzzling that even some conservatives seem tempted by paygo's fiscal illusions. Our friends at the Heritage Foundation have of late become obsessed with future entitlement forecasts and have advised Ms. Pelosi to enact paygo rules to stop it. But Heritage notably did not insist that tax increases be excluded from any paygo rule. Had such logic prevailed in 1980 or 2003, it's possible that neither the Reagan nor Bush tax cuts would ever have become law. As a political matter, paygo is about returning Republicans to their historical minority role as tax collectors for the welfare state.

That's not to say that new budget rules aren't highly desirable. The line-item veto, a new Grace Commission to identify and eliminate the billions of dollars of waste and failed programs, and an automatic spending sequester if the budget rises above agreed baselines would all help to restore spending discipline. But it is precisely because these rules would restrain spending that they are not on the Democratic agenda.

Paygo, by contrast, gives the appearance of spending discipline while making it all but impossible to let taxpayers keep more of their money. It should really be called "spend and tax as you go."

OTHER NEWS:

Warm Weather Weighs On Price Of Oil (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Crude oil prices fell Thursday to the lowest level since mid-2005, pressured by warm weather, faltering demand and government data showing inventories at healthy levels.

"We're running out of winter," says Kevin Lindemer, managing director of energy for economic consulting firm Global Insight. "We are very well supplied for what's remaining. … We have very high heating oil inventories."

Crude oil for February delivery closed at $55.59 a barrel in New York trading, a 4.7% drop. That followed a 4.5% decline on Wednesday. The price is down from a peak of $77.03 a barrel on July 14.

Whether the lower prices will have staying power, helping consumers, is unclear.

Lindemer says weather will be a key factor in price moves in coming days, as will possible efforts by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to adjust output to keep prices from falling. The bulk of heating oil demand is in the Northeast and Midwest.

"If oil prices stay as low as they are right now, it's going to bring gasoline prices down, no doubt about it. … The big question is how long will it stay down here? And we won't know that for several days," says Phil Flynn, energy analyst at Alaron Trading, noting that prices have previously dipped near the mid-50s, only to bounce back.

Gasoline prices fell last week for the first time in three weeks, the federal Energy Information Administration (EIA) reported Wednesday. The average price for regular gasoline was $2.334 a gallon, down from $2.341 the previous week.

Flynn said this week's oil price decline was also partially caused by technical trading. In addition, the EIA reported, inventories were higher than anticipated.

The EIA said domestic inventories of crude oil fell last week by 1.3 million barrels to 319.7 million. But distillate stocks, including diesel fuel and heating oil, rose by 2 million barrels to 135.6 million barrels. U.S. gasoline inventories also rose, helping prompt a 6-cent drop in wholesale gasoline prices to $1.487 a gallon.

"It's warm out, so demand is down. There is concern about U.S. and global growth (slowing)," says Jason Schenker, energy analyst for Wachovia. Schenker predicts volatility ahead with "both up and down swings."

On average, Wachovia expects oil to run about $60 a barrel in 2007. He notes that while prices have been trending lower, they're still well above historical averages, because oil was selling for about $25 a barrel for decades.

Lindemer said the price drop could help consumers who have flexible home heating oil contracts, though adding: "When it's 60 degrees on Jan. 4 in Boston, a tank full of heating oil goes a long way."

Energy, Mining Firms Take Hit (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree, Paul Glader And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112789

Energy and copper prices continued their tumble yesterday, punishing shares of companies from oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp. to mining magnate Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc.

There is no one factor behind the sharp declines in some key commodities. Warm winter weather has depressed oil prices, more than offsetting recent production cutbacks by OPEC. Copper prices, meanwhile, are dropping because of concerns about a housing slump in the U.S., rising inventories and easing labor problems at copper mines.

Whether commodity prices continue to slide long term will depend in no small part on the world economy. Explosive growth in developing countries like China -- along with solid economic growth in the U.S. -- had spurred demand for everything from natural gas to copper wire and pipes in recent years. If the world economy shows resilience, commodity prices are likely to rebound.

Just the same, prices for basic materials are unlikely to make the kind of gains they rang up in recent years. Oil, for example, surged more than 30% in both 2004 and 2005, but ended flat in 2006 despite closing above $77 a barrel in July. Yesterday, oil closed at $55.59 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, down $2.73 for the day. It is now more than a dollar below its level in October, when the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries decided to trim output to prop up prices.

Copper hasn't been doing any better. After surging 88% from Dec. 30, 2005, through May 23, 2006, to $4.055 a pound on the Comex Division of Nymex, it tumbled 36% from that May peak to yesterday's close of $2.5885 a pound.

For now, investors are bidding down the prices of several key commodities along with the companies that produce them. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange yesterday, Exxon Mobil shares fell 1.9% to $72.72, and Marathon Oil Corp. shed 3.6% to $84.24.

Mining companies also are getting dusted up. New Orleans-based Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold has a large copper-mining operation in Indonesia and has launched a bid to acquire Phoenix-based copper miner Phelps Dodge Corp. Freeport's share price on the New York Stock Exchange has dropped 29% to about $51 yesterday from a 52-week high of $72 in April. Meanwhile, Phelps Dodge, which has seen its stock price rise in recent months because it is a takeover target, has seen its share price decline to about $116, down 7% from a 52-week high of $125 in December.

How quickly commodity prices will recover is unclear. The winter months in the Northern Hemisphere are the peak time for oil use because of heating needs. Typically, oil producers increase their output and consumers draw on oil inventories to meet peak demand. However, this winter's warm weather in the U.S. Northeast -- the source of 80% of the nation's heating-oil demand -- has, for example, undercut the price of crude-oil contracts on the New York Mercantile Exchange. OPEC can't tighten its oil taps fast enough to balance the market and shore up prices.

OPEC might be forced to further trim output, according to Larry Goldstein, an analyst at the Energy Policy Research Foundation. "The impact of warmer weather globally has fully negated November and December [output] cuts," he said.

For its part, the copper market has lost much of the labor-fear factor that had been buoying prices. A series of labor negotiations during 2006 had been "keeping a premium into prices," said Catherine Virga, a base metals research analyst with CPM Group in New York. Workers at copper mines in Mexico, Chile and elsewhere have gone on strike in the past year as three-year contracts are up for negotiations and workers want better pay and benefits during a commodity boom that is bringing greater profits to mining companies world-wide.

As labor negotiations at various mines have been settled, prices have come back down. Ms. Virga predicts copper prices may climb short term as traders see the recent drop as a buying opportunity. But, overall, her firm predicts copper prices declining in 2007.

The First Energy President (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

Now that President Gerald Ford has been buried with all the honors he deserved, it is time to discuss a proper memorial. I would suggest the Gerald Ford Energy Independence Act.

Few people remember today, but “Gerald Ford was the first U.S. president to really use the levers of the presidency to try to break our addiction to oil,” said the energy economist Philip Verleger Jr. “He was way ahead of his time.”

Well, his time has come again — and then some.

The greatest thing George Bush could do — for President Ford’s legacy and his own — would be to dedicate his coming State of the Union address to completing the energy independence agenda that Mr. Ford initiated 32 years ago in the wake of the 1973 Arab oil embargo and energy shock.

As the page titled “Energy” from the Ford presidential library Web site reminds us: “Early in his administration, President Ford said that he would not sit by and watch the nation continue to talk about an energy crisis and do nothing about it. Nor, he said, would he accept halfway measures which failed to change the direction that has made our nation so vulnerable to foreign economic interests. The president proposed firm but necessary measures designed to achieve energy independence for the U.S. by 1985, and to regain our position of world leadership in energy."

DOJ_NMG_0112790

In his 1975 State of the Union speech, President Ford laid out his vision: "I have a very deep belief in America's capabilities. Within the next 10 years, my program envisions: 200 major nuclear power plants; 250 major new coal mines; 150 major coal-fired power plants; 30 major new [oil] refineries; 20 major new synthetic fuel plants; the drilling of many thousands of new oil wells; the insulation of 18 million homes; and the manufacturing and the sale of millions of new automobiles, trucks and buses that use much less fuel. ... In another crisis — the one in 1942 — President Franklin D. Roosevelt said this country would build 60,000 military aircraft. By 1943, production in that program had reached 125,000 aircraft annually. They did it then. We can do it now."

Obviously, President Ford's emphasis on coal and domestic oil came in age when most people were unaware of climate change. Still, Mr. Ford wasn't just all talk on energy. He used his presidential powers to impose a $3-a-barrel fee on imported oil to reduce consumption. That was a big deal, noted Mr. Verleger, because the average cost of imported crude at the time was only $10.76 a barrel.

Yes, you read that right. A Republican president actually imposed an import fee on oil to curb consumption! Yes, President Bush, it can be done! The republic survived!

Thanks to the Energy Policy Conservation Act of 1975 and other measures, Mr. Ford's energy legacy includes: the creation of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve for use in an emergency; the phasing out of domestic price controls on oil to encourage more exploration; major investment in alternative energy research; assistance to states in developing energy conservation programs; and, most important, the creation of the first compulsory mileage standards for U.S. automobiles.

Those mileage standards have barely been tightened since 1975 — because some idiotic congressmen from Michigan, who thought they were protecting Detroit, have blocked efforts to raise them. So, Japanese automakers innovated more in that area, and the rest is history — or in the case of Detroit, obituary.

Every 10 years we say to ourselves, "If only we had done the right thing 10 years ago." Well, President Bush has a chance in his State of the Union to call on Americans to honor Mr. Ford by completing his vision. But it means asking Americans to do some hard things: accepting a gasoline or carbon tax; inducing Detroit to make more fuel-efficient cars, trucks and plug-in hybrids; setting a national requirement for utilities to provide 20 percent of their electricity from renewable wind, solar, hydro or nuclear power by 2015; and, finally, making large-scale investments in mass transit.

It is stunning that since 9/11 the Bush team has never mounted a campaign to get Americans to conserve energy.

"Ford called for zero oil imports by 1985," said Mr. Verleger. "Instead, we imported five million barrels a day then. In 2006, imports will average almost 14 million barrels a day. Had we achieved everything Ford proposed, the price of oil today would be $20 a barrel, not $60, the polar ice caps might not be melting, the polar bear might still have a chance, and our children would have a future."

Rise In Ethanol Raises Concerns About Corn As A Food (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

New York Times, January 5, 2007

CHICAGO, Jan. 4 — Renewing concerns about whether there will be enough corn to support the demand for both fuel and food, a new study has found that ethanol plants could use as much as half of America's corn crop next year.

Dozens of new ethanol plants are being built by farmers and investors in a furious gold rush, spurred by a call last year from the Bush administration and politicians from farm states to produce more renewable fuels to curb America's reliance on oil. But the new study by the Earth Policy Institute, an environmental group, found that the number of ethanol plants coming on line has been underreported by more than 25 percent by both the Agriculture Department and the Renewable Fuels Association, the ethanol industry's main lobbying group.

The Earth Policy Institute says that 79 ethanol plants are under construction, which would more than double ethanol production capacity to 11 billion gallons by 2008. Yet late last month, the Renewable Fuels Association said there were 62 plants under construction.

The lower tally has led to an underestimate of the grain that would be needed for ethanol, clouding the debate over the priorities of allocating corn for food and fuel, said Lester R. Brown, who has written more than a dozen books on environmental issues and is the president of the Earth Policy Institute. "This unprecedented diversion of corn to fuel production will affect food prices everywhere," Mr. Brown said.

DOJ_NMG_0112791

Bob Dinneen, the president of the Renewable Fuels Association, said the group had not intentionally tried to play down the number of plants under construction. “It has been a moving target,” Mr. Dinneen said in an interview on Thursday. “We are not trying to hide the ball. We are trying to keep up with a growing and dynamic industry as best we can.”

The Renewable Fuels Association has generally played down concerns in the food versus fuel debate over ethanol, saying that estimates showed there would be plenty of corn to meet the demand for both. “We can absolutely do that without having a deleterious impact on consumer food prices,” Mr. Dinneen said.

The National Corn Growers Association said Thursday that farmers were keeping up, noting that growers produced their third-largest crop in 2006 of 10.7 billion bushels. “All demands for corn — food, feed, fuel and exports — are being met,” Rick Tolman, chief executive of the corn growers, said in a statement. “Farmers have always responded to price signals from the marketplace and, historically, we have had much more challenge with overproduction than shortage.”

With spot prices of corn soaring to record highs of nearly $4 a bushel last month, farmers are expected to plant some 85 million acres of corn this year, an increase of 8 percent over 2006 and what would be the largest corn-seeding in the country since 1985, said Dan Basse, president of AgResource, an agricultural research company in Chicago.

Ethanol has raised the incomes of farmers and given new hope to flagging rural economies. But the reliance on corn to produce ethanol in the United States has drawn concerns from some economists, who question whether the drive to corn-based fuel will push up the prices of livestock and retail prices of meat, poultry and dairy products.

Mr. Brown is among those who believe the ethanol industry is growing too quickly. He called for a federal moratorium on the licensing of new distilleries. “We need a time out, a chance to catch our breath and decide how much corn can be used for ethanol without raising food prices,” he said Thursday.

Like many other experts, he advocates moving past corn-based ethanol into cellulosic ethanol, produced from plant waste and nonfood crops like switch grass.

For now, however, in the anticipation of high potential returns, ethanol plants that rely on corn are being built by everyone from farmers to Bill Gates of Microsoft to a mix of Wall Street investors. In addition to the 116 ethanol plants in production, and the 79 under construction, at least 200 more ethanol plants, with a capacity of 3 billion gallons a year, are in the planning stages.

In all, ethanol distilleries now running or in the works will pull an estimated 139 million tons of corn from the 2008 corn harvest, according to the Earth Policy Institute. That is about double the demand projected by the Agriculture Department and will require over half of the projected 2008 corn harvest of about 11 billion bushels.

Keith Collins, the Agriculture Department’s chief economist, did not respond to requests for comment. One reason for the department’s projection of just 60 million tons of corn used for ethanol is that it was released last February, before surging oil prices set off investor interest in ethanol plants. The Agriculture Department will release its new projections next month.

But the pace of plant construction may be slowing. Shortages of galvanized steel and backlogs for special tanks for the distilleries have pushed construction time back from 18 months to as much as 28 months for some plants, Mr. Basse said.

Some towns are also demanding environmental studies to better understand the impact ethanol plants can have on water supplies and quality of the groundwater, which has delayed permits for new processing plants.

New Prospect For US: Glut Of Ethanol Plants (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

Like at least four others building new ethanol plants in Illinois, Mike Smith expects his new biorefinery to begin pumping out fuel from corn by summer.

Unlike the other plants, Mr. Smith's Canton, Ill., facility is nowhere to be found on a key industry tally, which the US government and Wall Street analysts use to track ethanol plants under construction. A study released Thursday reports that at least 14 new biorefineries - representing nearly 1 billion gallons of extra fuel - are not on that tally. That oversight could mean problems ahead for the food supply and the "green fuel" industry, some analysts say.

· Ethanol production could pull so much corn out of the food supply by 2008 that US corn exports could plummet.

· The food-fuel competition could push corn prices so high that some ethanol producers in the fledgling industry, which many deem vital to US energy security, would merely break even - or, if corn gets pricey enough, actually lose money.

Even before Thursday's report, some analysts had warned of a future glut of ethanol production capacity.

The immediate concern of the Earth Policy Institute (EPI), which released the new report, is the impact on the global food supply.

"We're worried there will be less to feed the world if we're using too much corn to make fuel," says Lester Brown, EPI's president. "The US ... supplies 70 percent of the world's corn exports. These previously unidentified distilleries could have a big negative impact."

DOJ_NMG_0112792

Wall Street investment banks and farm cooperatives continue to pour billions of dollars into building ethanol plants, basing their decisions in part on predictions of future capacity by the Renewable Fuels Association. The RFA lists 65 plants under construction. But EPI, which put together its own tally using several industry lists, has found 79 such plants.

That extra capacity has major implications for agriculture and the ethanol industry. Using the RFA's lower estimate, the US Department of Agriculture has forecast that ethanol biorefineries - also called distilleries - will need about 60 million tons of corn from the 2008 harvest. But if EPI's higher estimate for plants is correct, then up to 139 million tons of corn will be needed.

For its part, the RFA defends its more conservative estimate. "Our list is a pretty accurate snapshot - about the best you can get in an industry that changes as quickly as this one," says spokesman Matt Hartwig. "If we were to do our list based on announcements, it would be much longer. But that would be misleading because not all those come to fruition. Those on our list we believe will be built and up and running."

Last month, the RFA added about a dozen new facilities to its list, which suggests about 11.4 billion gallons in capacity by 2008, which is still lower than the EPI's range of 12 billion to 15 billion gallons.

Besides the potential impact on food exports, the glut in capacity could throw the ethanol industry into turmoil. The problem isn't demand for ethanol. The energy industry could use far more than what's currently produced. The real challenge is that competition for corn could drive its price so high that profits evaporate, some analysts warn.

"We see significant overcapacity in the short term, 2007-2010," warned a Deutsche Bank analysis last month. That analysis, based in part on RFA data, sees capacity of only about 8.3 billion gallons a year by 2008 - similar to a Citibank analysis in September.

Factor in the EPI numbers and the crunch gets worse.

"We've got to come up with enough corn acres to meet the demand," says Jerry Gidel, grains analyst for North America Risk Management in Chicago. "We're chasing a kite right now that keeps on rising." He predicts that capacity could reach 11 billion gallons a year by early 2008. The 1.7 billion gallons of capacity RFA added late last year was "totally unexpected and has me a little worried," he says.

Ethanol prices fluctuate with gasoline prices. So when gas prices go up, profits for ethanol plants are good even if corn costs more. When gas prices dip, ethanol profits can get pinched by rising corn prices. With oil at $60 dollars a barrel, ethanolmakers can make money.

"I would feel very uncomfortable, extremely uncomfortable, planning a new ethanol biorefinery at this time," says Robert Wisner, an economist at Iowa State University. "The RFA numbers are clearly at the low end of the capacity scale. We have a substantial number of plants out there that are very close to breaking ground right now that are not part of that list."

If oil prices were to drop below $60 a barrel, a further boost in corn prices could slash profit margins for ethanol manufacturers, some say.

"Right now we're getting by on $60 a barrel oil and still making money in ethanol," Mr. Gidel says. "But if all of a sudden we're going to stay at $60 and see demand for corn for ethanol rise for the 2008 harvest, well that would be a very ... challenging year for ethanol."

Wall Street has cooled somewhat to the industry's initial public offerings (IPOs) - privately held ethanol firms going public, analysts say.

"It's going to be a tough year because there's so much capacity," says a Deutsche Bank analyst, who asked not to be named because he did not have permission to speak to the press. "I don't really see Wall Street wanting to do a lot less [investment] with ethanol. We have had some pull back on a couple of IPOs by ethanol companies. Now the environment is tougher, but I don't think that's going to stop anybody."

Data Indicate Growth Softened During December (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby And Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK -- The latest readings on the service sector and labor market suggested that the U.S. economy softened a bit in December.

The Institute for Supply Management said its nonmanufacturing index, which surveys mostly service-related companies, slipped to 57.1 last month from 58.9 in November but was unchanged from the October reading.

Challenger, Gray & Christmas CEO John Challenger discusses his firm's December job cuts report2, which he says suggest an "ideal" soft landing for the economy.

Monster Worldwide International Group President Steve Pogorzelski discusses the state of the economy3 as seen via online job postings

DOJ_NMG_0112793

Readings over 50 indicate expanding activity, but economists had looked for December's performance to be slightly stronger. The service sector is the single largest source of U.S. economic output.

The service-index reading came a day after the institute reported that its index of manufacturing activity showed modest growth last month after a mild contraction in November.

Despite a gradual cooling, survey respondents remained upbeat about the service sector: "Members' comments in December are generally positive concerning current business conditions," said Anthony Nieves, who compiles the report. "The overall indication in December is continued economic growth in the [service] sector."

The report said inflationary pressures faced by service-sector firms edged up, with the December price index settling at 59.1, up from 55.6 a month earlier. The group's employment index hit 53.3, up from 51.6 in November, while the new-orders index fell to 54.4 from November's 57.1.

Meanwhile, the U.S. job market also showed some softening based on data released by the Department of Labor. Initial claims for unemployment insurance rose to a seasonally adjusted 329,000 for the week ended Dec. 30, up 10,000 from a week earlier, an increase that may be holiday related.

Economists said yesterday that the increase may be due to seasonal adjustment volatility related to the holidays. The government today will release its employment report for December.

The Commerce Department said U.S. factory orders bounced back during November from a big drop in October. Orders rose 0.9% to $394.3 billion, buoyed by a rise in orders for durable goods.

Holiday Sales Look Happier Than Expected (USAT)

By Jayne O'donnell

USA Today, January 5, 2007

December sales were disappointing for several retailers, but upscale stores and most discounters continued to do well, results out Thursday show.

Despite a somewhat gloomy picture, the National Retail Federation continues to predict that holiday season sales will be up 5% for 2006, thanks in large part to a strong November. The federation will release its final numbers next Friday.

Experts also caution that because gift cards are counted toward sales when they are redeemed, January could help retailers make up for lost sales earlier in the holiday season.

Darrell Rigby, head of management consulting firm Bain's global retail practice, questions those who say it's been a bad holiday retail season. He thinks sales will meet his company's prediction of up to 5.5% growth, which he notes will be well above the historical average of 4.3% growth for holiday seasons and "is comparable to the strong 5.4% that thrilled analysts last year."

"A host of high-end retailers all have done fairly well, and very price-sensitive retailers seemed to have done fairly well, too," says Carl Steidtmann, chief economist for Deloitte Research.

Still, there were some clear losers, especially Gap — which owns the Gap, Old Navy and Banana Republic stores. Gap same-store sales were down 9%, and Old Navy's dropped 10%.

Sabrina Simmons, Gap's senior vice president of corporate finance, said slow sales meant the company had to take big markdowns at Gap and Old Navy and warned that profits will continue to suffer as merchandise is cleared out this month.

Winners continue to be Target, which saw a sales increase of 4.1%, and Nordstrom, where sales were up 9%. And things aren't looking as bad at Wal-Mart as expected. The biggest retailer warned earlier that its sales would be up less than 1%, but it managed to beat 2005's December sales by 1.6%.

Sales for Federated Department Stores, which owns Macy's and Bloomingdale's, were up 4.4% and may have taken a bite out of some smaller retailers' business.

"The specialty apparel stores really seemed to struggle, which reflects the weakness of the apparel cycle," Steidtmann says.

He says the problems reflect how much discounting retailers needed to do to move merchandise. At both extremes, weather was a problem, he notes. There were store closings in some parts of the West before Christmas because of blizzards, while many other areas had record high temperatures that made cold-weather clothing a less likely purchase.

November retail sales were up 6.3%, NRF spokeswoman Ellen Davis says, so even with December sales likely coming in below 5%, NRF isn't worried.

"We still have wiggle room to make our forecast," she says.

Holiday-Sales Figures Leave Big Gaps (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112794

Holiday retail sales, once considered a barometer of the health of the economy, are no longer a crystal ball.

The same-store sales figures dozens of retailers reported yesterday don't reflect two big shifts in the way consumers shop these days. Gift cards have grown in popularity, but they aren't logged as sales until they are redeemed. Online sales, another booming category, also aren't included in the widely watched numbers.

BUILD YOUR OWN CHART

· Take a look1 at how a dozen major retailers, including Wal-Mart and Gap, have done over the past year, and use tools to build your own charts.

· See a sortable chart of results from about 20 retailers.2

Overall, retailers reported a 3.1% increase in December in sales at stores open at least a year, according to an index of 55 chains compiled by the International Council of Shopping Centers. That fell short of the 3.5% gain recorded a year earlier as well as the 3.6% increase in same-store sales the chains logged for the year as a whole.

But redemptions of gift cards could give retailers a lift in January, when roughly half of gift cards are typically used, often to buy full-price merchandise. Retailers could also get a boost later on if recipients fail to redeem the full value of the cards; in many states, retailers are allowed to book the unused value of gift cards as revenue if it isn't redeemed after a year or so. More than 10% of the value of gift cards purchased this year will go unused, according to Brian Riley, an analyst at Tower Group Inc., a Needham, Mass., research firm.

Both effects could be magnified by the sharp rise in gift-card sales. The National Retail Federation estimates that gift-card sales this holiday season totaled nearly $25 billion, up 34% from a year earlier and accounting for nearly a fifth of holiday gift spending.

HOLIDAY SALES NEWS TRACKER

A regularly updated look at holiday-sales news and trends3, including how stores are performing, what products are moving and how consumers are faring.

Despite the inconclusive nature of yesterday's reports, the numbers did show what a mixed bag retailing has become. Luxury stores continued to ride the boom in high-end fashion and accessories, while many mall-based specialty chains, including Gap Inc., AnnTaylor Stores Corp. and Chico's FAS Inc., rang up disappointing results. Department stores generally reported modest gains.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the nation's largest retailer, reported a 1.6% gain, stronger than the flat sales or gain of as much as 1% that the Bentonville, Ark., retailer had predicted a month earlier.

The December figure was Wal-Mart's strongest monthly showing since August and reversed a same-store sales decline in November. The retailer said that shoppers armed with gift cards have snatched up postholiday deals on electronics and fitness equipment, contributing to the likelihood of a 1% to 2% gain this month in sales at stores open at least a year.

One standout in December was Saks Inc., where same-store sales surged 11%, in a sign of a turnaround at the chain, which had struggled with fashions that were too young to suit its core customers.

More broadly, luxury sales are being fueled by an increase in foreign tourism. Nordstrom Inc.'s same-store sales rose a stronger-than-expected 9%, while Neiman Marcus Group Inc. posted a 7.1% gain.

"Some of the strength on the high end is well above the trend for the year," said Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, who notes that the luxury boom is now in its fourth year.

But economists are talking about the possibility of a broad slowdown in spending this year amid a shaky housing market, rising consumer debt, high energy prices and a slowdown in job and wage growth. "We're getting a very mixed picture," Mr. Niemira said, noting that a number of retailers yesterday warned that profits will be lower than expected.

Gap, in fact, cut its earnings forecast for the fiscal year for the third time in six months and announced that management and its board are now reviewing the strategies of the retailer's Gap and Old Navy brands.

The San Francisco company said it now expects to earn just 83 cents to 87 cents a share for the fiscal year ending this month, roughly a third less than its original forecast of $1.23 to $1.27 a share. It will likely be the company's worst full-year performance under Chief Executive Paul Pressler, who joined Gap in September 2002.

Before yesterday's announcement, company executives had said that they were confident about their Gap and Old Navy strategies and that customers were just proving slow in adjusting to changes they had made. Gap has been trying to upgrade the quality and design of its merchandise, while remodeling its stores and adding "clean" departments that stock classics like wool pants and turtlenecks.

Old Navy, hurt by competition from discounters such as Target Corp., has a new president and has been trying to regain its fashion footing. Its women's merchandise is now outperforming its men's and kids' products, but the chain continues to lose customers.

DOJ_NMG_0112795

Another disappointment: Federated Department Stores Inc., parent of Macy's and Bloomingdale's. Its 4.4% same-store sales increase fell short of its Nov. 30 forecast for a 5% to 8% increase. And the numbers don't include results from former May department stores that it acquired last year, but which have lagged since being converted to Macy's in September.

The Cincinnati company said it expects January same-store sales to grow 1.5% to 3% and fiscal fourth-quarter sales to be at the low end of expectations.

Warm weather in much of the country, which hurt sales of winter gear, appeared to keep a lid on sales at midtier department stores. J.C. Penney Co. posted a 2.6% gain -- roughly in line with estimates -- while archrival Kohl's Corp. reported a 3% increase. Dillard's Inc., of Little Rock, Ark., reported a sharper-than-expected 5% drop.

Department stores nevertheless continue to steal customers from struggling specialty apparel chains, said Dan Hess, chief executive of Merchant Forecast LLC, a New York consulting firm.

"The simple fact is that department stores are making changes -- the kind that specialty stores were making 10 years ago," he said. "They're making shopping environments more exciting, they're offering better customer service, and more newness and a wider variety in fashion."

Markets Finish Higher Despite Unease (USAT/AP)

By Joe Bel Bruno

USA Today, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK — Wall Street struggled but ultimately closed higher Thursday as a bounce in technology stocks and sharply lower oil prices helped investors brush off concerns about sluggish consumer spending.

Retailers' lackluster holiday sales reports initially sent major stock indexes significantly lower. Stocks climbed back after a drop in crude oil prices to below $56 a barrel raised hopes that cheaper gasoline might be on the way.

A broad advance from chipmaker stocks supported the market. Leading the way was Intel, which surged to its highest level in two weeks after Banc of America Securities said it expects fourth-quarter results will come in higher than expected.

The market's performance Thursday showed that investors remain uneasy about any economic data, especially after minutes from the Federal Reserve's last meeting indicated policymakers were in no hurry to cut interest rates. Mixed data on Thursday included disappointing housing and service-sector reports.

"People are thinking now that energy prices are coming down, and that gives a chance for technology and other sectors to perform better," said Scott Fullman, director of investment strategy for Hapoalim Securities USA. "The broader picture is that the economy continues to show signs of slowing, and that will continue through the first quarter."

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 6.17 points to 12,480.69. Broader stock indicators were higher. The Standard & Poor's 500 index edged up 1.74 points to 1418.34. The tech-dominated Nasdaq composite added 30.27 points to 2453.43.

Bonds moved higher, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.61% from 4.66% late Wednesday. Also sending bond yields lower was the Institute for Supply Management's services sector index for December, which showed growth slowed from November.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners 3-to-2 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Highlights:

ExxonMobil was among the biggest decliners on the Dow, falling $1.39 to $72.72.

·Intel, the second-biggest advancer in the S&P 500, rose 82 cents, or 4%, to $21.17. Banc of America Securities raised the company's fourth-quarter earnings estimate, saying the chipmaker will likely gain market share.

Rates On 30-Year Mortgages Unchanged (AP)

Associated Press, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Rates on 30-year mortgages were unchanged in the first week of the new year after posting three consecutive increases to close out 2006.

Mortgage giant Freddie Mac reported Thursday that 30-year, fixed-rate mortgages averaged 6.18 percent this week, the same as last week.

Analysts said the markets in recent days have gotten some confusing messages about how serious the current economic slowdown will be.

"Currently, the market is waiting for a clearer signal on the direction in which the economy is headed," said Frank Nothaft, Freddie Mac's chief economist.

For 2006, 30-year mortgages peaked at 6.80 percent in late July with rates trending lower for most of the rest of the year. That decline was welcomed by the embattled housing industry, which is in the grips of a severe downturn after five boom years.

The Freddie Mac survey showed that other types of mortgage rates were mixed this week.

DOJ_NMG_0112796

Rates on 15-year, fixed-rate mortgages, a popular choice for refinancing, edged up slightly to 5.94 percent, compared to 5.93 percent last week.

Five-year adjustable rate mortgages rose to 6.02 percent, up from 5.98 percent, but one-year adjustable rate mortgages fell to 5.42 percent, down from 5.47 percent last week.

The mortgage rates do not include add-on fees known as points. Thirty-year, 15-year and five-year mortgages each carried a nationwide average fee of 0.4 point. One-year ARMs carried a fee of 0.6 point.

A year ago, rates on 30-year mortgages stood at 6.21 percent while 15-year mortgages were at 5.76 percent, five-year ARMs averaged 5.78 percent and one-year ARMs were at 5.16 percent.

Pending Sales Of Existing Homes In U.S. Fell 0.5% (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, January 5, 2007

Jan. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Fewer Americans signed contracts to buy previously owned homes in November, suggesting weakness in the real-estate market may extend into the new year.

An index of signed purchase agreements fell 0.5 percent, a third consecutive decline, to 107 from 107.5 in October, the National Association of Realtors said today in Washington. The index was down 11.4 percent from November 2005.

The decline from the previous year has been narrowing since July, suggesting sales may be stabilizing, the group said. The improvement may also stem a weakening in home prices that threatens to check consumer spending, which accounts for more than two-thirds of the economy.

``Data over the past few months strongly suggest that home sales have stabilized and are possibly rising at a modest pace," said Abiel Reinhart, an economist at JPMorgan Chase Corp. in New York.

The year-over-year decline is down from a 16 percent drop registered in July.

Economists expected the index to rise 0.7 percent in November, according to the median of 17 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey, after a decline of 1.7 percent the month before. Estimates ranged from a drop of 1 percent to an increase of 2.1 percent.

``The index is pointing toward fairly stable home sales in the near future," David Lereah, the group's chief economist said in a statement. ``This is another indication that home sales likely bottomed out in September."

Back-to-Back Sales Gain

The Realtors' group reported last week that sales of previously owned homes unexpectedly rose 0.6 percent in November after rising 0.5 percent a month earlier. It was the first back- to-back increase gain since March 2005 and followed declines in the previous six month.

The index of pending home resales is considered a leading indicator of sales because it tracks contract signings. The Realtors' sales report tracks closings, which typically occur a month or two later.

Purchases of new homes, which are also based on signings, rose a greater-than-forecast 3.4 percent in November to an annual sales pace of 1.047 million, the Commerce Department also reported last week.

The existing-home sales report is based on a sample of about 40 percent of transactions in the multiple listing service used by real estate agents, while the pending-sales index covers about 20 percent.

Regional Declines

Pending resales decreased in three of four regions, today's report showed today. They fell 2.8 percent in the Northeast, 2.6 percent in the West and 1.1 percent in the South. Pending resales rose 4.8 percent in the Midwest.

Lower mortgage rates have boosted sales. The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage fell to 6.14 percent last month, the lowest since October 2005, from 6.27 percent in November, according to figures from Freddie Mac.

The sales gains are barely starting to make a dent in inventories. The number of previously owned homes for sale decreased 1 percent to 3.82 million last month, last week's sales report from the Realtors showed. The supply was just less than the record 3.861 million reached in July.

Figures from the Commerce Department showed the number of new homes completed and waiting to be sold were at a record 169,000 in November.

Lennar Corp.

Faced with a glut of unsold properties, builders are retrenching. Lennar Corp., the fourth-largest U.S. homebuilder, this week said it had its first quarterly loss in at least a decade after writing down property investments. Miami-based Lennar said it took the charge to write down land it now doesn't intend to purchase.

``Market conditions continued to weaken during the fourth quarter and we have not yet seen tangible evidence of a market recovery," Chief Executive Officer Stuart Miller said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0112797

The Federal Reserve is doing its part to prevent the housing slump from deepening by keeping its interest-rate target steady. Fed policy makers left the benchmark rate target at 5.25 percent at the past four meetings, after raising it 17 straight times since June 2004.

``Economic growth has slowed over the course of the year, partly reflecting a substantial cooling of the housing market,'' Fed policy makers said in a statement following their Dec. 12 meeting. ``The economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace on balance over coming quarters.''

The economy is likely to grow 2.5 percent this year after expanding at an annual pace of 2 percent in the last three months of 2006, according to the median estimate of economists surveyed early last month by Bloomberg News. The economy grew 3.3 percent a year on average in the last decade.

``While the housing cycle is far from complete, the probability it will cause a major decline in total economic activity is steadily falling,'' Douglas Lee, president of Economics From Washington, in Potomac, Maryland, said before the report.

Court Weighs Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 5, 2007

A case before the Kansas Supreme Court has become a key test of the rights of sperm donors who want to be involved with their offspring over the objection of the children's mothers.

The dispute, which has drawn national attention, involves a single woman, identified in court papers only as S.H., who gave birth to twins in May 2005 after being inseminated with the sperm of a friend, identified as D.H.

After the mother made it clear that she did not intend to share parenting, D.H. sued to establish paternity. He lost in a trial court because of a Kansas law that says the donor of sperm provided for artificial insemination is not the legal father of the child unless the donor and mother agree to it in writing.

The major question in the case is whether requiring such written agreements in cases involving sperm donors known to the mother, not anonymous donors from sperm banks, violates the donor's constitutional rights as a parent. Like Kansas, many states have legal hurdles for donors seeking parental status.

The case arises at a time of increasing advances in reproductive technology. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the numbers of women being impregnated with eggs fertilized outside the womb is significantly on the rise. There are no reliable statistics on methods of conception with donated sperm.

"It's clearly a broadening phenomenon," New York University sociology professor Judith Stacey says of artificial insemination with donor sperm. "All of this is tied to changes in the family, including women choosing to marry later and the gay and lesbian movement. What hasn't changed is women's desire to have children."

Most sperm donors are anonymous and waive parental rights. The move typically shields donors from demands for child support and protects mothers' privacy.

However, when the donor and the mother know each other, different expectations and legal complications can arise, as is the Kansas case and others in recent years from California to Pennsylvania. The cases reflect the lack of uniformity in laws regarding sperm donors, says American University law professor Nancy Polikoff, one of 20 family law professors who filed a brief in support of the Kansas mother. They say states traditionally have had broad latitude to define parentage on factors other than biology, such as marriage.

"Most of the time, even with a known donor, there is not an intention to be a parent," Polikoff says.

Among those backing the donor in the Kansas case is Linda Henry Elrod, director of the Children and Family Law Center at Washburn University law school in Topeka.

Elrod said the Kansas law should not treat anonymous and known donors the same: "A man who is the known genetic father and who steps forward to accept parental responsibility for his children automatically has those rights as a matter of constitutional law."

The Kansas Supreme Court is expected to rule by February.

First Black Governor Of Mass. Sworn In (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 5, 2007

Deval Laurdine Patrick was sworn in Thursday as the 71st governor of Massachusetts, the culmination of a longshot political campaign that also saw him become the state's first black chief executive and only the second elected in the nation.

DOJ_NMG_0112798

Amid springlike weather that embraced the state's first outdoor inaugural, Patrick placed his hand on a Bible once given to John Quincy Adams by "Amistad" slaves he helped free and repeated the oath recited to him by Senate President Robert Travaglini.

"We meet today on a singular occasion, more than the passing of title and honor, more than the ritual transfer of the power of government," Patrick, 50, told a crowd of thousands that stretched into Boston Common. "This is the occasion when the people charge new leadership to steward the public trust. It is a profound responsibility and I accept it humbly."

Worcester Mayor Timothy Murray also was sworn in as lieutenant governor by House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi. Murray will continue to hold both titles until Jan. 9, when he steps down as mayor.

Among those looking on were thousands of supporters who helped propel the political neophyte to a 21-point victory on Election Day. Seated in chairs at the base of the Statehouse steps were members of the Legislature and four past governors: Michael S. Dukakis, William F. Weld, Paul Cellucci and Jane M. Swift.

Also observing was L. Douglas Wilder, who became the nation's first black elected governor in 1990 when he was similarly inaugurated in Virginia. He now serves as mayor of the state's capital city, Richmond.

With his installation, Patrick ended a 16-year run of Republican rule that began in 1991, when Weld replaced Dukakis in the Corner Office. Former Gov. Mitt Romney, who decided against seeking a second term, did not attend the ceremonies, having left the building Wednesday night after taking a tradition-laden "lone walk" down the Statehouse steps.

Romney, who filed papers Wednesday to form a presidential exploratory committee, stayed at his Belmont home before heading into his new headquarters in the North End to work on his campaign for the 2008 GOP nomination.

The governor-elect started his day before dawn, continuing to work on his inaugural speech before making an unpublicized visit to Children's Hospital to visit ailing patients and their families.

"The governor-elect is very big on symbolism, just as he was on Election Day, when he finally spread the ashes of his late mother," said Patrick spokesman Steve Crawford.

Afterward, Patrick was whisked off in a motorcade escorted by State Police motorcycles to an interfaith service at the Old South Meeting House. The multidenominational service featured readings by ministers of various faiths, as well as a variety of music.

"I hope you can feel both the joy in this room and the sense of expectation that accompanies it," said the Rev. Peter J. Gomes, a religion professor at Harvard University, Patrick's alma mater. "You can't do what you are about to do on your own. You will need a lot of help."

Gomes also celebrated Patrick for heading up to the Statehouse earlier this week in an unsuccessful effort to lobby legislators not to hold a vote — and essentially kill — a 2008 ballot question proposing to ban gay marriage in Massachusetts.

"That was a great sign of things to come," Gomes said. "There is more to be done; this is why you have four years."

During a pre-inaugural reception at Union Station in Worcester on Wednesday night, the incoming governor urged Massachusetts citizens to retain the political energy that propelled him from first-time candidate to a 21-point winner on Election Day.

"Tonight and tomorrow, under what are predicated to be glorious and uncommonly fair skies, we will feel the energy and the satisfaction of what we built from nearly nothing over the course of two years," the governor-elect told a crowd of several thousand.

"But I ask you above all, to take a morsel of that feeling and tuck it away, because there will be tough times ahead. Change doesn't come easily to many, but change is what we are about and must be about," added the tuxedo-clad Patrick, who was joined on stage by his wife, Diane, and his running mate, Lt. Gov-elect Timothy Murray.

Murray drew a chuckle from his hometown audience when he presented a key to the city to his new boss.

"He has inspired us during the course of this campaign, and I say without reservation he will inspire us as governor," Murray said to cheers.

Patrick took the oath of office on a Bible given to John Quincy Adams by kidnapped Africans whom Adams helped free in the Amistad slave ship case he argued before the U.S. Supreme Court in 1841.

The governor-elect insisted on the outdoor venue both to accommodate more people than could fit inside the building, and to emphasize the inclusiveness of his new administration. It will be the 71st in the history of the commonwealth.

Afterward, Patrick scheduled a "youth inaugural" at the Shubert Theatre before capping the day with a tuxedo-optional ball at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. The featured musical performer was renowned cellist Yo-Yo Ma.

Over the weekend, Patrick planned to attend five regional receptions or inaugural balls, beginning Friday night in North Andover.

On Wednesday, Romney literally handed over the keys to the Corner Office.

DOJ_NMG_0112799

In keeping with the trappings of transferring power, Romney gave Patrick a pewter key to the governor's inner office as well as an 1884 Holy Bible, a set of Massachusetts General Laws and gavel in a box made from timbers from the USS Constitution.

"To serve another person is an honor. To serve a great people has been a great honor. To help another person is rewarding. To help many thousands of people has been immeasurably rewarding," Romney wrote in the Bible. "May God continue to bless the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

On his way out of the building, he paused to say goodbye to Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, whom Patrick beat in the gubernatorial election.

Massachusetts Swears In A Black Democrat As Governor (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 4 — In a ceremony rich with gestures of openness and symbols of conquering adversity, Deval L. Patrick, the first black governor of Massachusetts, took his oath of office on Thursday. He promised far-reaching changes in attitude and policy and asked people to "see our stake in each others' dreams and struggles as well as our own, and act on that."

In the state's first outdoor inauguration, part of four days of events intended to include people across the state, Mr. Patrick, the first Democratic governor here in 16 years, said, "For a very long time now we have been told that government is bad, that it exists only to serve the powerful and well-connected, that its job is not important enough to be done by anyone competent, let alone committed, and that all of us are on our own."

"Today we join together in common cause," he said, "to lay that fallacy to rest."

Mr. Patrick takes over from Mitt Romney, a Republican, who is planning to run for the presidency, and already Mr. Patrick has revealed many positions that oppose Mr. Romney's. The former governor did not attend the inauguration.

Mr. Patrick has said that he will restore $383.6 million in budget cuts made by Mr. Romney to social services and other programs, that he will reverse the former governor's agreement authorizing the state police to arrest illegal immigrants, and that a Romney-endorsed effort to remove some Massachusetts Turnpike tolls is unrealistic.

Mr. Patrick also said he might revoke some of the 200 11th-hour appointments Mr. Romney made to boards and commissions.

And, while Mr. Romney strongly backed a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, Mr. Patrick spoke out strongly against it this week, even as the legislature gave it first-round approval.

While the legislature is heavily Democratic in this heavily Roman Catholic state, many Democrats are more conservative than Mr. Patrick on issues like same-sex marriage. He also faces a budget deficit of about $1 billion. And it will not be easy to put into effect the state's new health insurance reform.

"I've never seen a governor who has such high expectations on him as Deval Patrick," said Jeffrey Berry, a political scientist at Tufts University. "Democrats regard him as something of a demigod. They expect him to be able to leap tall buildings in a single bound and pay for social services."

Paul Watanabe, a political scientist at the University of Massachusetts-Boston, said: "I think he's going to find that governing is a lot more challenging than being a candidate. And that the demands placed upon him by large numbers of individuals — a record number of people that voted for him — are going to be difficult to meet."

Mr. Patrick also faces criticism over his inauguration celebrations. While much was inclusive — the open-air ceremony, a town-meeting-like "youth inaugural" for students, and upcoming ceremonies in five other cities — there was also a gala whose cost was paid for largely by corporate donors, who were allowed to give up to $50,000 each.

At the inauguration itself, however, on one of the balmiest January days in memory, the tone was full of possibility, pride and humility. In a state where the legacy of busing and segregation still stings, Mr. Patrick, reared in poverty on the South Side of Chicago, took the oath on a Bible given to John Quincy Adams by Africans from the Amistad slave ship whom Adams had helped free.

Four previous Massachusetts governors were present, as was L. Douglas Wilder, the former governor of Virginia and the only other black since Reconstruction to have been a governor.

The populist timbre, and the high expectations of Mr. Patrick, were sounded early, with a benediction by Rabbi Jonah Pesner describing the multicultural electorate and the problems of poverty, violence and discrimination.

"Behind every face hides so many secrets — painful secrets of suffering," Rabbi Pesner said, urging the governor and the people to create "a commonwealth rebuilt, repaired and redeemed."

Among the crowd was Derward Jacobs, 60, who is disabled and who drove his scooter to the State House because "I felt like I should be here."

George Greenidge Jr., 35, leader of an alliance of black colleges, said, "Today is a beacon of hope."

DOJ_NMG_0112800

Mr. Greenidge added that Mr. Patrick had “re-engaged a constituency that really never was involved in state politics, especially people from lower economic backgrounds.”

Beth Gilbert, 52, of Norfolk, Mass., acknowledged the steep demands that confront Mr. Patrick, saying, “When you elect a Republican governor, part of their bargain is they don’t really believe that government can solve the people’s problems. That’s probably what’s led to higher expectations here.”

Mr. Patrick signaled he was aware of the difficulties.

“I am an optimist, but not a foolish one,” he said. “I see clearly the challenges before us.”

He added: “Change is not always comfortable or convenient or welcome. But it is what we hoped for, what we have worked for, what you voted for, and what you shall have.”

Four Stars Lead Early GOP Race (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

Could Mitt Romney, ex-governor of Massachusetts and not well known nationally, end up winning the Republican nomination for president in 2008?

In a word, yes - despite prospects that don't look particularly strong on paper, analysts say. The latest polling out of states with the earliest nominating contests, which begin in a year, shows Mr. Romney in single digits. Even in neighboring New Hampshire, he comes in fourth, behind Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who won the New Hampshire primary in 2000, former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

But in a week that saw Romney launch his presidential exploratory committee, allowing him to enter the all-important money race, the Republican field is fluid. Religious conservatives, a key GOP constituency, remain skeptical of Senator McCain. And his advocacy for a stepped-up US presence in Iraq has thrown his political future squarely in line with a war that few believe is going well.

Mr. Giuliani, well known for his 9/11 leadership, remains untested on the national political stage and holds liberal positions on social issues that put him at odds with many GOP primary voters (as well as a colorful personal life).

Speaker Gingrich has, for now, become a repository of support among conservatives, though his short tenure as speaker and his three marriages could cause him to wilt under the klieg lights.

Enter Romney: successful businessman, savior of the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics, with an attractive family. Having won the governorship of liberal Massachusetts as a moderate Republican in 2002, he then sought to remake his national image by adopting conservative positions on abortion, gay rights, and stem cells. But many Republicans remain leery. And among Evangelical conservatives, Romney's Mormon faith can also be a hurdle.

Still, in the end, political analysts can see a clear path by which Romney becomes the GOP nominee, almost by default. Republicans "want to win in November [2008]," says Ed Sarpolus, an independent pollster in Michigan who dismisses Gingrich's and Giuliani's chances. "If McCain self-destructs because of Iraq, even in New Hampshire they'll hold their nose and vote for Mitt Romney." Push to sell the Romney brand

Romney's single-digit numbers among Iowa and South Carolina Republicans can be attributed to low name recognition; he's just getting started in earnest. But New Hampshirites know Romney. Among GOP activists there, he is well-organized and has secured some big names, such as Tom Rath, who is stepping down as a national GOP committeeman to join Romney's campaign. But among regular folk, particularly those in the well-populated southern tier who consume Boston media, anti-Romney coverage has become a staple.

As a red governor of a solidly blue state with an eye on national office, Romney was caught in a tough place.

"Republicans are suspicious of what kind of Republican that makes him," says Dick Bennett, head of American Research Group, a nonpartisan polling firm. "I don't know what Republicans will end up wanting to have. He's in the hunt, but [among Republicans in New Hampshire] there isn't any loyalty to Massachusetts."

That's bad news for Romney.

Next January, Romney will be expected to perform respectably in New Hampshire - if not winning the primary, at least coming close.

"He's got to do well; it's right next door," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville. "There's no excuse for him."

If Romney can achieve that, he may find safe harbor in Michigan - his native state, where his late father remains a beloved former governor - and home to an early primary contest that will come soon after the first wave. Already, Michigan political analysts are assuming that their GOP primary will boil down to McCain versus Romney, with the usual caveats. And if Iraq remains the No. 1 issue on voters' minds a year from now, McCain may be in serious trouble.

DOJ_NMG_0112801

The question, though, is whether the Michigan primary will come in time for Romney. That ol' McCain magic

His first hurdle - doing well in New Hampshire - is a big one. McCain remains a rock star in the state, having kept alive his strong political machine from the 2000 primaries.

For Romney, local analysts don't see the Mormon issue hurting him much in New Hampshire, but they do see a problem in the drumbeat of negative Boston media about his tenure as governor.

"The media and the voters have a beef with him, because he pretty much abandoned ship a half year ago," says Tobe Berkovitz, a communications professor at Boston University and sometime Democratic political consultant. "My guess is that he saw himself as a lame duck no matter what, so why bang his head against the wall. ... He was trying to run for president, but it's also a pretty hopeless state for most Republicans to get their agenda achieved."

Mr. Sabato does not see Romney's challenges as insurmountable, including the need to get over his image as a flip-flopper on social issues.

"Opponents will criticize him and cite this memo and that memo," he says. "That's detail stuff. As long as people believe him when he says, 'Here's where I stand on "fill in the blank," ' and it's simple and to the point, they'll buy it."

Mr. Berkovitz says that, with time, Massachusetts's new, Democratic governor, Deval Patrick, could actually help Romney among Republicans in New Hampshire.

"If the people of New Hampshire see Massachusetts, with a Democratic governor going back to its old ways, Romney's stock could rise a little," he says.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Taking the pledge

Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, both Republicans and presidential hopefuls, have pledged not to raise taxes should they reach the White House.

The Taxpayer Protection Pledge, sponsored by Americans for Tax Reform, commits signers to "oppose any and all efforts to increase the marginal income tax rates for individuals and/or businesses ... and oppose any net reduction or elimination of deductions and credits, unless matched dollar for dollar by further reducing tax rates."

Mr. Romney signed on Sunday and Mr. Brownback signed on Monday, according to the tax reform group, which has offered the pledge to all candidates for federal office since 1987. To date, President Bush, 43 U.S. senators and 197 members of the U.S. House have signed the pledge, the group said.

Seven governors and more than 1,100 state legislators have signed the pledge as well.

"America needs leaders who are committed to protecting taxpayers, and signing our pledge demonstrates that kind of leadership," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. "By signing the pledge, Sam Brownback and Mitt Romney demonstrate allegiance to hardworking taxpayers nationwide. It is now up to the other candidates in the race to stand up to the challenge."

Provisional seating

Just because Rep. Vern Buchanan, Florida Republican, was sworn in yesterday doesn't mean that the Democrat-controlled House is on his side in his contested election.

Rep. Rush D. Holt, New Jersey Democrat, formally asked the House to recognize the court challenge in Florida's 13th Congressional District in the Sarasota area. Mr. Buchanan won by just 369 votes, but Democrat Christine Jennings contends that the electronic voting machines didn't work correctly because 18,000 people who voted in other elections did not vote in the House race.

On the House floor, Mr. Holt asked Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, whether a notice of contest had been filed with the clerk on behalf of Miss Jennings.

Mrs. Pelosi said the notice had been filed with the clerk.

"The House remains the judge of the elections of its members," Mrs. Pelosi said. "The seating of this member-elect is entirely without prejudice to the contest over the final right to that seat."

Mrs. Pelosi added that the Committee on House Administration is reviewing the contest.

Ralph G. Neas, president of People For the American Way Foundation, applauded the House leadership for making clear that Mr. Buchanan's time in Congress is provisional until the matter is resolved, the Associated Press reports.

DOJ_NMG_0112802

"Only after court proceedings and a congressional investigation seeking answers about the Sarasota undervote have run their course, and only after Sarasota's election problems have been remedied, should someone be permanently seated," Mr. Neas said.

Next ambition

Mark Dayton ended his one term as a U.S. senator yesterday, but the Minneapolis-St. Paul Star Tribune reports that the Minnesota Democrat is considering a run for governor in 2010.

The announcement was made as Mr. Dayton recounted his frustration with Congress, acknowledging that he had not been "as effective as I hoped to be when I arrived." For that, he blamed what he called the seniority-driven politics of the Senate, where he was in the minority party for the past four years.

"The Senate or the Legislature is a very reactive institution, and I think I'm much more effective personally and professionally being more proactive," he said.

Republicans reacted to a potential run for governor with incredulity, noting that Mr. Dayton recently gave himself an "F" for his Senate performance.

Patrick sworn in

Four former Massachusetts governors — Republicans and Democrats — attended the history-making inauguration of Gov. Deval Patrick, the nation's second black elected governor. Noticeably absent was former Gov. Mitt Romney.

Mr. Romney, who a day earlier took the first step in his run for president, said he watched the ceremony on television at his home in Belmont, a suburb about eight miles west of Boston. The Republican hopeful said he followed tradition by not attending the inaugural.

"My understanding is that the tradition in Massachusetts is that the outgoing governor does not attend the inauguration of the new governor," Mr. Romney said as he opened his presidential exploratory committee campaign headquarters in Boston's North End. "That's the way it was when I was sworn in, and my understanding is that's the case, and so I simply have followed tradition."

Attending the inauguration of the state's first black governor were former Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, the 1988 Democratic presidential nominee, and three former Republican governors: William Weld, Paul Cellucci and Jane Swift.

Former Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, who in 1990 became the first black elected to lead a state, also attended. Mr. Wilder is the mayor of Richmond.

Hip replacement

Hours after attending Gerald R. Ford's funeral, former President George Bush underwent surgery to replace his right hip, the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., announced yesterday, a day after the procedure.

The surgery, completed by 7 a.m. Wednesday, was a success, said Mayo Clinic spokesman Adam Brase. He said the 82-year-old was undergoing physical therapy and was expected to be released no later than tomorrow.

Mr. Bush traveled to the clinic late Tuesday after attending the Washington funeral of Mr. Ford, where he delivered a eulogy.

Mr. Bush had his left hip replaced at the Mayo Clinic in 2000. His wife, Barbara, had successful hip replacement surgery there in 1997.

At long last

"Two actions [Tuesday] in the Massachusetts state legislature increase the likelihood that voters in the Bay State will have the chance, in 2008, to vote on an amendment to the state constitution banning gay marriage," the New York Sun says in an editorial.

"Whatever one's view of gay marriage, it is something to behold that such a vote would take place fully five years, to the month, after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that gays have a right to marry in Massachusetts and more than four years after local officials in Massachusetts started granting marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Senator Kerry's position has been that he supports amending the constitution of Massachusetts to ban gay marriage but allow civil unions. 'I believe marriage is between a man and a woman,' Senator Kerry said in one of the 2004 presidential debates.

"When even a Democratic left-wing senator from Massachusetts doesn't side with the court's ruling, one gets the sense that proponents of gay marriage have yet to fully convince the public of the righteousness of their cause and that the court is out ahead of public sentiment on the issue."

The Anti-Clinton (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112803

John Edwards so wants to be President that he has spent the past four years campaigning for the job nonstop, practically living in Iowa since the 2004 election. He starts his second run for the Oval Office with a solid foundation: polls show him as one of the top Democratic contenders in the Hawkeye State, where voters liked his relaxed, guy-next-door manner and optimistic message in 2004 and have appreciated his many visits since. So what is the ex--North Carolina Senator and former vice-presidential nominee doing dumping the centrism that was key to putting the past two Democrats in the White House? Why is he tacking sharply to the left? As Jesse Jackson, Bill Bradley and Howard Dean could tell you, the most liberal of the Democratic contenders hasn't even won the nomination since 1972.

Although in 2004 he spoke eloquently of the "Two Americas"--rich and poor--if you looked at the fine print, Edwards backed ideas that originated in the centrist group that created much of Bill Clinton's agenda, the Democratic Leadership Council. Not this time. Many of the proposals for middle-class tax cuts from Edwards' first run won't be on his platform. Edwards says the country can't afford them and the bigger goals he wants to pursue. He says the problems in the U.S. are too pressing for the incremental solutions he proposed last time. So on the day he announced his presidential candidacy, Edwards boldly declared that reducing the deficit, a hallmark of the Clinton Administration, was less important to him than spending government money on, among other things, creating a universal health-care system and stopping global warming. His call to end poverty in the U.S. over the next 30 years by spending more than $15 billion each year sounds like a plan ripped straight from Lyndon Johnson's Great Society, the kind of Big Government liberalism Clinton shunned. Clinton did all kinds of things to show he was pro-business, while last August in Pittsburgh at a rally sponsored by an anti--Wal-Mart group, Edwards blasted the company for not paying its workers enough. Although Edwards got much of his advice in 2004 from centrists like Bruce Reed, Clinton's ex-- policy guru, the Edwards '08 campaign is being run by David Bonior, a former Michigan Congressman who strongly opposed Clinton's welfare reform and free-trade deals in the 1990s.

The economic populism Edwards talked about in 2004 and has now fully embraced was a winning formula in 2006 for many Democratic congressional candidates--even after Republicans depicted them as big spenders. But presidential candidates are judged by different criteria. Moving to the left doesn't answer one of the main critiques of Edwards in the last campaign: his lack of foreign policy experience. And taking up liberalism may be particularly dangerous for Edwards now that Democrats control Congress, since a G.O.P. opponent could argue that voters would have no check on spending if Edwards were elected.

But Edwards has to win his party's nomination first. If Hillary Clinton runs, she could immediately become the front runner, picking up much of the money and endorsements from the party establishment. The remaining energy, activism and cash that any rival would need to challenge her are on the left, not the center, as Edwards discovered in 2004, when Dean badly outraised him. That's why Edwards has spent the past two years actively courting the liberal netroots, even hiring Dean's old blogger, and wooing top union bosses. Edwards' attacks on Wal-Mart, which has discouraged its workers from forming unions, and his calls for universal health care are beloved by labor leaders, who could give Edwards a major lift in the early primaries in Iowa and Nevada, where their organizations are influential in Democratic politics.

The Edwards strategy would be complicated by a presidential run by Senator Barack Obama, which is why Edwards aides have watched Obama's rise with trepidation. Obama too is very well liked by the left. But both Obama and Hillary Clinton act like front runners: cautiously. They often deploy platitudes (witness Obama's speeches about hope) and look for easy targets (note Clinton's sermonizing on violent video games). That leaves room to emerge as the candidate who connects with Democratic voters by saying bold things that appeal to liberals, as when Edwards wrote "I was wrong" in voting for the Iraq war in an Op-Ed in the Washington Post in the fall of 2005. Dean employed this aggressive strategy in 2004 but couldn't win the nomination because he was viewed as too feisty and angry to be President. But if you're going to take your party in a new direction, it helps to be like Edwards, a smooth-talking Southern charmer with a light drawl whom Bill Clinton himself described as being able to "talk an owl out of a tree." That's where the ex-President's model may suit Edwards just fine.

Bill Clinton Turns Heads In The Senate (MACT)

By Mary-clare Jalonick

The Macon Telegraph, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Clinton who turned heads in the Senate Thursday was not Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, notwithstanding all the speculation about her running for president.

Former President Clinton cheerfully called out, "Hi, everybody!" as he strolled through the Senate Press Gallery past correspondents for The Associated Press, The Washington Post and the Wall Street Journal.

He was surrounded by a security entourage, but wasn't really seeking publicity. Something more mundane, actually. A bathroom, and then the swearing in of his wife for the new 110th Congress.

Then he headed for the men's room - followed by his Secret Service agents and a cadre of reporters. The questions were obvious:

DOJ_NMG_0112804

"Do you want to live in the White House again?

"I would like not to talk about it today," he said.

"Is Mrs. Clinton going to run for president?

"Ask her."

"All I know is, this is a happy day," Clinton added. "It's a great day for the largest number of women we've ever had in the Congress, a lot of new people coming in, I think it will be good. I'll be surprised if we don't see a lot of interesting, bipartisan things happening over the next six months."

And with that, Clinton made his way around to the visitors' gallery and sat down next to daughter, Chelsea. After a quick call on his cell phone - which is against Senate rules - he watched his wife as she chatted with her colleagues on the Senate floor.

Mrs. Clinton pointed to them and waved when she appeared on the Senate floor. In turn, they led a standing ovation when she took her oath.

---_

The galleries and the Senate floor constituted a who's who of politically active celebrities and former members gathered to watch Democrats take control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years.

Besides the former president, squished into the theater-style gallery seats were actor Richard Gere and singers Carole King and Tony Bennett.

The Senate floor was a big reunion of giddy Senate Democrats past and present. Former Sen. John Glenn of Ohio snickered about something with Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy. Chuck Robb, the Virginia Democrat ousted in 2000 by Republican George Allen, hung out in the center aisle with the Democrat who bumped Allen from power this year, Sen. Jim Webb.

And retired Sen. John Breaux of Louisiana, playfully hugged Mrs. Clinton as they both waved to her husband the former president and Chelsea.

Challengers Join Hands To Unseat Texas Speaker (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

DALLAS -- Two conservative Republicans from the Dallas area joined forces yesterday in a move to oust Texas House Speaker Tom Craddick.

But Mr. Craddick, a Republican legislator from Midland in western Texas, said he still had enough votes to win re-election to the post on Tuesday.

Rep. Brian McCall of Plano stunned his supporters yesterday by endorsing fellow Republican Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie at a press conference in Austin.

In their brief appearance, the two challengers vowed Mr. Pitts would win the speakership, but they refused to list their backers.

They said they did not want to expose the supporters to intense pressure before the vote.

"But I guarantee you," Mr. Pitts said, "the race is over."

Mr. Craddick's press secretary, Alexis DeLee, downplayed the development, calling it "just another version of the same story." She said Mr. Craddick remained "confident" of victory when the House convenes next week in Austin.

"Our numbers are continuing to grow," she added.

Mr. McCall, backed by many Democrats, was publicly criticized for having so many opposition-party supporters, which some Craddick allies cited as a strong reason to re-elect the speaker. The Democrats trail the Republicans by an 80-69 margin in the Texas House.

Mr. Craddick, who served 34 years before he was named the first Republican House speaker in January 2003, was easily re-elected in 2005.

Mr. Pitts said he would not release his list of backers because "they would risk retribution for being on that list."

He added, "That is why I am running for speaker of the House."

"We deserve a speaker who will lead by consensus, not by edicts," he said.

The head of the conservative Texas Eagle Forum warned Tuesday that to unseat Mr. Craddick would be to return power to Democrats.

"Our conservative agenda would be [dead on arrival]," said Cathie Adams. "We've worked too hard for too many years to win a Republican majority in the House just to hand it over to the Democrats."

Democratic caucus leader Jim Dunnam of Waco said the Republicans will control the House no matter who is speaker.

"The fact is: They have the majority and we're in the minority," Mr. Dunnam said.

Virginia's Moment Of Clarity (WP)

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

VIRGINIA Republicans ought to try getting out more often. They might get a bracing dose of voter sentiment.

That's what happened to Del. John J. Welch III, longtime stalwart of the fundamentalist, anti-tax wing of the state GOP that controls the Virginia House of Delegates. Until now, Mr. Welch, of Virginia Beach, has helped impede common sense by opposing all new funding proposals involving taxes to improve the state's crumbling, jampacked transportation network.

Mr. Welch was mugged by reality on Election Day, appropriately enough. That's when he discovered -- brace yourself -- that voters are furious about traffic, furious about the legislative stalemate on transportation funding in Richmond and furious enough to do something about it in state legislative elections this fall. "I worked the polls for 13 hours," Mr. Welch told reporters, "and people told me they want something done. They don't like taxes, but they want action."

Now Mr. Welch wants to add a dime per gallon to Virginia's gas tax, which was last raised in 1986 and ranks among the lowest in the nation. His proposed increase, to 27.5 cents a gallon from the current rate of 17.5 cents, would yield about $522 million a year in road and rail funding -- about half of what's needed to make a dent in the problem.

Well, better late than never. Unfortunately, Mr. Welch's clear-eyed proposal was met with icy silence from his stay-at-home Republican colleagues in the House, many of whom have signed no-new-taxes pledges. That proves they lack any serious, long-term plan to pay for the billions of dollars in transportation improvements needed around the state.

By contrast, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) proposed a package yesterday that meets the state's transportation problem head-on. It would, for starters, broaden the powers of localities to reject development proposals and slow growth if local roads are too crowded. And it would yield $5.25 billion in new revenue over the next six years -- the first fresh funding for the state's beleaguered roads in a generation.

The governor's package, similar to but slightly smaller than one he offered a year ago, was mocked by the GOP's anti-tax ideologues as "deja vu all over again." It is probably dead on arrival in the House, which would rather posture than fix that state's most urgent problem.

Still, the impasse between Mr. Kaine and the House Republicans provides a useful moment of clarity. The governor, who understands that no transportation gain is possible without the pain of new taxes, is determined to expose the House Republicans for the obstructionists they are. And the House Republicans give every indication that they are willing to oblige him. That should make for a stark, and easy, choice for voters come November.

Rice Announces $16M In Aid For Somalia (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday the U.S. will provide $16 million in aid to Somalia and said the installation of a new government there gives Somalis a chance to move beyond two decades of chaos.

Rice announced $11.5 million in food aid for the country on the Horn of Africa, $1.5 million in nonfood assistance and $3.5 million to help refugees.

In a written statement, she said creation of a U.N.-backed government represents a "historic opportunity" for Somalis to end their recent spate of "warlordism, extreme violence and humanitarian suffering."

Rice has dispatched her top aide for African affairs, Jendayi Frazer, to the region for discussions on promoting a peacekeeping force for Somalia and to urge a political dialogue leading to national reconciliation.

State Department spokesmwan Sean McCormack said Frazer held talks with Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni and Ethiopian president Meles Zenawi.

Frazer will meet with diplomats from Europe, Africa and international organizations to coordinate future steps in Somalia.

McCormack said Frazer has no plans to visit Somalia, but he raised the possibility that she could be part of an international delegation that would travel there.

Troops Fight Militiamen In The South (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 4 -- Somali government troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers battled about 600 Islamic militiamen Thursday on the southern tip of this Horn of Africa country, and U.S. Navy forces prevented the Islamic fighters from fleeing by sea, authorities said.

Somalia's interior minister, Hussein Farah Aideed, said thousands of Islamic fighters were still hiding in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0112806

"There are 3,500 Islamists hiding in Mogadishu and in the surrounding areas, and they are likely to destabilize the security of the city," he said.

Kenya has closed its border because of concerns that the militiamen might slip across. That has prevented thousands of Somali refugees from seeking safety in Kenya, U.N. officials said.

Somali gunmen also attacked an oil tank truck near Mogadishu, wounding three people, and a hand grenade was thrown at Ethiopian troops backing the interim government in the capital, a resident said, according to [a] news agency. No one was hurt in the latter incident.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that the United States will provide $16 million in aid to Somalia and that the installation of a new government there gives Somalis a chance to move beyond two decades of chaos.

Rice has dispatched her top aide for African affairs, Jendayi E. Frazer, to the region for discussions on promoting a peacekeeping force for Somalia and to urge a political dialogue leading to national reconciliation.

US Helps Contain Somalia's Islamist Forces (FT)

By Stephen Fidler And William Wallis

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

A US-led naval task force off the Somali coast has been boarding ships in recent days as part of efforts to prevent Islamist militants fleeing the country.

The task force is taking part in a broader US military effort to stop Islamist fighters in Somalia moving into neighbouring countries following a rout by Ethiopian forces. Kenya has officially closed its border with Somalia on in an effort to stem the transit of militants, officials said.

The US has offered tacit support to the Ethiopian-led offensive in support of Somalia's transitional government and Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, hailed the military victory as a "historic opportunity" for the war-ravaged country.

The US has also said that it is determined to prevent terrorists escaping from the aftermath of the fighting.

"We...are going to be working closely with states in the region to ensure that these individuals aren't able to transit those borders and exit Somalia," Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman, said on Wednesday.

Officials from Europe, the US, Africa and the Middle East are due to meet in Nairobi on Friday to discuss deployment of a peacekeeping force for the region.

Yoweri Museveni, the Ugandan president said on Thursday at a joint news conference in Addis Ababa with Meles Zenawi, Ethiopian prime minister, that Uganda is ready to provide peacekeepers for the force. "The troops are ready but I have to consult the speaker of parliament. As soon as parliament approves, they will be sent to Somalia," he said.

Earlier Jendayi Frazer, the US assistant secretary of state who was also visiting Ethiopia, said Mr Museveni had promised to provide between 1,000 and 2,000 soldiers. She hoped a peacekeeping force could be ready by the end of the month.

Mr Zenawi has pressed for the rapid deployment of peacekeepers, seen by international and regional diplomats as providing an exit strategy for Ethiopia.

Ethiopian officials said fighting with Islamists continued in Somalia's southern tip on Thursday, near the Kenyan border. The US ships are operating in international waters off the Somali coast. A spokeswoman for US Central Command said that while a number of boardings had taken place she could not confirm that any individuals had been apprehended.

A Kenyan official was quoted by AFP saying that four Ethiopian helicopters, op-erating on information from a US satellite, had at-tacked three vehicles possibly carrying Islamist leaders close to the Kenyan border. The individuals apparently escaped, and US officials could not be reached to confirm any American role.

A separate US-led task force has been operating out of Djibouti since 2003 with more than 1,500 military and civilian personnel aimed at helping countries in the Horn of Africa to deal with terrorism. The force has provided military help to Ethiopia to bolster its ability to protect its border and ports.

However, a spokeswoman said that the "internationally recognised" transitional government of Somalia had not invited US forces into the country and no US troops were operating there.

U.S. Ships Hunt For Al Qaeda Off Somalia (WT/LDT)

By Mike Pflanz, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya -- U.S. Navy warships yesterday stepped up patrols off Somalia, boarding fishing boats and oil tankers to search for al Qaeda agents who fled after their Islamist allies were chased into hiding.

DOJ_NMG_0112807

At the same time, the State Department's chief Africa diplomat, Jendayi Frazer, met with Ethiopia's prime minister for the first time since Ethiopian troops led the advance that crushed the fundamentalist Islamic Courts Union that had ruled much of Somalia until a few weeks ago.

Miss Frazer hoped peacekeepers drawn from African nations would be deployed in Somalia "by the end of January."

Uganda responded yesterday, saying it was ready to send peacekeepers as soon as its parliament approves the plan, [a] news agency reported.

Offshore, the USS Ramage, a guided-missile destroyer, and the USS Bunker Hill, both from the U.S. 5th Fleet, were among several vessels dispatched from the British-led Combined Task Force 150, based in Bahrain, to waters off Somalia.

"Coalition forces will continue routine operations in this unstable area as long as the need exists for our presence," said the task force's commander, Commodore Bruce Williams of Britain's Royal Navy.

Meanwhile, a reported audio tape message by al Qaeda's No. 2 leader surfaced today, urging Somali Islamists to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla campaign of suicide and other forms of attacks against Ethiopian forces in Somalia, [a] news agency reported from Dubai, United Arab Emirates.

"As happened in Iraq and Afghanistan, when the world's strongest power was defeated by the campaigns of the mujahedeen troops going to heaven, so its slaves shall be defeated on the Muslim lands of Somalia," said Ayman al-Zawahri, deputy to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

"You must ambush, mine, raid and [carry out] martyrdom campaigns so that you can wipe them out," he said.

The tape was posted on a Web site used by militant Islamist groups.

The United States reportedly has played a key role behind the scenes in the recent clashes in Somalia. Analysts say this contributed to the sudden, complete routing of the Islamic Courts Union.

"All of us in the international community were quite surprised how fast the [Islamist movement] melted away and lost support," said Miss Frazer, assistant secretary of state for Africa.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced that the U.S. government would provide an initial $16 million package of humanitarian aid to Somalia for food, relief supplies and help for refugees.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States would be open to more short- and medium-term assistance for Somalia, saying Islamist militia forces still could prove a threat to the shaky government in Mogadishu.

Miss Frazer said U.S. intelligence suspected the Islamist leaders had been hiding in Mogadishu, the Somali capital, but that they may have fled and their whereabouts were unknown.

Islamist leaders are being hunted near Somalia's border with Kenya. Kenya has closed its side of the border to stop the militias from fleeing, but said it was not blocking refugees from Somalia. However, aid agencies have complained that closing the border leaves 1.8 million Somalis without access to humanitarian assistance.

Security sources in Nairobi said intelligence from U.S. spy satellites had been passed to Ethiopian defense forces ahead of an attack Tuesday on a convoy in southern Somalia, which was said to include Islamic Courts leaders.

Four Ethiopian helicopters dropped six bombs on the position, Kenyan police said, but failed to destroy the convoy. U.S. military officials declined to comment.

Ethiopian forces helped Somalia's internationally recognized interim government drive out the Islamists from Mogadishu last week. The Islamists have vowed to carry out guerrilla attacks across Somalia and in Ethiopia.

Somali Government Seeks To Tighten Its Grip Amid Chaos (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 4 — A hand grenade was tossed into a government army compound on Thursday night in Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, in yet another sign of growing chaos in the country.

Just days after Ethiopian-led troops helped rout once powerful Islamist forces in Somalia and install a new government in the capital, security seemed to be unraveling across the country.

The violence is surging on two fronts: antigovernment attacks and increased banditry, both of which were virtually unheard of during the Islamists' short-lived reign.

Witnesses said that shortly after nightfall, a man in a pickup truck flung a grenade over a wall and into a compound that housed Ethiopian and government soldiers. Apparently, no one was seriously hurt and the pickup truck escaped in a blaze of gunfire.

In northern Mogadishu, residents said that four people were killed Wednesday night after bandits fired a bazooka at a truck whose driver refused to pay an extortion tax. Unauthorized checkpoints have popped up all over the city, reminiscent of the years of anarchy when clan-based militias carved up Mogadishu — and much of the rest of Somalia, for that matter.

DOJ_NMG_0112808

In Dhagtur, in central Somalia, Shabelle radio reported Thursday that five people, including two children, were killed by a tribal militia during a gun battle. A dispute over a well was cited as the possible cause.

But despite the worsening violence, Somalia's transitional government is moving to consolidate its tenuous grip on power. On Thursday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, the veterinarian who is now prime minister, appointed more than 30 new judges, including two women.

"Quite soon, the police stations in Mogadishu will be operational," Mr. Gedi said. "If a criminal is arrested, the police will have the access to put the criminal on trial."

Since Somalia's central government collapsed in 1991, the wheels of justice have rusted over, leaving few functioning police stations, jails or courts.

Mr. Gedi also pushed ahead with his disarmament plan, extending until Saturday a deadline for turning in guns and threatening house-to-house searches if the guns were not surrendered.

In Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, the president of Uganda, Yoweri Museveni, announced Thursday that Uganda was ready to volunteer a battalion of around 800 soldiers to serve as peacekeepers in Somalia. The African Union is trying to cobble together a peacekeeping force to take the place of Ethiopian troops and lend much-needed muscle to the transitional government.

The transitional government is still battling the last remnants of the Islamist forces, who have fled to a remote, heavily forested area in southern Somalia along the Kenyan border. Somali officials said that several hundred Islamist fighters were cornered, and that it was only a matter of days until the Islamist movement, which had ruled much of Somalia for the past six months until Ethiopian forces intervened, was finished for good.

Somalis Adapt Warily, Pragmatically To New Order In Capital (WP)

By Stephanie Mccrummen

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 4 -- Among the first things Mohamed Abtidon did when the Islamic Courts movement came to town in June was to buy a fancy cellphone, a slim $360 Motorola. Streets once ruled by thieving, bribing warlords finally felt safe, he said, and he walked around chatting with abandon.

Since the Islamic movement was swept from power last week, men draped with AK-47s have appeared once again along the sandy lanes in his neighborhood, and with them a feeling of menace, to which Abtidon has adapted almost instinctively. He put the fancy phone away and is now using an old battered one that he keeps shoved deep in his pocket.

"I switched back to the one I used when the warlords were here," he said. "And I put it on vibrate, because I don't want to let them know I have a phone."

Mogadishu is a consummately unpredictable city, a place where trust in the future is gauged by the ups and downs of the local gun market. In the past 15 years, it has experienced the fall of a dictator, brutal civil war, the rise of a coalition of warlords and the warlords' overthrow by the Islamic Courts movement. Last week, all was undone again when the Islamic fighters were run out by Ethiopian troops backing a fragile, secular government that is now racing to establish itself before the old thuggish militias return.

For ordinary Somalis caught in the flux, day-to-day life has been driven less by ideological allegiance than sheer pragmatism and constant recalibrations.

"However things are going, we just adapt to it," said Mohamed Dere, who works for a telecommunications company in the city and is also an artist. "The reality is we need peace only, however we get it. With the Islamic Courts, the practical side was they gave us peace, so that was the wager."

Like many Somalis, he protected himself with a gun when the warlords were in power, stowed it away when the Islamic Courts took over and brought it out again when the new government pushed the Islamic side out. And like many, he was uncomfortable with the social restrictions the Islamic leaders imposed. For example, they had frowned upon, though did not police, secular music and dancing. But Dere said he feels far more oppressed at the moment by insecurity.

"We are hostages right now," he said. "We have no freedom."

In one way, people here said, Mogadishu was liberated by the Islamic Courts movement, which managed to rid the city of the militias and roadblocks that had functioned like a hundred Berlin Walls. Movement was so restricted that some residents had not seen friends and relatives in years, and children living only minutes from the crashing Indian Ocean had never laid eyes on the turquoise water.

So when the Islamic movement took power in June, Bile Dirie, 36, packed up his family in a Land Cruiser on a few glorious Fridays, drove the entire length of the city's coast and swam in the ocean. He moved out of his apartment in the Baraka neighborhood of Mogadishu, the only place he had felt safe under the warlords' rule, and followed his fancy to a more expansive area called Medina, where he got a bigger house for less money.

DOJ_NMG_0112809

When the Courts movement was pushed out last week, however, he feared the return of the warlords' militias and went back to his old neighborhood, an area that appears to have been disassembled and reassembled dozens of times, with its stick-and-tarp markets and loosely hinged doors, spirals of barbed wire and tangled nests of phone lines. Only herds of goats seem to roam Mogadishu freely these days, wandering the sandy streets past trees and rusted hulls of tanks.

"I don't drive around now," Dirie said, sitting in his office. "The militias are still shy, but that's fading."

Mogadishu is a place where, quite literally, the center has not held. Since 1991 there has been no central government in the capital, whose approximate middle is a bombed-out spectacle of ruin -- crumbling Italian buildings, broken colonnades and 800-year-old mosques blasted to abstraction.

On Thursday, Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi officially opened a district court near the seaside wasteland. Around noon, workers were hauling wooden benches into a whitewashed building and dusting off its tiled floors. The Islamic movement had rehabilitated the court, which is near the city's crumbling ruins, and kicked out most of the clerks, such as Duale Mohamed, who was among those taking up their posts again. He said that less desirable things were coming back, too.

While the Islamic Courts had imposed some discipline on electricity access and prices in his neighborhood, for instance, Duale said that prices were reverting to the whims of clan leaders who "can charge you whatever they like."

Gedi reiterated on Thursday that his top priority is disarmament, but the process has gone badly, with certain warlords wondering why they should trust a government they consider dominated by rival clans, and businessmen wondering who will protect them. Gedi said the government will start forcibly taking weapons Friday.

As that deadline approached, another layer of unease settled on an uneasy city. In one market, a money-changer said he was again hiring gunmen to escort him home from work. "Most people, they are afraid there will be no security," he said.

Besides getting rid of the flashy cellphone, Mohamed Abtidon has lately replaced his gold Rolex with a cheap plastic watch to avoid being mugged by the thugs Somalis call moryan. If he takes a taxi, he said, he takes an old rusty one instead of a newer car.

When the Islamic Courts were in control, Abtidon, 26, who consults for a relief group, dressed more conservatively, tucking in his shirt, wearing a nice belt and leather loafers. These days, though, "you have to dress like them," he said, referring to the moryan. So he wears his shirt untucked.

"And I have started wearing these shoes," he said, showing his old rubber sandals.

"When the Courts left, it has become a new life," he said, in a manner more grim than enthusiastic. "Now has come a problem bigger than not being able to watch a film. Now, you could lose your life."

Somalia's Chance (WP)

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

AN UNEXPECTED turn of events in Somalia has given the Bush administration a rare opportunity to help stabilize a failed state that has been a harbor and breeding ground for al-Qaeda. In less than two weeks of fighting, troops from neighboring Ethiopia appear to have decimated the Islamic Courts movement, which had controlled most of the southern half of Somalia during the past six months. Foreign jihadists, including some al-Qaeda members, have fled the capital, while many of their Somali allies have melted back into the population. A U.N.-sanctioned transitional government has taken up residence in Mogadishu, marking the first time the country has had a recognized and unchallenged government since 1991.

The development has confounded -- at least temporarily -- the numerous Western "experts" who predicted that Ethiopia's intervention would trigger a regional war or an Iraq-style quagmire and who blamed the United States for tacitly supporting an attack on a Taliban-style regime. In fact, many Somalis seemed to welcome the end of the Islamic Courts' stringently fundamentalist rule. But no one -- least of all Western outsiders -- can predict how long the relative quiet will last. The remaining jihadists may be planning an insurgency; warlords driven out by the Islamists are said to have reappeared in Mogadishu. The transitional government, an unwieldy coalition of clan leaders, is weak, and troops sent by Ethiopia's predominately Christian government are unlikely to be tolerated long in Somalia, given longstanding animosity between the two countries.

Frequently slow or stumbling in its response to developments in Somalia, the administration appears to recognize the chance for an advance in the global war with al-Qaeda: Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi E. Frazer, who has conducted recent U.S. diplomacy, was in Ethiopia yesterday and is expected to chair an international contact group meeting today in Nairobi. U.S. and European policy is aimed at mobilizing a peacekeeping force, composed primarily of Africans, that could deploy in southern Somalia in place of Ethiopian troops and prop up the transitional government. That government would, in turn, be pushed to negotiate with Somali clans that supported the Islamic Courts.

DOJ_NMG_0112810

An immediate problem will be finding sufficient troops, funding their deployment and backing them up. Uganda has volunteered 1,000 soldiers, and Nigeria and South Africa expressed interest, but those commitments need to be firmed up and others secured. Western governments are reluctant to send their own troops to Somalia, given the disastrous end to a U.S.-led nation-building effort in the early 1990s. But the Bush administration, which by yesterday had not made any specific commitment to the mission, needs to be ready to quickly provide funding and logistical backing for an African force. If NATO airlift and supply assets can be mobilized, they should be. It may be that the prospect of stabilizing Somalia and eliminating it as a harbor for al-Qaeda will prove to be a mirage, but the administration must seize on the possibility that it is real.

Pentagon To Train A Sharper Eye On Africa (CSM)

By Richard Whittle

The Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

Africa, long beset by war, famine, disease, and ethnic tensions, has generally taken a backseat in Pentagon planning - but US officials say that is about to change.

One of Donald Rumsfeld's last acts before Robert Gates replaced him last month as Defense secretary was to urge President Bush to let the Pentagon create a new Africa Command to pay more attention to the troubled continent. Mr. Bush is said to have agreed to the idea and is expected announce it early this year.

The creation of the new command will be more than an exercise in shuffling bureaucratic boxes, experts say. The US government's motives include countering Al Qaeda's known presence in Africa, safeguarding future oil supplies, and competing with China, which has been courting African governments in its own quest for petroleum, they suggest.

The expected new command "speaks to the fact that Africa now matters to the US government as it never has in the past," says Melvin Foote, chief executive officer of Constituency for Africa, a nonprofit group devoted to strengthening US relations with African governments.

The idea of an Africa Command has been discussed for years, but Mr. Foote says it has taken on new urgency in light of recent events.

· Islamists took over Somalia last June and ruled until this week, when Ethiopian troops drove them out of power.

· China hosted a conference of African presidents in Beijing last year - and made about $5 billion in deals to build infrastructure in Africa for oil. A source of oil

The US gets about 10 percent of its oil from Africa, notes Foote. Some experts say it may need to rely on the continent for as much as 25 percent by 2010. "With all the instability in the Middle East, there's some thought that we had better build partnerships in Africa," he says.

A senior Pentagon official, who requested anonymity because announcing the decision is the president's prerogative, said current events have less to do with the move than does Africa's instability. "Africa's a place with a lot of crises," this official says. Bush is "on record saying he doesn't want another genocide on his watch. This is a way of ensuring that there's a military command, a four-star, paying attention."

Currently, responsibility for Africa is divided among three of the Pentagon's five regional "unified commands," each headed by a four-star general or admiral who reports to the president.

The European Command, responsible for Europe and Russia, oversees US defense activities for most of continental Africa. The Central Command covers largely Arab northeast Africa as part of its oversight of the Middle East and sections of Central and Southwest Asia. The Pacific Command is responsible for Madagascar and the waters off southeast Africa. Need for a 'streamlined' strategy

Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter, a Pentagon spokesman, says the division of labor "causes some difficulty in trying to ... execute a more streamlined and comprehensive strategy when it comes to Africa."

The Pentagon official who requested anonymity says the new command will exclude Egypt, a major player in Middle East politics. And Central Command will retain responsibility for the Horn of Africa for about 18 months while the Africa Command gets set up, the official says.

After the 9/11 attacks, the Pentagon created a Horn of Africa joint task force under Central Command that is headquartered in Djibouti, but the senior official said the Africa Command's headquarters will be in Stuttgart, Germany, where the European Command is based, for the time being.

The Horn of Africa task force includes about 1,500 troops whose mission is to detect and defeat transnational terrorism, primarily through offering military training and humanitarian aid to friendly governments. Those troops constitute the bulk of the US military presence in Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0112811

African countries won't see much difference in the US military presence on the ground under the new command, says Herman Cohen, assistant secretary of State for African affairs under the first President Bush. "They're already getting a lot of attention from the US military," he says. The Defense Intelligence Agency "has built up its offices throughout Africa in US embassies. Right after the cold war, they reduced a lot, but they've built back up."

The new Africa Command is "long overdue," says Susan Rice, assistant secretary of State for African affairs under President Bill Clinton. Sept. 11 "did what common sense should have done earlier, which is to elevate the understanding ... in the Pentagon of our strategic stake in Africa," she says. "Africa has the preponderance of the world's weak and failed states, and we ignore it at our peril."

No Breakthrough After Israel-Egypt Talks (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi And Steve Weizman

AP, January 5, 2007

A summit between the leaders of Israel and Egypt on Thursday fell short of its goal of igniting a new round of Mideast peace efforts, highlighting the significant disagreements between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

Speaking at a news conference after the meeting, Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak pushed Israel to hold talks with Syria and pursue peace with the Palestinians, despite the rise of the Islamic militant group Hamas. He also condemned an Israeli raid in the West Bank on Thursday that killed four Palestinian civilians and wounded 20 others.

Mubarak, a key mediator between the Palestinians and Israel, stressed that "Israel's and the region's security would be achieved only by serious endeavors toward peace."

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert apologized for civilian casualties in the raid, which began when undercover troops seized four fugitive Palestinians in a Ramallah vegetable market, sparking a ferocious gunbattle with militants.

"Things developed in a way that could not have been predicted in advance. If innocent people were hurt, this was not our intention," he said.

The summit came amid international calls for Israel and the Palestinians to make a renewed effort to end their dispute in the interest of stabilizing the Middle East, particularly Iraq. It also comes ahead of an expected Mideast visit by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this month.

Egypt is eager to broker peace between the Palestinians and Israel, and Mubarak on Thursday said he would welcome a meeting bringing together himself, Olmert, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Jordan's King Abdullah II.

"After the situation is crystalized, there is no objection for a quartet meeting," he said.

But significant obstacles are blocking a new peace process, including the continued captivity of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-linked militants in June. Egypt has been trying to broker a deal for Cpl. Gilad Shalit's release, and many in Israel were hoping for a breakthrough at the summit.

A Hamas official on Sunday claimed progress was made toward an agreement to exchange Shalit for some of the 9,100 Palestinians in Israeli prisons. A senior Hamas official in Syria, Moussa Abu Marzouk, said Thursday that his group was also ready to give Israel a video of Shalit if it agreed to release women prisoners and other detainees. He said in a phone interview that Shalit is alive.

Olmert thanked Mubarak for his efforts to secure Shalit's freedom, and said Israel was ready to meet with Abbas. However, he rejected having any dealings with Hamas, which controls the Palestinian Cabinet and calls for Israel's destruction.

"We are ready at any time to meet with Abu Mazen (Abbas) and have real negotiations and have an atmosphere for peace," Olmert said, adding that Abbas was a "partner for peace" and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal was not.

Mubarak responded that not everyone in Egypt supported its peace agreement with Israel, but it did not stop Egypt from signing the treaty.

The Egyptian president hosted Abbas at a summit here on Dec. 27, four days after Olmert met with Abbas in a meeting intended to thaw relations between the sides. The Olmert-Mubarak meeting was expected to build on those earlier efforts, but did not appear to have achieved any major breakthroughs.

Mubarak expressed concern about the violence between Israel and the Palestinians and between rival Palestinian factions, but said they should not dampen peace efforts.

"We have to work with both sides, with the Palestinian side to reach a cease-fire among them. They must unite and solve their problems, and then we can see how to deal with the Israeli side so they can sit at the negotiating table and reach peace. It is a tough task but can't be skipped," he said.

Olmert said he expressed concerns to Mubarak about the ongoing smuggling of weapons and money from Egypt into the Gaza Strip. Israel and the West have imposed a financial embargo on the Hamas government, but top Hamas leaders have kept the government afloat by bringing suitcases stuffed with millions of dollars over the border.

DOJ_NMG_0112812

Mubarak said he was doing his best to stop weapons smuggling into Gaza, but said the cash-filled suitcases were not illegal as long as they were declared.

He also urged Israel to accept Syria's offers to restart peace talks that broke down seven years ago. Olmert has rejected the offers, citing Syria's support for Hamas and the Hezbollah guerrilla group in Lebanon.

Israeli Raid Overshadows Olmert's Talks With Mubarak (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 4 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert met President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt on Thursday evening in an effort to give momentum to the Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations. But the meeting was overshadowed by an Israeli raid in the West Bank in which four Palestinians were killed and 20 wounded.

Mr. Mubarak was clearly embarrassed by the timing of the raid, hours before the meeting of the two leaders in an Egyptian Red Sea resort town, Sharm el Sheik. He called it a hindrance to peace efforts and told Mr. Olmert that Egypt "rejects and is indignant at the military operation."

"Israel's security cannot be achieved through military force but by serious endeavors toward peace," Mr. Mubarak added at his news conference with Mr. Olmert.

Mr. Olmert said that he was sorry that innocent Palestinians were hurt, but that Israel would defend itself and was acting to arrest "terrorists who had killed Israelis."

He gave no explanation for the timing of the daylight raid, a vain attempt to arrest a wanted militant, which used unusual force in normally quiet Ramallah. He said Israeli troops returned fire, but did not initiate it. "Things developed in a way that could not have been predicted in advance," he said. "If innocent people were hurt, this was not our intention."

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, with whom Mr. Olmert met last week, condemned the raid, saying in a statement that it "proved that the Israeli calls for peace and security are fake." Palestinians have been calling for an extension of a Gaza truce with Israel to the West Bank.

"The continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace," Mr. Abbas said.

Mr. Olmert and Mr. Mubarak said Egypt was continuing its efforts to secure the release of an Israeli corporal captured in June by militants, offering in exchange several hundred Palestinian prisoners held by Israel. There had been speculation that the two men might be able to announce more concrete progress on the matter, which is blocking more substantive discussions with Mr. Abbas.

Egyptian officials said that they were discussing another Olmert-Abbas meeting with Egyptian and Jordanian leaders present. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to visit the region this month.

It was an unusual and emotional day for Mr. Olmert, during which he commemorated two legendary Israeli political figures, both of whom he succeeded in their jobs.

Earlier, in Jerusalem, he spoke at the state funeral for the city's fabled former mayor, Teddy Kollek, who died Tuesday at 95 and was buried in the area of the Mount Herzl cemetery reserved for Israel's leaders.

Mr. Olmert defeated Mr. Kollek to become Jerusalem's mayor in a bitter political fight in 1993. He said Israel's first leader, David Ben-Gurion, had declared Jerusalem to be Israel's capital in 1949, but "Teddy Kollek made it so."

Thursday also marked a year since Prime Minister Ariel Sharon suffered a second extensive stroke, which left him in a deep coma from which he is not expected to awaken. Mr. Olmert, Mr. Sharon's deputy, was chosen to lead the Kadima Party in his stead and became prime minister, and he acknowledged Mr. Sharon's tragedy at his news conference in Egypt.

In general, Mr. Olmert has been regarded as inferior to Mr. Sharon and Mr. Kollek. In the latest opinion poll, conducted by the Dahaf Institute and reported Thursday in the newspaper Yediot Aharanot, nearly 70 percent of Israelis polled said they disapproved of Mr. Olmert's performance as prime minister. Israelis are unhappy with the way he managed the summer's war against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and do not much like his personality, contrasting him with the more stolid and experienced Mr. Sharon.

Still, Mr. Olmert has proved himself a skilled politician, and early on Thursday Parliament quietly passed his $68 billion budget, a crucial test of his government's ability to survive. The budget battle was always a great drama under Mr. Sharon, but Mr. Olmert, who has expanded his governing coalition to include parties ranging from Labor to the right-wing Israel Beiteinu Party of Avigdor Lieberman, had little difficulty.

Mr. Olmert's office is being rocked, though, by a new corruption scandal. He has not been touched by this scandal, though he has been under investigation for smaller cases of improper use of influence.

DOJ_NMG_0112813

But his longtime office director, Shula Zaken, has been put under house arrest and ordered not to contact Mr. Olmert as the police investigate whether she and the director of the Tax Authority, Jackie Matza, tried to help Ms. Zaken's brother and two other businesspeople through the appointment of cronies to key jobs in return for tax breaks.

About 30 people are under some form of detention in the spreading scandal.

The operation in Ramallah by Israeli forces, with armored vehicles, bulldozers and helicopter support, was carried out hours before Mr. Olmert met with Mr. Mubarak.

Palestinians and news reports said the operation was to arrest Rabiah Hamad of Fatah, a senior member of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades. The army would not confirm that Mr. Hamad was the target, but said the man it wanted was armed and was wounded, but escaped. The army arrested four other wanted Palestinians, a spokesman said.

It was a rare incursion into the heart of Ramallah, and it prompted an angry response. Youths on rooftops threw stones, metal trash barrels, a refrigerator and blocks of concrete at the Israeli Army vehicles. There were mortars fired at the Israeli soldiers, and an exchange of gunfire.

Palestinian medics said four men — Yussef Abdel Khader, 23; Khalil al-Badawi, 20; Jamal Jawela, 29; and Ala al-Himran, in his 20s — died at a Ramallah hospital from gunshot wounds.

In Gaza there was continuing violence, with three more men killed in fighting between Fatah and Hamas. The fighting centered around the Jabaliya refugee camp in northern Gaza after gunmen surrounded the houses of known political or security figures.

In Beit Lahiya, a senior Fatah commander, Col. Muhammad Gharib, was killed and his wife severely wounded when Hamas militants attacked his home with rifle fire and rocket-propelled grenades. Two of his bodyguards were also killed. About 25 others were wounded in Jabaliya, and local radio was filled with appeals to the gunmen to restore calm.

On Wednesday five Palestinians, including a woman who was a passer-by, were killed and 12 wounded in Fatah-Hamas gun battles, which broke a weeklong lull. Other militant factions arranged a truce overnight and kidnapped members of Hamas and Fatah were released by the other sides, but the truce broke down on Thursday.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, returned to Gaza on Thursday from hajj, his pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia. His entourage underwent a special inspection in El Arish, Egypt, to ensure that he was not carrying large amounts of cash back to Gaza, which has been deprived of most Western aid since Hamas won parliamentary elections last January.

[Early Friday, Mr. Haniya said he and Mr. Abbas had agreed at emergency talks to keep gunmen from their parties off Gaza's streets.]

For the fourth day there was no word about a kidnapped Peruvian photographer for Agence France-Presse, Jaime Rázuri, 50, who is said by colleagues to be lacking a required heart medication.

Palestinian security services have warned foreign journalists to keep out of Gaza for now, because of the kidnappings and chaos.

A leader of the Palestinian People's Party, Bassam al-Salhi, said the security chaos could be resolved only with political agreement. "The weakness of the Palestinian political system and the situation of the current Hamas-led government have contributed to this state of lawlessness," he said.

Israeli Arrest Raid In West Bank Kills 4 Palestinians (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 4 -- Israeli troops pushed into Ramallah on Thursday in a rare daylight arrest operation, killing four Palestinians and wounding more than 20 others during heavy fighting in the city's streets. In the Gaza Strip, factional violence between the Hamas and Fatah movements left at least six people dead.

The Ramallah raid, the largest in the West Bank city in nearly two years, occurred as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak met at a Sinai resort to discuss ways to reduce the factional tensions and revive the dormant Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

In a written statement after the operation, which took place blocks from his official compound, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said it showed that "Israeli calls for peace and security are fake."

"The continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace," Abbas said, calling on foreign governments to pressure Israel to stop such operations.

In recent weeks, Olmert has pledged to strengthen the political standing of Abbas, a relative moderate and a leader of Fatah, as he confronts the radical Islamic movement Hamas, which has day-to-day control of the Palestinian government.

DOJ_NMG_0112814

Hamas has rejected Abbas's calls to recognize Israel and renounce violence in return for a resumption of foreign aid, which was cut off following its election victory almost a year ago. Abbas's announcement last month that he intends to call early general elections to resolve the crisis has brought a fresh surge of partisan fighting.

In meeting with Abbas less than two weeks ago, Olmert promised to release $100 million in frozen tax revenue that Israel collects on the Palestinians' behalf and to lift a number of military checkpoints in the West Bank. The gestures were meant to be a vote of confidence in Abbas, but Israeli and Palestinian officials say neither pledge has been fulfilled.

The Ramallah operation occurred in a busy commercial district festooned with Christmas lights and left behind damaged cars and streets strewn with stones and debris. Such operations are commonly carried out at night, but Israeli forces moved into a downtown building in the late afternoon.

Soldiers found the man they intended to arrest armed with a handgun, military officials said, and fired on him as he fled. Israeli officials declined to identify the man because he was still at large, having escaped into streets that filled quickly with demonstrators.

But Palestinian witnesses identified the target as Rabiah Hamad, a leader of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Fatah's armed wing. He was later treated for wounds in a Ramallah hospital.

Israeli military officials said the forces came under heavy fire during the operation. The troops arrested four gunmen, who Palestinian witnesses said also belonged to the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades.

Palestinian witnesses and hospital officials said at least three of the men killed were civilians. The status of the fourth remained unclear.

"I am sorry if innocent people were hurt today in Ramallah," Olmert said at a news conference with Mubarak, who moments earlier had expressed his "dissatisfaction" with the raid. Olmert added: "One should remember that Israel has to operate against terrorists who operate against innocent Israelis. The operation today was to arrest a wanted man who hurt Israelis."

A second day of partisan fighting in Gaza began when a car carrying members of the Executive Force, a Palestinian security service controlled by the Hamas-run Interior Ministry, came under fire in the city of Beit Lahiya. One Hamas member died in the ambush, and two others were badly wounded.

After nightfall, the Executive Force surrounded the Beit Lahiya home of a senior officer of the Preventive Security Service, a Fatah-controlled branch. The gunmen said the house had been used in the earlier ambush.

Shots rang out as the Executive Force took up positions, and protesters arrived to prevent an attack on the house.

Soon after, the Executive Force opened fire on the house with rifles and rocket-propelled grenades. Fatah officials said the officer, Col. Mohammed Ghrayeb, was killed in the shooting.

The Associated Press reported later that, in addition to Ghrayeb, four of his guards and a Hamas gunman were killed in the confrontation and about three dozen people, including eight children, were wounded.

10 Palestinians Killed In Raid, Clashes (AP)

By Karin Laub

AP, January 5, 2007

Israeli undercover troops burst into a West Bank vegetable market Thursday, seizing four fugitives and exchanging heavy fire with Palestinians in the first major raid since the Israeli and Palestinian leaders agreed to try to ease tensions.

Factional fighting among Palestinian groups also surged, leaving at least six dead and prompting a meeting early Friday between rival leaders — President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas. Haniyeh said the two sides agreed to pull back their forces.

The agreement came hours after six Palestinians, including a senior security officer, were killed and more than a dozen wounded in fighting in Gaza between gunmen loyal to Hamas and those allied with Fatah.

In the Ramallah raid, four Palestinians, all civilians, were killed and 20 wounded. Abbas said in a harshly worded statement that Israel's peace promises rang hollow in light of the raid and demanded $5 million in compensation for the damage to shops and cars in Ramallah.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak just after the Ramallah raid, apologized for any civilian casualties, but said the operation was intended to protect Israel from terrorist attacks.

"Things developed in a way that could not have been predicted in advance. If innocent people were hurt, this was not our intention," he said.

The summit had been intended to push for new Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts, but was overshadowed by the violence.

Standing next to Olmert in the Red Sea resort of Sharm El-Sheik, Mubarak condemned the raid in Ramallah. "Israel's security cannot be achieved through military force but by serious endeavors toward peace," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0112815

In Washington, a senior European Union diplomat said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East this month to try to promote peacemaking.

"We will try to see how we can give a push to the peace process," said Javier Solana, who met with Rice on Thursday.

The Israeli raid, which turned downtown Ramallah into a battlefield with dozens of cars smashed and vegetable carts overturned, further undercut Abbas at a time when he is locked in an increasingly violent power struggle with the Islamic militant Hamas.

Abbas said Israel's assurances that it is striving for peace and security cannot be believed. "The continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace," his statement said.

In the northern Gaza Strip, a senior Palestinian security officer allied with Fatah was killed when Hamas militants laid siege to his house, engaging in a protracted gunbattle with his guards and then attacking it with grenades and a dozen rockets, Palestinian officials and witnesses said.

The officer, Col. Mohammed Ghayeb, was the chief of the Preventive Security Service in northern Gaza, and his death was expected to trigger revenge attacks.

Moments before his death, Ghayeb was on the telephone to Palestine TV appealing for help as his house in Beit Lahiya came under attack. "They are killers," he said of the Hamas gunmen. "They are targeting the house, children are dying, they are bleeding. For God's sake, send an ambulance, we want an ambulance, somebody move."

The battle outside the house raged for much of the day and killed four of Ghayeb's guards and a Hamas gunman. About three dozen people, including eight children, were wounded.

Hours later, Abbas of Fatah and Haniyeh of Hamas met in Gaza and agreed to work to defuse the tensions and recall their gunmen, Haniyeh told reporters. "We are going to end all armed displays in the streets," he said. Abbas had no comment.

It wasn't immediately clear if the truce, the latest of several, would hold.

During the standoff outside Ghayeb's home, dozens of women rushed into the streets in protest, chanting "Spare the bullets, shame, shame."

One resident, Amina Abu Saher, told Al Quds radio that it was difficult for her to see Palestinians battle each other and she and the other women were determined to stop the internal fighting.

The factional fighting is a result of the political deadlock between Hamas, which controls the Cabinet, and Abbas, who was elected separately and wields considerable power. Talks on power-sharing between Hamas and Fatah have failed, and truce attempts have repeatedly collapsed.

In several places in the West Bank late Thursday, Fatah militants attacked Hamas offices and vehicles. One Hamas activist was wounded, Palestinian security officials said.

The Israeli army raid in Ramallah took the Palestinians by surprise.

It began when troops tried to arrest fugitives from the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a violent Fatah offshoot, in the vegetable market. A gunbattle erupted, and Israeli forces sent reinforcements, including armored personnel carriers, bulldozers, jeeps and an attack helicopter.

For about two hours, a heavy battle raged, sending residents scrambling for cover. Bursts of gunfire, loud booms and ambulance sirens could be heard across Ramallah. At one point, a helicopter fired large-caliber bullets.

The apparent target of the raid, Rabih Hamed, was seriously injured. A photographer for the local news agency Maan was critically wounded by a gunshot to the head.

Meanwhile, Israeli TV and Channel 2 television reported that Olmert had decided to remove his defense minister, Amir Peretz, citing sources in the prime minister's office. Olmert's office, however, denied the reports.

Peretz, who has a limited security background has come under fire, along with Olmert, because of the inconclusive results of last summer's war with Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon.

Treasury Steps Up Pressure On Syria (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, January 5, 2007

The Bush administration, intensifying pressure on Damascus, moved Thursday to financially clamp down on three Syrian institutions suspected of helping spread weapons of mass destruction.

The Treasury Department's action means that any bank accounts or financial assets belonging to the three entities found in the United States would be frozen. Americans also are prohibited from doing business with them.

The three entities targeted are the Higher Institute of Applied Science and Technology, the Electronics Institute and the National Standards and Calibration Laboratory.

DOJ_NMG_0112816

"Syria is using official government organizations to develop nonconventional weapons and the missiles to deliver them," Stuart Levey, Treasury's under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said in explaining the United States' action.

The department has the power to take the financial-blocking action under an executive order issued by President Bush in June 2005.

The three entities acted against Thursday are "subordinates" of the Scientific Studies and Research Center, the Syrian government agency responsible for developing and producing non-conventional weapons and the missiles to deliver them, the department said.

The government ordered U.S. banks to freeze the center's assets in 2005. The Treasury Department said that although the center promotes its civilian research function, its "activities focus substantively on the development of biological and chemical weapons."

The department alleged that the Electronics Institute is responsible for missile-related research and development. It described the Higher Institute of Applied Science and Technology as educational institution that provides training to engineers of the Scientific Studies and Research Center. The government didn't provide details on the National Standards and Calibration Laboratory but said that South Korea and Japan have identified the lab as a "proliferation concern."

The United States' relationship with Damascus has been strained for several years.

Last month, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group urged the Bush administration to have serious talks with Syria and with Iran as part of a new Iraq strategy. But the U.S. has been reluctance to seek help from Syria on Iraq until the Syrians curb their support to radical Palestinian groups and to the Lebanese Hezbollah.

Bush Looking At Global Warming Ideas (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 5, 2007

President Bush and German Chancellor Angela Merkel pledged closer cooperation on combatting global warming and in trying to prod a Middle East peace on Thursday, brushing aside lingering differences between the two countries.

Bush said at a joint White House news conference that he was open to new ideas to confront climate change, although he stopped short of some of the tight environmental standards favored by Germany and other European nations.

"We talked about climate change, and I assured the chancellor I'm committed to promoting new technologies that will promote energy efficiency and do a better job protecting the environment," Bush said. "I believe there is a chance now to put behind us the old stale debates of the past."

It was a reference to past differences between Bush and European allies on the Kyoto accords, an international agreement to reduce pollution that causes global warming. It has not been ratified by the United States.

For her part, Merkel said, "I was delighted to hear that there is a readiness there."

"We will continue to have our experts work on it," she added. "On the one hand, we obviously need economic growth, but on the other hand, a reduction, also of greenhouse gases."

Bush praised Merkel for her efforts to put the so-called quartet_ the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — at the center of a revived Israeli-Palestinian peace effort.

"Madame Chancellor had a good idea to convene the quartet," Bush said. He said that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would soon be going to the region to try to revive the process.

"We're strongly committed to a two-state solution. Two democracies supporting each other's rights to exist," Bush said. He said, however, that he was unwilling to expand the quartet.

The two leaders conferred on issues ranging from war and energy problems to the economy, trade and dealing with the conflict in Sudan's Darfur region.

Merkel's visit came just days after Germany assumed the presidency of the 27-nation European Union and the Group of Eight major industrialized democracies.

With British Prime Minister Tony Blair expected to step down this year, Merkel is emerging as Bush's top ally in Europe.

Being seen to have friendly relations with Bush carries some risks for Merkel, given the president's unpopularity in Europe. But she minimizes them by publicly raising points of difference such as her stance that the prison camp at Guantanamo should be shut down — although she did not raise the issue, at least publicly, on Thursday.

Bush and Merkel barbecued a wild boar together when Bush visited her home parliamentary district last July.

"Laura and I are looking forward to feeding you dinner. I'm not so sure it's going to be as good a dinner as the barbecue you fed us," Bush said.

He also made a lighthearted reference to an impromptu back rub that he gave Merkel at an international forum last year. His rubbing of the back of her neck and shoulders was captured on camera, as was her look of surprise and a grimace.

DOJ_NMG_0112817

As the two ended Thursday's news conference and headed for dinner, Bush said softly, "No backrub."

Bush Makes Light Of Earlier Gaffe (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

President Bush has adopted a hands-off policy with German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

"No back rubs," a smiling Bush declared Thursday while posing for photos with Merkel at the White House. She seemed to agree.

Bush was making light of his own gaffe at a summit of G-8 industrial nations last year. At the time, he gave an impromptu rub of Merkel's neck and shoulders. The chancellor hunched her shoulders in surprise, threw her arms up and grimaced, though she appeared to smile as Bush walked away.

A quick video image of the touchy moment quickly became one of the most popular clips on the Internet.

Bush made the joking reference to it after a private meeting and a short news conference with Merkel.

New Mexico Governor Heads To Sudan On Diplomatic Mission (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP)--New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said Thursday he is heading to Sudan on a diplomatic trip that would add to his extensive international experience as he prepares to announce whether he will run for president.

Richardson will try to meet with Sudanese officials and persuade them to accept a peacekeeping force in the war-torn Darfur region, according to a statement from his office.

He is to arrive Sunday after traveling overnight and plans to travel to Darfur.

Sudan's president, Omar al-Bashir, has rejected a U.N. Security Council resolution that provides for bolstering the poorly funded and equipped 7,000-troop African Union force to about 22,000 peacekeepers under U.N. leadership. The nonprofit Save Darfur Coalition requested Richardson's help because of his long relationship with Bashir and is paying for the trip.

Richardson, a Democrat who was U.N. ambassador and energy secretary in the Clinton administration, would have one of the most impressive foreign policy resumes if he decides to run for president.

As a member of Congress in the 1980s and 1990s, Richardson was a special envoy on several international missions and won the release of Americans held in North Korea, Iraq, Cuba and Sudan.

Since being elected governor in 2002, Richardson has not stopped his international work. He has traveled repeatedly to North Korea, meeting last month with North Korean officials in Santa Fe, N.M., to discuss the communist country's nuclear future.

In September, he traveled to Sudan and successfully negotiated with Bashir for the release of a captured U.S. journalist who had been held for more than a month on espionage charges.

For nearly four years, Sudanese troops and the Arab janjaweed have been fighting Darfur's ethnic African rebels, who revolted against what they saw as decades of neglect and discrimination by the Khartoum government.

U.N. and African Union officials have accused the government of arming the janjaweed and coordinating attacks with them - a charge Khartoum denies. More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million driven from their homes.

Richardson also will push for a cease-fire, his office said.

Richardson coordinated his trip with Andrew Natsios, the Bush administration's special envoy to Sudan, according to the governor's office. Natsios did not respond to an interview request sent to the State Department.

Police Uncover Explosives In Spain's Basque Region (WP/AP)

By Mar Roman

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

MADRID, Jan. 4 -- Police found a large explosive device in the Basque region Thursday, five days after a car bombing in Madrid that was blamed on the separatist group ETA shattered a nine-month cease-fire.

The discovery came as Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero visited the wreckage of Saturday's car bombing and vowed that Spain would not be intimidated. The blast in the parking lot of Madrid's international airport killed one man, left another missing and feared dead and wounded at least 26 people.

"It will achieve nothing. It is not going to intimidate anyone," Zapatero told reporters.

Outside the Basque town of Amorebieta, nearly 220 pounds of explosives were found in a drum near an abandoned car, and they had been rigged to be used in an attack, Basque police said. Bomb disposal experts removed the device from the site to dismantle it.

Zapatero said Saturday's attack made him more determined to end ETA's nearly four-decade-long campaign of violence, aimed at achieving an independent Basque homeland. But he announced no new strategy or even a hint of his next move.

DOJ_NMG_0112818

The attack was a political setback for Zapatero, who made ETA's dissolution a centerpiece of his political agenda. When he announced in June that he would negotiate with the group, he infuriated conservatives who opposed talks with what they consider an active terrorist organization.

The blast killed a 35-year-old Ecuadoran immigrant. Rescuers were still looking for the missing man, also Ecuadoran, but held out little hope of finding him alive. The death marked the first fatality in an attack blamed on ETA in more than three years.

In a rare gesture Thursday, the outlawed group Batasuna, widely seen as ETA's political wing, expressed its "deepest sorrow" for the death of the Ecuadoran immigrant.

The blast shattered a cease-fire that ETA declared in March and said was permanent. Zapatero's government canceled plans for negotiating a settlement with Europe's last armed political militancy.

ETA and its political supporters have complained in recent months that the peace process was faltering because the government refused to make preliminary concessions. Those included moving ETA prisoners from jails across Spain to the Basque region and halting police arrests and trials of ETA suspects and pro-independence politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0112819

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, January 05, 2007 8:03 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, January 05, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070105.pdf; agnb070105.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

White House Defends Assertion Of Power To Inspect Mail 3
Gonzales To Be Questioned On Interrogation Tactics.....4
Qatari National Wants Court Review Of "Enemy Combatant" Label.....4
Defense Rests At Chicago Hamas Trial.....4
New York Grocer Admits Misleading FBI In Suicide Bomber Probe 5

Homeland Response:

Siraj Faces Sentencing Monday For NYC Subway Bombing Plot 5
Alleged Illinois Mall Bomb Plotter Indicted On WMD Charges .5
Democrats Unveil Homeland Security Bill 5
Four Cities Added To Homeland Security Grant List As Four Are Removed.....5
Hayden Briefs CIA Employees On Agency Strategy.....6

War News:

Bush Iraq Strategy To Include Large Aid Boost, 20,000 Troop "Surge.".....6
As He Prepares To Unveil Iraq Strategy, Bush Faces Skeptical Congress.....7
Bush To Shake Up Diplomatic, Military Team 9
Bush Says Saddam "Was Given Justice." 12
New Offensive Targets Sunni Insurgents In Diyala Province . 12
Bombing Kills 13 In Baghdad 12
Source In Numerous AP Stories On Iraq Said Not To Exist ... 13
Arrested Iranians Reported To Be Ranking Intelligence Officials 13
Partition Could Bring Need For US To Relocate Iraqis..... 13
Mother Defends Soldier Who Refused Iraq Deployment 13
Iraq War Booty Traced To Manassas Self-Storage Facility ... 14
Mullah Omar Denounces Karzai Government, Vows Resistance..... 14
Pakistani PM Calls For Afghan Refugee Repatriation 14
Medical Teams Performing Better In Iraq, Afghanistan Than In Past Wars.....14

DOJ:

Magazine Names Gonzales One Of Most Influential Hispanics 14
Native American Woman Recommended For Arizona US Attorney Post 15
Baltimore US Attorney Profiled 15

Corporate Scandals:

Federal Prosecutors Conclude Accounting-Fraud Case Against Former AOL Officials.....15
Activist Shareholders Claim Victory With Home Depot CEO's Departure 16
WPost Says Apple Investors Face Dilemma In Jobs Stock Options Scandal 16

Criminal Law:

Federal Prosecutors List More Favors By Ney To Abramoff Clients.....17
Former Massachusetts House Speaker To Plead Guilty To Obstruction 17
Former Illinois Secretary Of State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison.....18
Former Advertising CEO Sentenced In Philly Airport Corruption Probe 18
Judge Rejects Nevada Commissioner's Request To Delay Surrender For Prison 18
Potential Jurors Complete Questionnaires For Federal Abortion Murder Trial.....18
23 Indicted In $3.5 Million NYC Mortgage Fraud Scheme 18
Washington Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Conspiracy Charges.....19
Michigan Health Care Executive Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud.....19

Missouri Official Indicted For Mortgage Fraud, Calls Federal Probe "Political Terrorism." 19
Death Penalty Sentences Fall To 30 Year Low 19
Today Marks Twelfth Anniversary Of Bulger Disappearance 20
Study Finds Embezzlement In Most Catholic Dioceses 20
Voluntary Statements By Suspects Seen As Window Into Criminal Process 20

Civil Law:

FTC Fines Diet Pill Marketers For False-Ad Claims 21
Eli Lilly Settles Thousands More Suits Over Zyprexa 21

Civil Rights:

DOJ Will Not Probe Death In Virginia Jail 21
DC Seeks Dismissal Of DOJ Boys Town Suit 22

Antitrust:

Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Settled 22
Visa, Mastercard Settle Debit-Card Dispute With US 22
EU Intensifies Probe Of Energy Companies 23
Dingell Generates Concerns At FCC, Even Among Democrats 23
South Korea Launches Antitrust Probe Of Qualcomm 23
Major Law Firms Scrap Merger Plans 23
Prominent LSE Shareholder Increases Its Stake 24

Environment:

Park Service Still Sells "Creationist" Account Of Grand Canyon 24
EPA Official Warns Of Slow Progress On Chesapeake Bay Revitalization 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Records Reveal Details Of Rehnquist Drug Dependence 25
Judge Rejects Request To Throw Out Statements In Florida Torture Case 25
Grand Jury In Baltimore Indicts Five On Drug Charges 25
Authorities To Use Racketeering Law Against Florida Gang Members As Murder Rate Rises 25
Sessions May Get Democratic Backing For Drug Sentencing Bill 25
Colombia Extradites 2 To Face Drug-Smuggling Charges In US 26

Immigration:

Judge Orders Deportation Of Wisconsin Man Accused Of Being Nazi Camp Guard 26

Tax:

DOJ Sues Illinois Couple Over Faulty Tax Returns 26

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Take Control Of Congress In "Historic" Day 27
Miers Resigns White House Post 31
Consumer Groups To Oppose Likely Bush CPSC Nominee . 31
Health Issues May Prompt First Bush-Congress Conflict 31
Ellison Sworn In With Jefferson's Quran 32
Bodman Fires Nuclear Weapons Chief Over Security Failures 32
New Year Sparks Wave Of Federal Worker Retirements 33
Democrats Urged To Make Tough Decisions To Restore Fiscal "Sanity." 33
NYTimes Says Congress Should Raise Federal Judges' Pay 33
WSJournal Says Pelosi "Paygo" Is Tax Trap 33

Other News:

Oil Prices Fall To Lowest Level Since 2005 34
Service Sector Report Suggests US Economy Is Slowing 34
Kansas High Court Mulls Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors . 35
First African-American Sworn In As Massachusetts Governor 36
Romney Could Emerge As Nominee "If McCain Self-Destructs." 36
McCain Profanely Questioned Usefulness Of Border Wall 36
Edwards Shuns Bill Clinton's Approach To Run To Left Of Clinton 37
Bill Clinton Defers Questions On Wife's Ambitions 37
Two Republicans Team Up In Effort To Oust GOP Texas House Speaker 37
WPost Backs Kaine's Transportation Proposal 37
Rice Announces $16 Million In Aid For Somalia 38
No Breakthrough Reported At Mubarak-Olmert Talks 39
Treasury Department Increases Pressure On Syria 39
Bush, Merkel Promise Cooperation On Global Warming 39
Richardson To Lead Diplomatic Mission To Sudan 39
Spanish Police Discover Bomb In Basque Region 40

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 40

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 41

DOJ_NMG_0112822

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Defends Assertion Of Power To Inspect Mail. In a story that reverberated through the media and among privacy advocates yesterday, the New York Daily News (1/4, Meek, 729K) reported President Bush "has quietly claimed sweeping new powers to open Americans' mail without a judge's warrant, the Daily News has learned." Bush "asserted his new authority when he signed a postal reform bill into law on Dec. 20" by issuing "a 'signing statement' that declared his right to open people's mail under emergency conditions. That claim is contrary to existing law and contradicted the bill he had just signed, say experts who have reviewed it." The signing came "during the winter congressional recess and a year after his secret domestic electronic eavesdropping program was first revealed. It caught Capitol Hill by surprise."

On his Fox News Your World (1/4) show, host Neil Cavuto said, "The New York Daily News jumping ugly all over President Bush, this time for declaring the right to open American's mail under emergency conditions, even though the headline does make it seem like he wants to just read your mail willy-nilly." He then asked House Subcommittee on Investigations Chairman Bart Stupak, "It's not really open season on people's mail, is it?" Stupak: "No, it's not. But even if the President says he has the right to open it in an emergency, I still feel that's contrary to the law and to our Constitution."

ABC World News (1/4, story 8, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Bush Administration, which has already taken heat over warrantless wiretaps, is now asserting its power to search mail. It was revealed today, the President signed a statement saying the law will be interpreted to allow the searchers to the maximum extent possible. Civil liberties groups are demanding to know whether mail is already being opened."

The White House countered by saying the signing statement was simply a reiteration of existing law. NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 8, 2:05, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In signing the postal bill just before Christmas, President Bush said Federal law gives government authority to open the law for foreign intelligence collection. White House spokesman Tony Snow said that is nothing new." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "The signing statement indicates what present laws allow in making it clear what the provisions are." P. Williams: "But members of Congress, Republicans and Democrats say that is not what they intended the law to do. They call it another example of a President claiming new legal authority while signing a bill into law." Sen. Susan Collins: "I was really surprised. There was nothing in the Postal Reform Bill that in any way diminished or changed the privacy protection for domestic sealed mail."

USA Today (1/5, Hall, Jackson, 2.27M) reports the White House "on Thursday defended a policy allowing the government to open mail without a warrant, despite criticism that the crime-fighting tactic might lead to privacy breaches." Bush Administration and Postal Service officials "said citizens' mail remains constitutionally protected from unreasonable search and seizure. But White House spokesman Tony Snow said the United States needs to have the power to inspect mail in emergencies." The "mail controversy erupted Wednesday after a report in the New York Daily News that President Bush on Dec. 20 attached a so-called signing statement to a new postal law. The statement grants the government the authority during emergencies to bypass a law forbidding mail to be opened without a warrant."

The New York Times (1/5, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports the White House "said Thursday that President Bush was not claiming any new executive authority last month when he issued a statement suggesting that postal inspectors could open mail without a warrant in emergency circumstances." White House spokesman Tony Snow said "the statement Mr. Bush issued in signing postal legislation was merely a restatement of existing law allowing mail to be opened without a warrant in 'exigent circumstances' to protect public safety." Snow "said Mr. Bush had not claimed any 'sweeping new powers' through the statement, as The Daily News article asserted, and the Postal Service issued a statement Thursday echoing that assessment."

The Washington Post (1/5, A3, Eggen, 690K) reports the "little-noticed statement last month asserting the authority to open U.S. mail without judicial warrants in emergencies or foreign intelligence cases" prompted "warnings yesterday from Democrats and privacy advocates that the administration is attempting to circumvent legal restrictions on its powers." White House and US Postal Service "officials said the statement was not intended to expand the powers of the executive branch but merely to clarify existing ones for extreme cases." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "This is not a change in law, this is not new, it is not…a sweeping new power by the president. It is, in fact, merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president of the United States." The Post adds, "Some civil liberties and national-security law experts said the statement's language is unduly vague and appears to go beyond long-recognized limits on the ability of the government to open letters and other U.S. mail without approval from a judge."

DOJ_NMG_0112823

CBS News (1/5) reports, "The law as passed by the House and Senate requires government agents to get warrants to open first-class letters. … But the presidential statement, signed on December 20, added that sealed mail can be searched in 'exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence.' … The White House said the president is not claiming any new authority and that the statement does not change the scope of current law. … Spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore told CBS News White House correspondent Mark Knoller, 'The signing statement merely recognizes a legal proposition that is totally uncontroversial: that in certain circumstances … the Constitution does not require warrants for reasonable searches.' … But CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen questioned why the president felt it necessary to attach the language to the bill if nothing has changed. … 'I don't think the White House would have included this language into a signing statement unless the feds were either already searching mail without a warrant or planning to do so,' Cohen said. 'And if the legal right to do so were as clear as the White House now says it's hard to believe that there was a need to remind everyone of the fact in a bill about the postal service.'"

Gonzales To Be Questioned On Interrogation Tactics. CNN The Situation Room (1/4, 7:30 p.m.) broadcasted the news of new Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy's efforts to investigate the Justice Department over interrogation tactics, "The House and Senate judiciary committees are going to pounce all over Attorney General Alberto Gonzales with questions about how he is protecting or not protecting basic civil liberties in the country."

Qatari National Wants Court Review Of "Enemy Combatant" Label. In an approximately 2,400 word story, the New York Times (1/5, Liptak, 1.16M) reports on the plight of Ali al-Marri, "whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda and who is the only person on the American mainland still held as an enemy combatant." Al-Marri, arrested in 2001, "spends his days in a small cell in solitary confinement at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C." Al-Marri "waits for word from a federal appeals court, which will soon rule on one of the most urgent questions in American law, one his case presents in stark form: May the government indefinitely detain a foreigner living legally in the United States, without charges and without access to the courts?" Marri, a citizen of Qatar, "wants the right to challenge President Bush's assertion that he is a terrorist and 'a grave danger to the national security of the United States.'"

Defense Rests At Chicago Hamas Trial. The AP (1/5, Robinson) reports, "Attorneys for one of two men accused of furnishing thousands of dollars and fresh recruits to a Palestinian terrorist network rested their case Thursday following testimony from an expert on torture." The AP continues, "Closing arguments were set for Monday at the racketeering trial of former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University. … Federal prosecutors say the two men were members of the Palestinian militant group Hamas and helped to bankroll a wave of terror that included bombings, kidnappings and murder aimed at toppling the Israeli government. … 'Ladies and gentlemen, we are done with the evidentiary portion of this case,' U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve, who has presided over the 10-week trial, told the jurors before sending them home for the weekend." The AP adds, "Attorney William Moffitt, who represents Ashqar, rested his case weeks ago. Salah attorney Michael E. Deutsch rested Thursday following testimony from a psychiatrist and torture expert, Dr. Metin Basoglu. … Basoglu, an authority on the psychological mechanisms created by torture, testified over a live video feed from Istanbul where he lives. … Basoglu said a slipped disc in his back kept him from traveling. … Salah's attorneys are hoping Basoglu's testimony will reinforce Salah's claim that after his January 1993 arrest he was tortured by Israel's Shin Bet security agents into making incriminating statements."

DOJ_NMG_0112824

New York Grocer Admits Misleading FBI In Suicide Bomber Probe. The Rochester Democrat & Chronicle (1/5, Zeigler) reports, "A Rochester grocer admitted today that he misled FBI agents about his brother's declared intent to travel to Israel and become a suicide bomber." Mohamed Subeh "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to concealing a material fact from investigators when he destroyed a letter in which his brother said he wanted to become a suicide bomber, then denied ever seeing the letter." Defense lawyer John Parrinello said that "Subeh was worried that his brother would jeopardize his U.S. immigration status by leaving but knew his brother was 'just blowing off steam' when he claimed in the letter that he intended to be a suicide bomber." The Democrat & Chronicle notes that Subeh's brother, Ismail Dorgham, "drew the attention of law-enforcement officials on May 22, 2003, when he went to Greater Rochester International Airport with no luggage and paid cash for a one-way connecting flight to Jordan. In a search of Dorgham's wallet, an FBI counterterrorism agent found a newspaper article about a 2002 suicide bombing in Jerusalem that killed 10 Israelis. Dorgham told the agent that the bomber was his cousin." The AP (1/5) also posts a truncated version of the Democrat & Chronicle story on Subeh's plea.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Siraj Faces Sentencing Monday For NYC Subway Bombing Plot. The AP (1/5, Hays) reports, "Shahawar Matin Siraj was either a naive stooge lured into a phony bomb plot or a homegrown terrorist determined to inflict misery on New Yorkers as revenge for wartime abuses of Iraqis. The conflicting portraits of Siraj — convicted on conspiracy charges in a scheme to blow up one of the city's busiest subway stations — were painted in court papers recently filed in advance of his sentencing on Monday in federal court in Brooklyn. Defense attorneys have sought to convince a judge that their client's sentence should not exceed 10 years since the attack never came close to being carried out." However, "prosecutors countered that the Pakistani immigrant deserves at least 30 years — and possibly life — behind bars as the 'driving force' behind a 'workable terrorist plot' to set off explosives at the subway station of Herald Square."

Alleged Illinois Mall Bomb Plotter Indicted On WMD Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/5) reports, "A man accused of plotting to use hand grenades in an attack on holiday shoppers was indicted Thursday on charges of attempting to use weapons of mass destruction." Derrick Shareef "was arrested Dec. 6 by an FBI-led anti-terrorism task force following a sting operation in which an undercover informant secretly tape-recorded his plans." Shareef "met an undercover agent to trade a pair of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a handgun to use at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford…federal prosecutors said." The Rockford Register Star (1/5) also briefly reports on the indictment.

Democrats Unveil Homeland Security Bill. The AP (1/5, Miller) reports that shortly after they assumed control of Congress, House Democrats "disclosed a plan they said would strengthen homeland security after five years of complaining that Republicans weren't doing enough." Democrats said their bill "would implement the unfinished 9/11 Commission recommendations that fall under the Homeland Security Committee's jurisdiction." The bill would "require private companies to prepare for terrorism and the government would have to inspect cargo on passenger planes and shipping containers leaving the largest ports." Airport screeners "would be given whistle-blower protection, money would be set aside to develop technology for detecting explosives at checkpoints and an appeals process would be established for airline passengers mistaken for terrorists on watch lists."

Four Cities Added To Homeland Security Grant List As Four Are Removed. The AP (1/5, Barrett) reports, "Four U.S. cities will get a fresh infusion of federal anti-terror grant money, and four others will be cut off from such grants, under a new government list of urban areas considered at serious risk of attacks and eligible to share $747 million." The list "shows the four newly eligible cities are El Paso, Texas; Norfolk, Va.; Providence, R.I.; and Tucson, Ariz. The cities that were cut from the list of 45 metropolitan areas are Toledo, Ohio; Baton Rouge, La.; Louisville, Ky.; and Omaha, Neb." The Homeland Security Department has "come under intense scrutiny for its decisions in the Urban Area Security Initiative, or UASI, which is the only pool of federal money designed to go to localities based solely on their risk of terror attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0112825

Hayden Briefs CIA Employees On Agency Strategy. The Washington Times (1/5, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "CIA Director Michael V. Hayden spoke to CIA employees yesterday for a town-hall-style meeting where he revealed the agency's new 'Strategic Intent' report and outlined some of the reforms taken. They include setting up a new operations center with representatives from the collection, analysis and technical services branches." The report "lists the long war on terrorism, arms proliferation and the rise of China and India as part of the current 'unstable and dangerous 'strategic environment." One "initiative: the creation of a CIA associate deputy director for counterintelligence that supporters hope will give the agency something it badly needs in the current environment of aggressive foreign intelligence activities."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Iraq Strategy To Include Large Aid Boost, 20,000 Troop "Surge." The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A1, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration's new strategy for Iraq, which the president is set to announce next week, will include a big boost in spending to fund reconstruction, economic growth and job creation, as part of a broader effort to help embattled Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. People familiar with the matter say that Mr. Bush will detail his request for billions of dollars in new aid for Iraq next week in an eagerly awaited speech on his strategy to contain sectarian violence there and clear the way for an eventual US military withdrawal." Bush "will also call for the deployment of as many as 20,000 additional American combat troops to Iraq as part of a controversial 'surge' designed to stabilize Baghdad and other violent regions of the country." The Journal adds, "The administration's emerging Iraq strategy, which it is calling 'The New Way Forward,' will also include an effort to funnel US money to moderate Iraqi political parties as a means of building a centrist political coalition to support Mr. Maliki, according to people familiar with the matter."

The Washington Times (1/5, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "spoke with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for nearly two hours yesterday," saying he had been gauging al-Maliki's will to protect the Iraqi people, and that "he was 'in the process of making up my final decision as to what to recommend' on a way forward in Iraq." Bush was meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who "said she will urge her neighbors to support efforts to stabilize Iraq." The Times notes that Bush is expected to order a surge in US troop levels in Iraq.

On its front page, the Washington Post (1/5, A1, Wright, Abramowitz, 690K) says that "deep divisions remain between the White House on one side and the Joint Chiefs and congressional leaders on the other about whether a surge of up to 20,000 troops will turn around the deteriorating situation," according to US officials. The US military is "increasingly resigned to the probability that Bush will deploy a relatively small number of additional troops -- between one and five brigades -- in part because he has few other dramatic options available to signal U.S. determination in Iraq, officials said. But the Joint Chiefs have not given up making the case that the potential dangers outweigh the benefits for several reasons," officials said.

Zakheim Says US Must Shift Troops To Iraq Border Regions. In a Financial Times (1/5) op-ed, Dov Zakheim, undersecretary of defense during President Bush's first term, writes on "Why America Should Operate From Iraq's Borders," saying that while "the White House accepts that there has to be a change in approach," its "underlying premises -- that Iraq's sectarian strife is not a civil war and that the keys to a stable Iraq are a stable Baghdad and Anbar province -- are the same as before. These assumptions need to be revisited, fast. … There is no doubt that Iraq is enmeshed in a bitter civil war. The US has had minimal impact on the course of that war." Zakheim says the US needs to shift "primary responsibility for pacifying Baghdad" to Iraqis, and "then the US must reposition its forces to foster regional stability and minimise casualties. Up to two brigades should be devoted to Kurdistan and a roughly equal number to the far west of Anbar province." He also says the US should "move a division-sized force to the south, with a significant presence on the border with Iran."

More Commentary. In his column for the Washington Post (1/5, A17, 690K), conservative columnist Charles Krauthammer makes a similar point, writing, "We should not be surging American troops in defense" Iraq's "governing coalition -- Maliki's Dawa, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and Sadr's Mahdi Army," which "seems intent on crushing the Sunnis at all costs. Maliki should be made to know that if he insists on having this sectarian war, he can well have it without us."

DOJ_NMG_0112826

And Dan Senor and Roman Martinez, who served as foreign-policy advisers to the Bush administration, based in Baghdad from April 2003 through June 2004, write in the Wall Street Journal (1/5, 2.04M), "The president is on the cusp of making the most important decision of his second term: increasing our troop presence in Baghdad and Anbar in an effort to stave off Iraqi civil war. A troop surge into Baghdad will not solve problems overnight. But by helping to establish security, more troops can weaken the insurgency, which is the first step to addressing most of Iraq's other problems, including the growth of Shiite militias."

As He Prepares To Unveil Iraq Strategy, Bush Faces Skeptical Congress. The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Levey, 850K) reports, "As President Bush prepares a major new initiative for Iraq, he confronts a wary and distrustful new Congress eager for solutions but unconvinced the administration can chart a successful exit from the war. The new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate are reluctant to assume responsibility for the war, leaving unclear Congress' willingness to block any troop escalation or to compel Bush to change strategy." Bush "is expected to unveil a new Iraq plan that would feature at least a temporary increase in troop levels in an effort to control sectarian violence. Troop increases have been endorsed by a few lawmakers, including Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.)." But "such a proposal is certain to be fiercely opposed by most Democrats."

AFP (1/5) notes McCain reaffirmed his support for the deployment of thousands of additional US troops in Iraq, a proposal expected to figure in President George W. Bush's upcoming reassessment of US strategy there." McCain told MSNBC (1/4, Williams), "When I raise my hand and vote to send young men and women, American men and women into harm's way and fight a war, I am committing to accomplishing the mission." He added "the fight against Islamic extremism must be joined with renewed fervor." McCain also said, "The consequences of failure are chaos and disaster. And these people...want to destroy the United States of America,' McCain said."

ABC World News (1/4, story 2, 1:40, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported that "starting with…Pelosi, the overwhelming majority of Democrats, including the leaders in the Senate as well, are going to be against a surge of troops in Baghdad. The problem for them is there's nothing they can do for it. They've taken cutting off funding for the troops off the table. So they can have hearings. They can try to redirect the President's policy. But they cannot force a change."

But E.J. Dionne, in a Washington Post column (1/5, A17) titled "Short-Circuiting The Surge," that "an outright escalation of an unpopular war" is "seen by most Democrats and some Republicans as a rebuke to the majority whose November ballots signaled a negative verdict on the Iraq war." Democrats "are quietly but urgently seeking ways of pressuring the president to change course, including the possibility of having Congress reconsider its original authorization of force, passed in October 2002. … Given the limited options, Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, has suggested to his colleagues that the strongest response to the surge would be a congressional resolution explicitly opposing the step." Dionne adds, "Bush has the power to order a surge. But if he insists on doing so in the face of widespread skepticism, a president proudly famous for relying on his gut will discover that he faces a Congress that does not regard his instincts as a reliable guide to the defense of American interests."

Underscoring Dionne's point, the New York Times (1/5, Broder, 1.16M) reports that in remarks, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "delivered the obligatory promise of partnership with Republicans. But she immediately added a blunt warning to Mr. Bush on the war in Iraq. 'The American people rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end,' she said, bringing Democrats to their feet." Pelosi "signaled to Mr. Bush that any plan to increase the American military presence in Iraq would meet stiff opposition in the new Congress." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/4, Malone, 379K) says Pelosi's comments foreshadowed "a possible clash with the Bush administration," and notes "new Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada was even less specific. 'Iraq is an issue that we all need to work on, and we will work on that,' he said as he emerged from a closed-door bipartisan meeting for the entire Senate membership."

Democrats are under strong pressure from anti-war activists. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Democrats face conflicting pressures on potential Iraq troop 'surge.'" Moveon.org "plans protest outside speech today by Sens. McCain and Lieberman backing a surge, underscoring ire of Democratic base." Senate Democrats "plan to grill" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates "as part of more than a dozen hearings to mobilize public opposition over next three weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0112827

Republicans brace for additional defections, while McCain cautions that 20,000 more soldiers might not be enough." McCain said, "There are still people around [Bush] who think things aren't that bad."

The Washington Times (1/5, Fagan, 88K) also reports that "as Democrats reveled in their new majority yesterday, anti-war activists complained of cowardice on the Iraq war and pledged that they won't let Democrats cave to…Bush." In addition, on NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 3, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert noted the effect of the 2008 presidential campaign on Bush's announcement. When the President "makes his speech next week," said Russert, "it will not be in a vacuum. We have 10 people running for President of the United States. Barak Obama saying I was against the war from the beginning." McCain "saying we should have sent more troops way back when. This President will make his announcement in the middle of a preprimary Presidential campaign and that will drive our Iraq policy in a considerable way."

Biden Says White House Has Concluded War Has Been Lost. The Washington Post (1/5, A6, Kessler, 690K) reports, "Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said yesterday that he believes top officials in the Bush administration have privately concluded they have lost Iraq and are simply trying to postpone disaster so the next president will 'be the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof,' in a chaotic withdrawal reminiscent of Vietnam." Said Biden, "I have reached the tentative conclusion that a significant portion of this administration, maybe even including the vice president, believes Iraq is lost. … They have no answer to deal with how badly they have screwed it up. I am not being facetious now. Therefore, the best thing to do is keep it from totally collapsing on your watch and hand it off to the next guy -- literally, not figuratively."

Three Newly-Elected Democrats Could "Go Along" With Surge. ABC World News (1/4, story 7, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) interviewed "three new House Democrats today. Heath Shuler of North Carolina. Nancy Boyda of Kansas. And Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania. They said they are not satisfied with the President's handling in Iraq." But "they are inclined to go along with" with a surge. Murphy said he "served over in Baghdad with the 86th [sic] Airborne Division. I saw with my own eyes what's going on over there. The fact is that we need to change direction with what's going on in Iraq. We need to listen to the military experts, people like General Colin Powell, General Abizaid, that say, listen, the surge isn't going to work." Asked about the surge option, Shuler said, "I don't think that's the solution. With the exception, if that's what our military leaders say, that the increase is troops is the answer, then that would be more acceptable. But not just one person saying -- even the President. Not just one person saying that increasing our troop level is going to create the sense of security in Iraq." Boyda said, "I would be happy to vote for more troops. But I am not happy to vote for more troops without a clear mission and sending more men into harm's way." Boyda later said, "He is the commander in chief, Charlie. We don't get that choice. Congress doesn't make that decision."

Shays, Lott Sound Ambivalent Note On "Surge." Meanwhile, the Hartford Courant (1/4, Lockhart, 190K) reported that GOP Rep. Christopher Shays said "it would be a 'huge mistake' to send more American troops to Iraq if that country's government 'doesn't do the heavy lifting it has to do.'"

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/4), host Chris Matthews asked Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, "Is there a chance you'll say no to the surge?" Lott: "There is." Matthews: "Thanks for making news here."

Most Congressional Commentary On "Surge" Breaks Along Party Lines. Sen. Jim Webb said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/4, Matthews), "The problem that I've had for five years with respect to Iraq is the lack of a strategic vision. We've been looking for an articulation of national strategy from this Administration, and you don't have a national strategy unless you can tell the American people very clearly what your end point is. So when we're talking about this issue of the surge, the first thing to remember is that over the past couple of years we've seen the troop levels oscillate up and down a bit little bit along a basic line of about 120,000 to 140,000 people. So in a sense, we may be arguing about the wrong issue in terms of trying to find a solution." In similar comments on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), Webb said, "What I really would like to focus on in the part that I'm able to play in these hearings is the articulation of a clear set of goals with an end point. You don't have a strategy if you cannot clearly articulate the end point of your strategy. That's been the frustration all along. And so we find ourselves in these arguments about whether putting 20,000 or 30,000 more troops in and holding them longer is going to affect the overall solution in Iraq."

Sen. Barbara Boxer said on MSNBC (1/4, Scarborough), "This isn't really, in the Senate, a partisan issue. But I can tell you that there's a lot of angst about this so-called surge idea. Many of us do believe the election was about extricating ourselves from a terrible situation. Yes, we could re-deploy to the region, but we've got to re-deploy out of Iraq. Instead, the President may actually get us in deeper. He's just digging the hole deeper and deeper."

DOJ_NMG_0112828

Sen. Amy Klobuchar said on MSNBC (1/4, O'Donnell), "I know that there are a number of Democrats and -- including some Republicans -- that are very concerned about adding more troops. I personally don't believe we should be doing that. I think we should be redeploying our troops to areas surrounding Iraq. I think we need to send a strong message that we need to transition to Iraqi authority and stop this culture of dependency."

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel said on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner), "Americans are way ahead of the Congress in being able to demand that we have hearings, that we ask questions as to why we are asking 20,000, 30,000, 40,000 American men and women to get involved in Iraq in a surge. We will have hearings for the first time. What is a surge? How many people will be in harm's way with a surge? What's the additional $100 billion for? What have we done with the last $400 billion? How many of our friends in the area, Egyptians, Saudis, Jordanians, are going to be involved in the so-called surge? And if the military says we can't have a military victory, Mr. President, what are we doing there, and how long do we have to be there?" Rangel raised similar questions on MSNBC's Tucker (1/4, Carlson), saying, "Mr. President, what is a surge? How many people can we lose in the surge? Can we have a military victory? What is this victory that you're talking about? If it's not a civil war, what would you call it? The American people are going to put a stop to this war."

Rep. Jack Murtha, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), said President Bush "says we have an honest disagreement, but hopefully we can work things out. Well, I hope we can work things out, too. But we can't work things out if they propose something without consultation. … If you are going to surge, you're going to have to keep people there in Iraq -- in other words, extend them. You're going to have to stop loss, which means you won't let people get out. And then you're going to have to send people back that have less than a year in country with their families. … But it's not going to prove anything because we sent another 15,000 troops into Baghdad and it's gotten worse." On MSNBC (1/4, Williams), Murtha made similar comments, then added, "The policy has to be changed. You can't continue and sustain a war when young people are going back with less than a year in this country. They're extending and stop-lossing people in the country themselves. And it is very unpopular, even with the troops themselves, when they don't understand the mission."

GOP Sen. Mel Martinez, incoming chairman of the Republican National Committee, said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), "I would hope the President is going to propose a comprehensive plan for success in Iraq. We have to understand that there's a lot at stake, not just in Iraq but on the global war on terror and in the entirety of the Middle Eastern situation. For us to not succeed, for us to cut and run or fail there, would be a terrible disaster for our country. And it would be a bad thing for the Iraqi people, as well."

GOP Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), "You've got five-star generals on both sides of the issue. You've got retired generals and colonels on both sides of the issue. Clearly, this is a subject about which reasonable people can differ. And so it's no surprise that political experts such as my colleagues would be in some disagreement. … If that is the President's decision -- and I know we're being a bit premature here -- I think we ought to give it a chance to try to help the President and see if that can work."

GOP Rep. Adam Putnam said on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner), "Republicans have never been 100% in lock-step. And we even today more fully realize that there's an independent role for the legislative branch, an independent role for the executive branch. The President is our commander-in-chief, and we look forward to his recommendations on the new way forward in Iraq. But we owe the American people adequate oversight, adequate investigation, but total support of the men and women in harm's way."

GOP Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on MSNBC (1/4, Gregory), "I will support being certain that we win in Iraq. And if our commanders in the field -- and this is where I think it's important -- we have to listen to the commanders in the field and the troops in the field. They know what is needed."

Bush To Shake Up Diplomatic, Military Team.

In coming days, President Bush is expected to announce several changes in top military and diplomatic posts, in what media reports portray as part of his new strategy in Iraq. USA Today/AP (1/5) says Bush is "shaking up the team responsible for carrying out his military and diplomatic strategies in Iraq as he prepares to outline a new direction for the war." McClatchy (1/5, Hutcheson, Strobel) says the "overhaul" will "bring new faces" as "as the president is putting the finishing touches on a new strategy for Iraq." On its front page, the Washington Post (1/5, A1, Wright, Abramowitz, 690K) reports the personnel changes are being made even though "significant policy details" are "left to be worked out this weekend." The Post also says the President will likely reveal his plan during an address Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0112829

NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 5, 3:05, Gregory, 9.87M) said the change reflect the fact that "this is the beginning of the final two years of this Administration which will include significant change in Iraq and when it comes to relations with Congress." And the CBS Evening News (1/4, story 2, 2:20, Borger, 7.66M) said it is "very clear that this White House wanted to get these personnel decisions, not only the generals but the diplomatic appointments,…out of the way before the President speaks to the country on Iraq, which we think will be next week."

Military Changes. On the military front, USA Today/AP (1/5) reports Bush will replace Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the chief general in Iraq, "in the coming weeks." Bush reportedly plans to replace Abizaid "with Adm. William Fallon, the top US commander in the Pacific, and Casey's replacement will be Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces." Assigning Fallon and Petraeus to the top military posts in the Middle East "would help Bush to assert that he is taking a fresh approach in the region and help pave the way for him to turn policy there in a new direction."

On its front page, the New York Times (1/5, A1, Gordon, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Senior administration officials said that the choice of General Petraeus was part of a broader effort to change almost all of the top American officials in Iraq as Mr. Bush changes his strategy there." One official was quoted as saying, "The idea is to put the whole new team in at roughly the same time, and send some clear messages that we are trying a new approach." The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Spiegel, 850K) says the "choice of Petraeus in particular could have wide-ranging significance. Although his selection does not come as a surprise, Petraeus is closely associated with the push for a more complex counterinsurgency campaign, which would move US soldiers out of their large bases and into smaller outposts in troubled neighborhoods."

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 2, 2:20, Borger, 7.66M) said, "The new Secretary of Defense, Bob Gates, clearly decided that he needed to get his own team in place and that's exactly what he's done and he also wants a team that he knows is going to support the President's new strategy on Iraq." ABC World News (1/4, story 3, 2:15, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "What the President wants, according to one official, is a clean sweep -- a new plan and new commanders." Regarding Admiral Fallon, ABC calls his selection "a wild card choice," saying it is "highly unusual that a Navy admiral would be called upon to run, essentially, two ground operations."

Diplomatic Changes. Meanwhile, on the diplomatic front, ABC World News (1/4, story 4, 0:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "changes in the President's diplomatic team dealing with Iraq. We have learned the President will nominate the US Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalizad, to be Ambassador to the United Nations. Brian Crocker, the US Ambassador to Pakistan, will be nominated to take his place in Baghdad. And the National Intelligence Director, John Negroponte, is going to become the number two at the State Department, playing a major role in shaping policy in Iraq. While a retired Vice Admiral, Mike McConnell, is the choice to become the new National Intelligence Director."

The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Wright, Abramowitz, 690K) reports in a front page article that "with significant policy details [on Iraq] left to be worked out this weekend, the administration is nonetheless moving ahead on several personnel changes," including plans to replace some Bush's top military commanders in the region. The Post notes the likely appointments to US posts in Baghdad, at the UN and Negroponte's move to the State Department.

The Financial Times (1/5, Dinmore) reports Negroponte's "abrupt shift from being the first US director of national intelligence to number two at the State Department reflects continued troubles in the intelligence community and a further concentration of power around Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Analysts see Negroponte's return to the State Department "as part of a broader and somewhat confused reshuffle of the Bush administration that began with the sacking of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary and has Iraq and the wider Middle East as its focus." Meanwhile, officials said President Bush would announce the changes on Friday, "possibly including his nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad, ambassador to Baghdad, as the new US envoy to the UN. There was also speculation on Thursday night that Ryan Crocker, US ambassador to Pakistan, would replace Khalilzad." In continuing speculation about Negroponte's decision to leave his DNI post, former intelligence officials said he "was tired of bureaucratic turf wars and wanted to return to his diplomatic career." Meanwhile, at a press conference, White House spokesman Tony Snow "rolled his eyes at a suggestion that Ms Rice, perhaps the closest in the cabinet to the president and now no longer challenged by Mr Rumsfeld, was set to move on."

DOJ_NMG_0112830

The New York Times (1/5, A6, Stolberg, 1.16M) says if confirmed by the Senate, the appointments "would put seasoned, respected diplomats into two of the State Department's most challenging posts." Bush's decision to transfer Khalilzad, it notes, "would effectively accomplish two goals for the administration. As a Sunni Muslim, Mr. Khalilzad has been perceived by some Iraqi Shiites as not sympathetic enough to their views; removing him from Baghdad would help Mr. Bush make a fresh start there." And the change "also would give the United States the strong voice it needs at the United Nations, particularly after the storm surrounding Mr. Bolton."

The Washington Post (1/5, A5, Deyoung, Pincus, 690K) says Negroponte's "move to become…Rice's deputy, and his replacement by retired Navy Adm. John M. McConnell, had little to do with any assessment of Negroponte's tenure or with the unfinished state of intelligence integration, a range of senior administration officials said." Instead, it "stemmed directly from the urgent need to fill a State Department job, vacant since early last summer, that was seen as crucial to implementing the new Iraq policy that President Bush plans to announce next week."

The Washington Post's (1/5, A 15) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Negroponte "is a guy who clearly can't hold a job. This would be his fourth since joining the administration just over five years ago. And the chatter has already begun that he may not be in this one too long before he moves up one level."

On its front page, the New York Times (1/5, A1, Mazzetti, Sanger, 1.16M) says that "from the start" Negroponte "felt miscast as the nation's first director of national intelligence, a diplomat who never seemed comfortable in spook's clothing, colleagues and friends of his said." The Times reports that "Rice had requested over the summer that Mr. Negroponte become her deputy. But the decision languished for months as the White House sought an adequate replacement for the spy chief." The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Miller, 850K) says Negroponte's departure "as the nation's spy chief prompted angry responses from Capitol Hill and triggered new debate Thursday over whether a position created to fix the nation's intelligence problems is itself fundamentally flawed." The Washington Times (1/5, Gertz, Sands, 88K) also reports on the moves.

The AP (1/5, Schweid) says the anticipated nomination of Ambassador Khalilzad to the UN post, saying the move "has been rumored for months, along with the expectation that Crocker, now ambassador to Pakistan, would succeed him in Baghdad." ABC News first reported Thursday that Bush had made the decision. A US official "said some minor details still must be worked out on Crocker, but they are considered manageable."

Sen. Jay Rockefeller was asked on Fox News (1/4, Skinner) about Negroponte's move to the State Department. Rockefeller said, "It was a very clumsy handling of an extraordinarily important position…clumsy in the fact that nobody was informed of it. I read about it in the newspaper this morning. So nobody on the Intelligence Committee knew about it. And this is, after all, a person that we created to coordinate all of intelligence. … Now, he's going to be undersecretary of state. I think that's fine, but up until about an hour and a half ago, we had no idea whether there was going to be either a director or a deputy."

NYTimes Welcomes Negroponte's Move To State. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) says Negroponte's move is "technically a step down," but it "has a certain logic to it," noting that "the diplomacy-challenged Bush administration could surely use the help." The Times says it hopes Negroponte "can provide Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with the intellectual and bureaucratic reinforcement she so desperately needs to help guide the administration to a wiser course on Iraq." However, Bush now "must quickly find a credible replacement for Mr. Negroponte, preferably one who is willing to jolt his bosses with the truth. This administration's record of failures in Iraq is matched only by its failures on intelligence."

However, the Los Angeles Times (1/5, 850K) editorializes, "His acceptance of the job may be more a reflection of the problems of his previous position than the promise of his new one." Instead, it suggests "the more interesting question, however, is why Bush, acting through Cheney (or is it the other way around?), wanted Negroponte at State. Word inside and outside the State Department for months has been that Rice has been unable to fill top jobs because her choices have either declined to sign up for a stint likely to be best remembered for the debacle in Iraq or have been vetoed as too liberal by the White House." Negroponte, it writes, "reportedly was the only person acceptable to both Rice and Cheney."

DOJ_NMG_0112831

Bush Expected To Announce McConnell Nomination Friday. The AP (1/5, Shrader) reports President Bush is expected to announce Friday the nomination of retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to replace Negroponte as National Intelligence Director. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A4, Solomon, Block, 2.04M) says the nomination "stirred concerns about the expanding control of current and retired Pentagon officials over the US intelligence community." McConnell's "greatest challenge" as director of national intelligence, say members of the intelligence community, "will be to try to claim control of these Pentagon intelligence assets while striking a balance between the development of tactical and strategic intelligence."

USA Today (1/5, 4A, Kelley, Willing, 2.27M) notes that McConnell "has been a leading figure in outsourcing US intelligence operations to private industry, records and interviews show." Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/5, Shane, 1.16M) says that with the selection of McConnell, President Bush "is turning again to a steady intelligence professional who first achieved prominence during his father's administration." Sources say he was "first approached several months ago about the possibility of replacing General Hayden" as deputy to Negroponte, but he "turned down that job and was eventually invited to succeed Mr. Negroponte in the top job."

Bush Says Saddam "Was Given Justice."

The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "President Bush said Thursday that he would have preferred that the execution of Saddam Hussein had been conducted in a more "dignified" manner, but said the deposed dictator met the fate he deserved." Said Bush, "He was given justice. The thousands of people he killed were not."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/5, Zeleny, Cooper, 1.16M) says leading members of Congress said Thursday that the conduct surrounding the hanging could undermine United States strategy in Iraq and complicate efforts to help the new Iraqi government succeed. … Several Republican senators who have been among President Bush's biggest supporters in the Iraq war said they were troubled by the video and fearful of the reverberations it could provoke. 'It's a very bad thing, it's harmful, and I'm sorry that it happened,' said Senator John McCain, an Arizona Republican who has been a White House ally on its Iraq policy. 'Obviously, it unnecessarily inflames the emotions of the Sunnis.'"

GOP Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), "You can't argue on the one hand that we need to turn it over to the Iraqis and let them do it their way, and then criticize them when they do it their way. … At a certain point, if we turn it over to them, we can expect that they're not going to do things exactly as we would."

Two Guards Arrested For Saddam Video. The Washington Post (1/5, A12, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "Two guards were reportedly arrested Thursday for recording former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's execution with a video cellphone."

More Commentary. In his column for the Washington Post (1/5, A17, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Of the 6 billion people on this Earth, not one killed more people than Saddam Hussein. … For the Iraqi government to have botched both his trial and execution, therefore, and turned monster into victim, is not just a tragedy but a crime -- against the new Iraq that Americans are dying for and against justice itself."

New Offensive Targets Sunni Insurgents In Diyala Province.

The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Zavis, 850K) reports, "About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops launched a major offensive at dawn Thursday in Diyala province, an increasingly violent zone east of Baghdad that has become a haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents." Insurgents responded with trenches and sabotage of bridges, possibly "to divert approaching vehicles toward roadside bombs." The Times notes that there was friction and some mistrust in the joint operation, but that "Iraqi soldiers appeared eager to work with their American partners. Some sang celebratory songs in unison as they grabbed their gear and assembled near their Humvees."

Bombing Kills 13 In Baghdad.

USA Today/AP (1/5, 5A) reports, "Twin car bombings killed 13 people Thursday in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood." The explosions "went off one after the other at 10:30 a.m. in the Mansour neighborhood, setting fire to a gas station and incinerating at least a half-dozen cars. At least 25 people were wounded, police said." The New York Times (1/5, Santora, Spanner, 1.16M) says "the attack was apparently aimed at a gasoline station. Cars were lined up around the block waiting for fuel, and dozens of people, grasping large plastic jugs, hoped to buy heating fuel. Just moments after the first explosion, a second, larger, car bomb detonated."

DOJ_NMG_0112832

In addition, says the Washington Times/AP (1/6, Frayer), "Police said 47 tortured bodies were found dumped across Baghdad yesterday, in addition to the 27 a day earlier. A U.S. soldier was killed by small-arms fire in western Baghdad, the military said. "

Source In Numerous AP Stories On Iraq Said Not To Exist. The Washington Times (1/5, Harper, 88K) reports, "Media critics and Internet bloggers are questioning the credibility of an Associated Press source in Iraq, claiming that 'police captain Jamil Hussein' does not exist, though he has been cited in 60 AP dispatches over the past two years. Two of the skeptics -- syndicated columnist Michelle Malkin and former CNN news chief Eason Jordan -- say they will go to Iraq to find the elusive Capt. Hussein in hopes of proving that the venerable wire service was either practicing shoddy journalism or had been dangerously duped by a media-savvy terrorist or enemy agent." The AP announced that it is standing by its stories, and "reported that the Iraqi Interior Ministry acknowledged the existence of the captain, whose name is Jamil Gholaiem Hussein, and said he now faces arrest for speaking to the press."

Arrested Iranians Reported To Be Ranking Intelligence Officials. AFP (1/5) reports that the BBC has identified five Iranians arrested by the US in Baghdad last month as "senior intelligence officers engaged in a covert political mission to influence the Iraqi government," and quoted British officials as saying that while important intelligence was attained, "there was no 'smoking gun' about weapons supplies or attacks. Instead, the Iranians were there to hold high-level meetings with representatives of several Iraqi Shiite factions that have come to prominence since the fall of president Saddam Hussein in 2003."

The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that the "recent arrest of Iranian diplomats in Baghdad, allegedly for ties to militants, was part of Pentagon strategy to ratchet up efforts to curb Tehran's growing influence inside Iraq. 'I think you can expect more' in the months ahead, said one official."

Iranian Influence Seen As Worse Than Saddam Regime. In a New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) op-ed, Slavoj Zizek of the Birkbeck Institute for the Humanities, analyzes "what went wrong with the United States occupation of Iraq," suggesting that the US had been able to handle Saddam Hussein, since he led as a pragmatic secularist, his overthrow "has generated a much more uncompromising 'fundamentalist' politico-ideological constellation in Iraq. This has led to a predominance of the pro-Iranian political forces there — the intervention basically delivered Iraq to Iranian influence." Zizek suggests that President Bush acted in Iran's direct interest by invading, and that this is worse than leaving Saddam in power would have been.

Partition Could Bring Need For US To Relocate Iraqis. The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Grier, 59K) runs an analysis piece titled, "If Iraq fragments, What's Plan B?" about the possibility that Iraq will fragment into Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite zones, exploring what could be done to prevent this, but mainly focuses on "how the United States might handle Iraq's partition." The article notes the relocation work the US military did during the Bosnian civil war, which "would perhaps preempt the violent Balkans-style ethnic cleansing that is already occurring in Iraq," according to the Brookings Institution's Michael O'Hanlon. The Monitor suggests that the planned troop surge could serve to strengthen infrastructure, and by extension the Iraqi government, "but events in Iraq now may be running at a speed that outpaces the US ability to respond." The article continues to consider how ethnic relocation could best be achieved.

Mother Defends Soldier Who Refused Iraq Deployment. The Washington Post (1/5, C1, Weeks, 690K) reports on the efforts of Carolyn Ho, mother of Army 1st. Lt. Ehren Watada, "the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq," to rally support for her son in Washington. Watada is expected to stand court martial. "Like many Americans, she believed she could come to the capital city and change the world." Ho "sees her efforts as part of a larger, multifaceted wave that is challenging the Bush administration form every angle." Ho says her son's refusal to serve in Iraq is based on the assertion that the war was entered under false pretenses, and is therefore illegal. Her extensive efforts to garner support for her sun's cause has culminated in a letter from CA35 Maxine Waters (D), which praised Watada's "integrity and dignity in his objection to the war in Iraq." The

DOJ_NMG_0112833

Post concludes, "Ho sighed and said she found the letter to be 'disappointing.' But it was something."

Iraq War Booty Traced To Manassas Self-Storage Facility. The Washington Post (1/5, B1, Vargas, 690K) reports that NCIS agents filed "a 10-page affidavit" for a warrant to search a self-storage center in Manassas, Virginia, in connection with a federal investigation into USMC gunnery sergeant Gary Maziarz. Mariarz "was placed in pretrial confinement at Camp Pendleton because…'reasonable grounds exist that he poses a serious threat to the national security of the Unites States.'" Moreover, he "is charged with larceny of computer and camera equipment, larceny of weaponry and possession of steroids." In his apartment, investigators "found steroids and three commemorative Colt 1911 .45-caliber pistols 'reputed to have been presented to Saddam Hussein.'" Investigators also found "two folders containing approximately 250 pages of material marked 'SECRET.'"

Mullah Omar Denounces Karzai Government, Vows Resistance. The New York Times (1/5, Khan, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "In what appears to be the first exchange with a journalist since going into hiding five years ago, the Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, said that he had not seen Al Qaeda's chief, Osama bin Laden, in five years and that he would never negotiate with the United States-backed government of Hamid Karzai in Afghanistan. He also threatened to continue the war until foreign troops withdraw from Afghanistan." The Times notes that the statements were made by a circuitous email method, and were therefore not authenticated, adding that "the statements, if authentic, would be Mullah Omar's first exchange with a journalist since he was driven from power in 2001," and that he is believed to be in Pakistan.

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (1/5, King, 850K) reports on the impact Mullah Omar's ability to avoid capture for over five years with a $10-million US bounty has had on his reputation in the area adjacent to the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. His freedom "is celebrated here as proof of his mystical powers." The Times continues to relate the details of Omar's rule in Afghanistan, and speculates on his current whereabouts.

Pakistani PM Calls For Afghan Refugee Repatriation. The New York Times (1/5, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, said Thursday that he wanted the three million Afghan refugees still living in Pakistan to go home as one way to end the problem of insurgents using the country as a haven. It is the first time Pakistan has been so blunt in demanding that the Afghans, to whom it has served as host for more than 20 years since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, leave." The Times notes that Aziz's comments came as he was in Afghanistan meeting with President Hamid Karzai to try to ease strains over "Pakistan's plan to fence and mine the border, and Afghanistan's project to convene two tribal gatherings, or jirgas, of national representatives from both countries, to try to foster peace between the countries."

Medical Teams Performing Better In Iraq, Afghanistan Than In Past Wars. The Washington Times (1/5, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The killed-in-action rate in the Iraq-Afghanistan wars is half what it was in World War II and a third less than Vietnam and Desert Storm, according to internal Pentagon documents that say battlefield medical teams are doing a better job of stabilizing the wounded and getting them to doctors." The improvement can be "little solace to the families of the American troops who have died or been seriously wounded..." The briefings showed that the rate is "12.5 percent for the current wars compared with 25.3 percent for World War II and 18.6 percent for Vietnam/Desert Storm."

US Said To Be Ill-Equipped To Care For Injured Soldiers. Linda Bilmes, Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/5, 850K) that although "better medical care and stronger body armor are enabling many more soldiers to survive injuries that might have led, in earlier generations, to death," the Bush administration "failed to foresee what it would mean, failed to plan for the growing tide of veterans who would be in urgent need of medical and disability care." The result is that "as the Iraq war approaches its fourth anniversary, the Department of Veterans Affairs is buckling under a growing volume of disability claims and rising demand for medical attention."

DOJ:

Magazine Names Gonzales One Of Most Influential Hispanics. The AP (1/5) reports, "Jennifer Lopez is among the entertainers selected by People en Espanol for its '100 Most Influential Hispanics' issue, which honors those who have made an impact in the Hispanic community. … Lopez, who graces the cover of the magazine's February issue, on newsstands Friday, says 'being an example to others is a big part of my work.'" The AP continues, "Lopez tops the list of entertainers, which also includes Antonio Banderas, Carlos Santana, Eva Longoria, George Lopez, Gloria Estefan, Ricky Martin, Salma Hayek and Shakira, among others. … The magazine also honors filmmaker Alejandro Gonzalez Inarritu (culture/the arts), Attorney General Alberto Gonzales (politics/public affairs), businessman Carlos Slim Helu (business), MTV President Christina Norman (media), Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim owner Arturo Arte Moreno (sports), sociologist Aida Giachello (science and technology/health) and teacher Bertha Flores (education)."

DOJ_NMG_0112834

Native American Woman Recommended For Arizona US Attorney Post. The Arizona Republic (1/5, House) reports, "A Hopi woman who has served most of her career as a federal prosecutor n Arizona is being recommended to President Bush as a potential nominee to become the next U.S. Attorney for the District of Arizona." The Republic continues, "Diane J. Humetewa, 42, who is now the senior litigation counsel and tribal liaison under retiring U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton, was recommended to the White House Thursday by Republican Sens. Jon Kyl and John McCain. … She would be the first Native American U.S. Attorney in Arizona if nominated by Bush and confirmed by the Senate. Officials were researching whether she would also be the nation's first Native American U.S. Attorney. … 'I am proud to recommend Diane to serve our country in this noble role. As a native Arizonan, Diane has a sound appreciation for the culture and legal issues unique to the region,' said McCain. Humetewa served as a counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Indian Affairs from August 1993 to March 1996, when McCain was chairman of the panel. … 'Her distinguished career in public service, her experience as a prosecutor, and work on behalf of crime victims make her an ideal nominee for this role,' added Kyl." The Republic adds, "Humetewa is married and a 1993 graduate of the Arizona State University College of Law. She began her career with the U.S. Attorney's Office as a victim advocate for then-U.S. Attorney Stephen M. McNamee in 1987, and has served no less than six U.S. Attorneys, according to a news release announcing the appointment. … White House officials said they have no timeframe for considering McCain and Kyl's recommendation. … Charlton was appointed U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona on Nov. 12, 2001, by President Bush. He announced last month that he is quitting as U.S. Attorney to enter private legal practice at the end of January. He is to be a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy."

Baltimore US Attorney Profiled. The Maryland Gazette (1/5, Ford) reports from Baltimore, "U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein has the polite manner and looks of a friendly youth pastor. … But county prosecutors across the state describe Rosenstein as nose-to-the-grindstone federal prosecutor who has raised the profile of the office through frequent news conferences and aggressive prosecutions ranging from corporate corruption to gang crimes." The Gazette continues, "Since his appointment in May 2005, Rosenstein has brought innovative ideas to the office, including bringing the first racketeering charges against members of the street gang MS-13, said Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler (D). … 'This U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein is one of the best that we've had here in Maryland in recent times,' said Gansler, who was Montgomery County's top prosecutor for eight years and an assistant U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C., before that. 'He's a prosecutor's prosecutor.'" The Gazette adds, "Federal prosecutors obtained racketeering charges against 22 suspected Mara Salvatrucha members in August 2005 — the first use of the RICO statute for street gangs in Maryland. Under the 1970 Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization statute, members of an organization can be convicted for involvement in all the crimes committed by the group. … Federal prosecutors worked closely with Montgomery's prosecutors in going after members of the violent gang, Gansler said. … Rosenstein 'came to the office weeks after taking over,' Gansler said. 'We discussed our mutual concerns and the reality of the gang problem.' … When the MS-13 indictments were handed down in August 2005, Rosenstein praised the work and cooperation of the state's attorneys and police departments in Montgomery and Prince George's counties as well as the FBI and other agencies."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Federal Prosecutors Conclude Accounting-Fraud Case Against Former AOL Officials. The Washington Post (1/5, D1, Johnson) reports, "Federal prosecutors concluded their accounting-fraud case against two former AOL executives yesterday afternoon, signaling that the long-running trial soon may end after unusual twists including a mistrial for one of the defendants." The Post continues, "The case, which began in an Alexandria federal courtroom in mid-October, is one of the longest criminal trials ever in a jurisdiction that is widely known as 'the rocket docket' for its speedy and efficient justice, legal analysts said." The Post adds, "More than three dozen government witnesses testified about complex accounting tricks that hearkened back to early 2001, when the technology boom had turned into a bust. At the time, the Dulles Internet service provider struggled to show revenue and advertising gains by making questionable deals with dot-com business partners in which no revenue changed hands. … 'There was an intense focus to get revenue,' testified Jason Witt, a manager in AOL's aggressive and freewheeling business affairs unit, which has been disbanded. 'It's probably the greatest pressure I've seen since ever.'" The Post notes, "A number of witnesses recounted how the AOL defendants -- former business affairs executive Kent D. Wakeford and former Netbusiness unit vice president John P. Tuli -- felt squeezed between the expectations of their employer to close more deals and demands from dot-com clients who themselves were struggling to stay afloat. … But the trial perhaps is most notable for the absence of the former AOL officials who led the business-affairs operation, such as David M. Colburn and Eric Keller, whose names came up regularly in testimony and who once had been the focus of government investigation. Time Warner, which absorbed AOL, agreed to pay more than $500 million to settle joint civil and criminal charges two years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0112835

Activist Shareholders Claim Victory With Home Depot CEO's Departure. The New York Times (1/5, Duhigg) reports, "For decades, activist shareholders were an entertaining, but largely ignored, Wall Street sideshow. Disgruntled investors would attend annual meetings to harangue executives, criticize strategies — and protest that their complaints were being ignored. One agitator appeared in face paint and a red nose after executives called him a clown. … Today, however, it seems that activists have captured the center ring and are directing the main event." The Times continues, "On Wednesday, shareholder advocates could claim one of their biggest prizes yet when Home Depot announced the resignation of its chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, long a target of shareholder ire for his large compensation and the company's flagging stock price." The Times adds, "The main investor who pressed for the overthrow at Home Depot might at first glance seem an unlikely rebel: Ralph V. Whitworth, a lawyer educated at Georgetown and a former campaign worker for President Ronald Reagan who in December announced he had bought about $1 billion of the retailer's stock, or a 1.2 percent stake, through his fund, Relational Investors. … But the rapid success of Mr. Whitworth's campaign against the management and strategy of Home Depot demonstrates how thoroughly activists have moved into Wall Street's inner sanctum. Mr. Whitworth has said he still intended to nominate himself and at least one other candidate to Home Depot's board at its shareholder meeting in the spring. … The shake-up at Home Depot may be just a taste of things to come as shareholders and management at a number of companies, including Brink's, the Borders Group and Applebee's International, square off for battle at annual meetings this spring."

WSJournal Says Critics Wrong In Calling Nardelli's Pay "Severance." The Wall Street Journal (1/5, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Few Home Depot shareholders are mourning the departure of Robert Nardelli as CEO this week, and we aren't about to defend his performance. But someone needs to rebut the claim, which is almost as rampant as the Schadenfreude at his fall, that Mr. Nardelli is getting a $210 million 'severance' package as a reward for having failed." The "truth is that nearly all of that $210 million isn't severance at all but was part of Mr. Nardelli's original employment contract." But his "contract can't be abrogated now simply because the board has concluded it made a mistake. Of that $210 million figure, more than $180 million is owed to Mr. Nardelli as part of his original job offer."

WPost Says Apple Investors Face Dilemma In Jobs Stock Options Scandal. The Washington Post (1/5, A16, 690K) says in an editorial, "The scandal at Apple Computer presents a dilemma with no easy solution. On the one hand, the company has changed its story on its use of manipulated stock options, which boosted executive salaries at the expense of shareholders, and Apple still appears to be bending over backward to protect Steve Jobs, its storied chief executive. On the other hand, if Apple's board were to come clean and oust Mr. Jobs, the shareholders would be punished yet again, since Apple is worth more with him than without him. Or, to put the dilemma a little differently: It doesn't seem right to let an executive float above corporate governance rules, but it seems equally perverse to enforce those rules if doing so would damage the investors for whom such rules exist in the first place."

DOJ_NMG_0112836

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Prosecutors List More Favors By Ney To Abramoff Clients. The Washington Post (1/5, A7, Schmidt) reports, "Federal prosecutors seeking a stiff prison sentence for former Ohio congressman Robert W. Ney have listed previously undisclosed favors that he and his staff provided to clients of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including two Russian energy executives who have been linked to former House majority leader Tom DeLay." The Post continues, "Ney pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy, admitting that he performed official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and skybox sports tickets. He is to be sentenced Jan. 19." The Post adds, "The Republican congressman and his staff offered to aid Abramoff's clients in the summer of 2003 as Ney prepared for a trip to Russia, according to newly released e-mails attached to a Justice Department filing in federal court late Wednesday. Abramoff's lobbying team got the congressman to intervene with the U.S. Consulate in Moscow to help resolve a passport issue for the daughter of Abramoff client Alexander Koulakovsky, the e-mails show. … Koulakovsky and his business partner, Marina Nevskaya, hired Abramoff to help them arrange meetings with DeLay and to lobby for federal aid to their businesses. The Russian executives helped pay for a trip to Moscow taken by DeLay, his wife and aides in 1997. … A charity sponsored by DeLay received a $1 million check from a London law firm linked to the two. Former charity officials told The Washington Post last year the donation originated with Russian oil and gas executives, and was intended to influence DeLay's vote on an issue affecting the Russian economy."

Former Massachusetts House Speaker To Plead Guilty To Obstruction. The AP (1/5, Lavoie) reports, "A former Massachusetts House speaker accused of lying during his testimony in a voting rights lawsuit plans to plead guilty Friday to obstruction of justice, a person familiar with the agreement said Thursday." The AP continues, "The lawsuit had claimed that a 2001 state law that redrew legislative district boundaries discriminated against minorities in Boston while protecting incumbents, including the now-former House speaker, Thomas Finneran. … Finneran's trial on perjury and obstruction of justice charges had been scheduled to begin Jan. 16." The AP adds, "Under the plea deal, Finneran won't face prison time, and federal prosecutors will drop the three perjury counts, the person familiar with the deal told The Associated Press. He will serve probation, pay a fine and agree not to seek political office for five years. … Finneran, 56, has agreed to admit to some, but not all, of the allegations in the obstruction charge, which accuses him of obstructing justice by lying during the trial and in a deposition, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the deal has not yet been finalized in court. … During his eight years as speaker, Finneran was considered the state's most powerful lawmaker. Known for his authoritarian style, he was once dubbed 'King Tom' for pushing through a rules change that eliminated term limits for House speakers. .. .He resigned as speaker in September 2004 and was indicted nine months later on charges that he lied under oath about his role in the state's legislative redistricting. The testimony was before a federal appeals court in 2003 in the voting rights lawsuit brought by a coalition of minority groups."

The Boston Globe (1/5, Saltzman, 413K) reports Finneran "faces the almost certain loss of his $30,000-a-year pension because of a decision last year by the state Supreme Judicial Court. The state's highest court ruled unanimously in March that Boston Juvenile Court Clerk-Magistrate John P. Bulger forfeited his pension when he admitted that he lied to two federal grand juries investigating the disappearance of his brother, fugitive mobster James J. 'Whitey' Bulger. Alden Bianchi, cochairman of a Boston Bar Association committee on pensions, said Finneran's case appears to be a more obvious violation of the Massachusetts law that bars employees from receiving a pension if convicted of a 'criminal offense involving violation of the laws applicable to his office or position.'"

The Boston Herald (1/5, Wedge, 184K) notes, "Sources told the Herald Finneran will leave his $500,000-a-year post at the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council as a result of his pending felony conviction." Additionally, "sources close to the ex-speaker said his decision to plead guilty was made in part to spare embarrassment, with a parade of as many as 40 lawmakers slated to testify. Many had already received subpoenas, including his top aide Charles Rasmussen, sources said. Finneran, who is expected to land a plum talk-show host gig, could continue lobbying since there are no state laws barring convicted felons from being registered lobbyists, officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0112837

Former Illinois Secretary Of State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison. The AP (1/5, Dennis) reports, "A former high-ranking Illinois Secretary of State official was sentenced Thursday to 30 months in prison for helping three janitors pocket nearly $200,000 in state pay for work they didn't do. Cecil Turner, 60, is the former director of the secretary of state's physical services division. He was convicted in September of four federal counts of wire fraud for allegedly helping the janitors hide the six-year scheme, and two counts of lying to investigators. Turner also was ordered to pay more than $49,000 in restitution to the state for money the janitors pocketed." The AP notes, "Turner's sentence was seven months less than the range of 37 to 46 months recommended in a pre-sentence report." US District Judge Joe B. McDade "said he trimmed the federal term based on an inch-thick stack of letters he received citing Turner's long history of work for youth, his neighborhood and community. But McDade said he also needed to send a message to others in state government that corruption won't be tolerated."

Former Advertising CEO Sentenced In Philly Airport Corruption Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/5, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "The former CEO of an advertising company was sentenced yesterday to 51/2 months in a halfway house for his role in a pay-to-play scheme at Philadelphia International Airport." Former Sky Sites CEO Joseph Evans "will also serve 51/2 months of home detention. Evans pleaded guilty to misappropriating company funds to make a political contribution. Three codefendants pleaded guilty to funneling $30,000 in campaign contributions to Mayor Street's 2003 reelection campaign to help secure a contract at Philadelphia International Airport." The Inquirer notes, "Neither the mayor nor any other public official has been accused of wrongdoing. The case is part of a continuing FBI investigation into corruption at Philadelphia International Airport and is related to federal authorities' City Hall probe."

The Philadelphia Daily News (1/5, Hinkelman, 106K) reports Evans also was ordered to "perform 100 hours of community service," and US District Judge James T. Giles said he "should use the community service to counsel others who might contemplate similar conduct. 'It gives you an opportunity to use the wisdom you've come to learn in a hard way to perpetuate that lesson,' Giles said. 'There are those who will now learn of your predicament.' Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan Markman and Evans' attorney, Cheryl Krause, said they were satisfied with the sentence." Evans "could have been sent to prison for 10 to 16 months under sentencing guidelines."

Judge Rejects Nevada Commissioner's Request To Delay Surrender For Prison. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/4, Bach) reported, "U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks on Wednesday refused a request to push back the surrender date of former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera, who in August was convicted of charges stemming from political corruption. 'The grounds argued in support of an extension of Herrera's surrender are founded upon arguments of financial hardship and inconvenience,' Hicks wrote in a court order. 'Given the severity of the defendants's criminal offenses and a surrender date that was more than abundant to prepare for incarceration, the motion is denied.' Hicks said Herrera is still expected to surrender to federal authorities on or before noon on Jan. 12." The AP (1/5) also reports on the ruling, in a story based primarily on the Review-Journal article.

Potential Jurors Complete Questionnaires For Federal Abortion Murder Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/5, Thompson) reports, "Jury selection began Thursday in the federal trial of an anti-abortion extremist who shot and killed an abortion provider, on a charge that could keep him behind bars forever. The roughly 100 people in the jury pool were questioned about their views on abortion and their knowledge of the the 1998 sniper slaying of Dr. Barnett Slepian." The AP notes James Kopp "admitted firing the fatal shot from the woods outside but said he meant only to wound the doctor to stop him from performing any more abortions. … Authorities hunted 2 1/2 years for Kopp after the shooting, adding him to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999."

23 Indicted In $3.5 Million NYC Mortgage Fraud Scheme. The New York Daily News (1/5, Zambito, 729K) reports, "Twenty-three brokers, appraisers and bankers were indicted yesterday in a $3.5 million scheme to dupe banks and other lenders by recruiting 'straw' buyers to fill out bogus mortgage and loan applications, Manhattan federal prosecutors said. Brooklyn brokerages AGA Capital NY, Northside Capital and its successor Lending Universe Corp. earned $4 million in commissions between 2004 and 2006 brokering some 1,000 mortgages and home equity loans valued at $200 million, prosecutors say. The actual losses to banks and other lenders was pegged at $3.5million." The Daily News notes, "Eighteen defendants were arrested yesterday by agents from the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Four more are expected to surrender today and one is a fugitive."

DOJ_NMG_0112838

The New York Post (1/5, Cornell, 631K) adds, "AGA Brokers Aleksander 'Shorty' Lipkin, Igor 'Ryzhiy' Mishelevich, Alex 'Lyosha' Gorvits and several others are accused of supervising the scheme to submit fraudulent loan applications from 2004 to 2006. … In some cases, the ring 'stole the identities of persons who fit a certain financial profile and submitted loan applications on behalf of these persons without their knowledge,' court papers said." WNBC-TV New York (1/4) noted that the "case was investigated by the The Eurasian Organized Crime Task Force, a joint effort by FBI agents and NYPD detectives, and the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency."

Washington Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Conspiracy Charges. The AP (1/5) reports, "A lawyer accused of taking thousands of dollars from a Kennewick youth program has pleaded innocent to federal bribery and conspiracy charges. U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael Leavitt entered a not guilty plea for Jeff L. Finney, of Benton City, and allowed the former defense lawyer to remain free without bond during an initial court appearance Wednesday." The AP notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Shogren said Finney has cooperated for months with the investigation in the case, which the Tri-City Herald reported involves between $50,000 to $140,000 missing from the city of Kennewick's Home Base youth program. … A yearlong FBI investigation focused on Finney and Tyler M. Morris, 36, a former assistant city prosecutor for Kennewick."

Michigan Health Care Executive Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The AP (1/5) reports, "The former owner of a Michigan health care company pleaded guilty to federal charges of stealing nearly $800,000 by fraudulently billing Medicare." Iftakhar Khan "and his brother were indicted in 2003. They were charged with mail, wire and health care fraud." Amjad Khan "pleaded guilty in August." The AP notes Iftakhar Khan "was president of Livonia-based Michigan Rehabilitation and Pain Management. The company closed after the FBI and other agencies raided it in 2000. Amjad Khan operated Warren-based American Home Health Care, which also closed."

Missouri Official Indicted For Mortgage Fraud, Calls Federal Probe "Political Terrorism." The AP (1/5, Twiddy) reports, "Former Jackson County Executive Katheryn Shields and her husband were indicted Thursday on federal charges of taking part in a mortgage fraud scheme. … Federal prosecutors allege that the couple were approached by a group of individuals last fall who offered to sell their home, which was listed at $699,950, for $1.2 million. The couple was to receive $707,000 of that amount, the remainder being split among other co-defendants and explained to lenders as a 'management fee.' To get the mortgage approved, the defendants allegedly provided lenders with fraudulent financial information and inflated property appraisals. Officials said the FBI stopped the transaction from going through." The AP notes, "Shields has survived more than three years of fruitless federal investigations into her work as the county's highest elected official, and the indictment came the day before she planned to file to run for Kansas City mayor -- a decision she said she will not change. 'I think I've been subjected for the last three-plus years to political terrorism and I will not give in to political terrorism,' Shields said."

Death Penalty Sentences Fall To 30 Year Low. The AP (1/5, Tanner) reports, "The number of death sentences handed out in the United States dropped in 2006 to the lowest level since capital punishment was reinstated 30 years ago, reflecting what some experts say is a growing fear that the criminal justice system will make a tragic and irreversible mistake. Executions fell, too, to the fewest in a decade." Death sentences "fell in 2006 to 114 or fewer, according to an estimate from the group. That is down from 128 in 2005," and "down sharply from the high of 317 in 1996." A "total of 53 executions were carried out in 2006, down from 60 in 2005. Executions over the past three decades peaked at 98 in 1999."

NYTimes Praises New Jersey For Recommendation To End Death Penalty. The New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "New Jersey could take the lead among states in abolishing the death penalty if it follows the recommendation that a legislative commission made this week. It is the right thing to do, and not just because capital punishment is barbaric and a poor deterrent. It has become increasingly clear as the use of DNA evidence has grown that there is simply too great a risk of making an irreversible mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0112839

Today Marks Twelfth Anniversary Of Bulger Disappearance. Under the headline "No Whitey After All These Years," the Boston Herald (1/5, Sweet, 184K) reports, "With the 12 days of Christmas safely behind us, Boston can pause to reflect on today's 12th anniversary of the disappearance of mobster madman James 'Whitey' Bulger. 'The Bulger Task Force . . . continues to dedicate an extraordinary amount of time and effort in the conduct of a worldwide investigation to locate fugitive James Bulger,' said Robert Krekorian, executive assistant U.S. attorney." The Herald notes, "Coincidentally, former FBI Boston Special Agent in Charge Kenneth Kaiser will be feted today at the Omni Parker House. Kaiser, tapped by Washington to serve as assistant director of the FBI's Inspection Division, made finding Bulger 'a priority'" said Hub office spokeswoman Gail Marcinkiewicz. 'He's disappointed that it didn't come to fruition during his tenure here in Boston.'"

The Boston Globe (1/5, Murphy, 413K) reports, "A federal grand jury investigating whether William M. Bulger or his family obstructed efforts to capture his gangster brother…has been extended at least another month, according to two sources familiar with the probe. Federal prosecutors are nearing a decision on whether there is sufficient evidence to ask the grand jury to indict William Bulger…on perjury or obstruction of justice charges, the sources said. The investigation is focusing on whether William Bulge…testified truthfully in April 2001 before a federal grand jury that was looking into whether family or friends of the fugitive knew his whereabouts or were helping him evade capture." The Globe also notes, "Today marks the beginning of Whitey Bulger's 12th year on the run. The longtime FBI informant was warned by his handler, retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., to flee just before his January 1995 federal racketeering indictment."

Study Finds Embezzlement In Most Catholic Dioceses. The New York Times (1/5, Goodstein, Strom) reports, "A survey by researchers at Villanova University has found that 85 percent of Roman Catholic dioceses that responded had discovered embezzlement of church money in the last five years, with 11 percent reporting that more than $500,000 had been stolen." The Times continues, "The Catholic Church has some of the most rigorous financial guidelines of any denomination, specialists in church ethics said, but the survey found that the guidelines were often ignored in parishes. And when no one is looking, the cash that goes into the collection plate does not always get deposited into the church's bank account. … Specialists in church ethics said they believed this was the first study to assess the extent of embezzlement in a denomination." The Times adds, "Officials at the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said they had seen the study, which was released just before Christmas and was first reported in the National Catholic Reporter, and were considering ways that parishes could tighten their financial controls." The Times notes that "the survey did not ask who stole the church money. But it did ask who detected the theft, and found that it was most often the parish priest, followed by the bookkeeper, an internal auditor or the parish finance council. … In October alone, three large cases of embezzlement surfaced, including one in Delray Beach, Fla., where two priests spent $8.6 million on trips to Las Vegas, dental work, property taxes and other expenses over four decades. … Most denominations have had cases of embezzlement, sometimes by top officials. In June, the Presbyterian Church U.S.A. fired its second-ranking financial officer, Judy Golliher, after she admitted stealing money that church officials put at more than $132,000."

Voluntary Statements By Suspects Seen As Window Into Criminal Process. The New York Times (1/5, Hartocollis) reports, "The 'Beast of Broadway,' as the tabloids call him, a successful actor, has been accused of sexually abusing a 15-year-old girl. But his grade-school teacher would be proud of him in at least one respect: He is a good speller. … That much was clear in the two and-a-half page written statement he gave the police after he was arrested, a statement that recounted a behind-the-scenes theater tour for the girl. He wrote these words voluntarily despite a constitutional right to remain silent that is ingrained not only in criminal law, but also in popular culture. But he was hardly the only person arrested in New York in recent years who opened up once the cuffs went on." The Times continues, "A former Women's Wear Daily writer, accused of disguising himself in a firefighter's costume and sexually assaulting a former colleague on Halloween, kept detectives spellbound with his disquisitions on Chinese menus and book rights. … A homeless man accused of stabbing a tourist as he rode with his girlfriend on the subway found that words weren't enough. Asked to sign his confession, he instead sketched a cartoon version of his crime: a pair of lovers' faces — one happy and one sad — and a stormy black cloud floating over a subway train." The Times adds, "Such statements — and occasional illustrations — by defendants in New York City courts are one element of what prosecutors call the V.D.F., more formally known as the People's Voluntary Disclosure Form. To read them is to experience a kind of poetry of everyday criminal life in New York City. … By turns raw, ugly, poignant, defiant, rarely remorseful and almost always damaging, the statements are a window into the criminal process, part of the common language between detectives and suspects. … Because they can be so revealing, the V.D.F.'s are a bane of defense lawyers' existence, and they often try to suppress them so they cannot be used in court. … More technically, the Voluntary Disclosure Form is a rough, preliminary summary of the evidence, which the prosecution is required to give to the defense."

DOJ_NMG_0112840

CIVIL LAW:

FTC Fines Diet Pill Marketers For False-Ad Claims. The Washington Post (1/5, D1, Shin) reports, "The ads for CortiStress said it could reduce your chances of developing Alzheimer's disease. Xenadrine EFX's 'thermogenic technology' was supposed to give your metabolism a lift. And TrimSpa said it contained a plant 'used by African bushmen for centuries' that could help you lose weight so you could 'become all you ever envied.' … Those claims are not credible, the Federal Trade Commission concluded, yesterday announcing it will collect about $25 million from the marketers of those popular weight-control pills to settle allegations that they misled consumers." The Post continues, "None of the products was deemed dangerous to a person's health, and the pills will be allowed to remain on store shelves, FTC officials said. The promoters, however, must change their advertising." The Post adds, "The pharmaceutical company Bayer, which was among the FTC's targets, agreed to pay a $3.2 million civil penalty to settle charges that it violated a previous FTC order that required all health claims for its One-a-Day vitamins be 'supported by competent and reliable scientific evidence.' In national ads, Bayer claimed its One-a-Day WeightSmart contained epigallocatechin gallate (EGCG), a green-tea extract that can help prevent weight gain in women older than 30 who 'can gain 10 pounds a decade, due in part to a slowing metabolism.' … Those claims were not 'substantiated by competent and reliable scientific evidence,' the agency said. … The settlement with Bayer 'is a wake-up call to any company that wants to push the envelope,' FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said. 'Every claim they make they have to have the science to back it up.'"

USA Today (1/5, 1B, Iwata) reports, "Nancy Metcalf, senior project editor at Consumers Union, said the group has lobbied for years to strengthen federal oversight of weight-loss supplements. … 'We have advised people not to take them,' she said."

Eli Lilly Settles Thousands More Suits Over Zyprexa. The Washington Post/AP (1/5, D6, Callahan) reports, "Drugmaker Eli Lilly said Thursday that it will settle about 18,000 additional lawsuits alleging it did not adequately warn patients that its anti-psychotic medication Zyprexa carries a heightened risk of diabetes." The AP continues, "Lilly did not disclose the amount of the settlement but said in a statement that it would take a fourth-quarter settlement charge that's not expected to exceed $500 million." The AP adds, "In a June 2005 settlement, the Indianapolis company agreed to pay about $700 million to resolve more than 8,000 similar lawsuits involving Zyprexa, its top-selling drug. … Lilly spokeswoman Tarra Ryker said the new settlement covered more plaintiffs for less money because the 18,000 cases were less viable due to a 2003 Zyprexa labeling change, which addressed the drug's possible diabetes risk. … She said the company plans to go to trial, beginning in April, to defend itself against the 1,200 remaining claims, which she said are not being settled for 'various reasons.' Lilly declined to elaborate on the specific reasons."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Will Not Probe Death In Virginia Jail. The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (1/5, Mccaffery) reports, "Federal authorities have declined to investigate the July death of an inmate in Portsmouth City Jail." The Virginian-Pilot continues, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation in Norfolk and the Department of Justice informed city officials in Portsmouth last month that they found insufficient evidence to suggest that federal civil rights laws were violated in connection with Joseph Combs's death. … After six days in the city jail, Combs, 57, died of severe dehydration and acute pneumonia, with bipolar disorder contributing, according to his autopsy. … Portsmouth City Attorney Tim Oksman sent letters to federal authorities in November, requesting a civil rights investigation into his death." The Virginian-Pilot adds, "Lamarr Brown , president of the Norfolk-based Organization of African-American Concerns , is speaking for Combs' widow, Granada Combs . … 'This is usually the protocol by the FBI in the Hampton Roads area when the death of a black person is concerned,' Brown said."

DOJ_NMG_0112841

DC Seeks Dismissal Of DOJ Boys Town Suit. The Washington Times (1/5, McElhatton) reports, "D.C. officials want a federal judge to throw out a civil rights complaint filed by the U.S. Justice Department after a jury deadlocked on whether the city discriminated against a group home for disadvantaged youth on Capitol Hill." The times continues, "The complaint centered on whether D.C. officials broke federal housing laws and discriminated against the nonprofit Father Flanagan's Girls and Boys Home, also known as Boys Town. … The Nebraska-based group sued the District in 2001, saying city officials kept Boys Town from opening a group home on Potomac Avenue Southeast by stonewalling project applications amid community opposition to the plans." The Times adds, "The Justice Department later joined as a plaintiff in the federal lawsuit. … 'There was no direct evidence of handicap or racial discrimination against the Boys Town project,' attorneys for the District argued in recent court pleadings. Federal officials declined to say yesterday how they plan to proceed. … 'We're obviously disappointed the jury didn't return a verdict for the United States,' said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department. 'But we continue to think the District of Columbia violated the Fair Housing Act.'"

ANTITRUST:

Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Settled. The Legal Intelligencer (1/5, Duffy) reports, "The final two defendants in a class action antitrust suit against the top manufacturers of automotive refinishing paint have agreed to pay $39 million to settle claims that they participated in a price-fixing conspiracy, bringing the total recovery in the case to more than $105 million." The Intelligencer continues, "In a six-page opinion in In re Automotive Refinishing Paint Antitrust Litigation handed down on Dec. 28, Eastern District of Pennsylvania Judge R. Barclay Surrick granted preliminary approval of the two settlements -- $16 million from Sherwin-Williams Co. and $23 million from PPG Industries -- clearing the way for notices to be sent to the class." The Intelligencer adds, "In prior settlements, E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. paid $36 million; Akzo Nobel Car Refinishes, a subsidiary of Dutch chemical giant Akzo Nobel NV, paid $18.7 million; and two related German companies, BASF and BASF Coatings, paid $12 million total. … The plaintiffs in the suit are a class of direct purchasers -- mostly auto repair shops -- that claim in the suit that the paint manufacturers conducted secret meetings in Europe in which they agreed to 'fix, raise, maintain and stabilize' the prices of refinishing paints. … The suit alleges that during the 1990s, the price increases for auto refinishing paints continued to rise despite a drop in the prices of crude oil and natural gas -- the principal raw materials used to manufacture refinishing paints. … Dozens of suits were filed in 2001 in the wake of news accounts of the Justice Department's probe focused on Akzo Nobel, which had pleaded guilty in 1997 and was fined $10 million for participating in a separate international conspiracy to fix the price of sodium gluconate, an industrial cleaner."

Visa, Mastercard Settle Debit-Card Dispute With US. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, C2) reports, "The federal government is set to collect at least $7 million as part of an 11-year-old court battle that pitted retailers against Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard Inc. in a dispute over debit-card fees." The Journal continues, "Although plaintiffs in the class-action lawsuit settled the case in 2003, the U.S. submitted a claim only last February. That claim then became the subject of a separate dispute when lawyers representing the plaintiffs contended that the government shouldn't get a piece of the $3 billion settlement fund that had been set up for retailers." The Journal adds, "By filing a claim, the government essentially contended that it, like the nation's retailers, had been hurt by Visa and MasterCard rules that required merchants to accept their branded debit cards if they also accepted their credit cards. Government facilities-ranging from military PXs to the souvenir shop at the Smithsonian Institution accept plastic. The government's claim had been submitted by the antitrust division of the Justice Department. … Under the settlement, which was announced late Wednesday, Visa and MasterCard will pay a total of $3.5 million to the government. The settlement fund will contribute $3.7 million. The government may receive additional funds later if there is money left in the settlement fund."

DOJ_NMG_0112842

EU Intensifies Probe Of Energy Companies. The Financial Times (1/5, Buck) reports, "Europe's biggest energy companies face an intensified crackdown by the European Union competition commissioner following an inquiry into the sector that found evidence of collusion and other severe market failings." The Times continues, "In a summary of a 16-month investigation, Neelie Kroes warns she will make 'full and combined use' of her powers over mergers, government subsidies and antitrust abuses to tackle the lack of competition in the sector. … Her report, a copy of which has been obtained by the Financial Times, states: 'Market concentration has been identified as a major concern for the success of the liberalisation process. The market power of pre-liberalisation monopolies has not yet been eroded.'" The Times adds, "The final results of Ms Kroes' sector inquiry are expected to be announced next week, along with a broader review of the EU's energy policy that will also look at cutting greenhouse gas emissions and bolstering the security of Europe's energy supplies. … Her assessment will make uncomfortable reading for many of Europe's biggest energy companies, including Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF in France and Eni in Italy. These groups are already the target of Commission antitrust investigations, and have seen their offices raided by Brussels officials at least once during the past seven months. … The report makes clear that they – and other dominant energy groups – are likely to face further pressure from the Brussels regulator in the near future, for example to cede control over gas pipelines and the power grid or to terminate some of their long-term contracts with customers and energy suppliers."

Dingell Generates Concerns At FCC, Even Among Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Rep. John Dingell "alarms FCC Democrats, too." Back as "chairman of House Energy and Commerce panel after 12 years, the Michigan Democrat has blasted the Republican-controlled communications panel. But his statement of 'significant concerns' about ATT-BellSouth merger rankled Democratic commissioners. The agency's two Democratic board members had won concessions from AT&T to approve the deal. A Dingell aide said he wasn't referring to the Democrats' actions."

South Korea Launches Antitrust Probe Of Qualcomm. The Financial Times (1/5, Nuttall) reports, "South Korean antitrust regulators say they have launched a full-scale investigation into the business practices of Qualcomm, the US wireless chipmaker." The Times continues, "Qualcomm has been the subject of complaints from other chipmakers and handset makers in Europe, Japan and Korea, but the move by the Korean Fair TradeCommission represented the first time that formal action had been taken by the authorities." The Times adds, "An FTC official said a task force had been formed since early in December to step up an investigation into allegations that Qualcomm had used its dominant market position to charge excessive royalties. … It had received complaints between April and June last year from Broadcom and Texas Instruments, rival chipmakers in the US, and Korea's Nextreaming and Thin Multimedia. … They had alleged monopolistic practices by Qualcomm in bundling multimedia products into its chipsets and not opening up its programming interface to allow others to build complementary software applications."

The AP (1/5, Olsen) reports, "Between April and June last year, the FTC received complaints about Qualcomm from Broadcom Corp. and Texas Instruments Inc., both of the U.S., and two South Korean companies, claiming Qualcomm abused its market dominance. … Qualcomm is embroiled in legal and trade disputes with a number of rivals that contend it extracts excessive royalty payments, a charge the company vigorously denies. Korea has long been one of Qualcomm's strongest markets, accounting for 32 percent of $7.53 billion in revenue for its fiscal year that ended Sept. 24."

Major Law Firms Scrap Merger Plans. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, B1, Koppel) reports, "New York law firm Dewey Ballantine LLP is best known for its deals practice. But this time, it wasn't able to pull off a deal of its own." The Journal continues, "Merger plans between Dewey and another major firm, Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, founded in San Francisco, fell apart yesterday amid concerns over money, power and prestige. At least 11 Dewey partners had left in recent months, some taking business with them. … The merger had been heralded as one of the biggest in years and notable given Dewey's stature and lucrative Wall Street practice. … In recent years, many law firms have merged to add practice depth quickly and to enter new national and international markets. Firms are particularly keen on adding lawyers in New York, the world's most lucrative legal market, thanks to a steady supply of corporate-deal work. If the tie-up had gone forward, other New York firms might have felt pressure to join the merger frenzy that has long gripped firms based in others parts of the country. … The failure of this merger may make it harder for firms outside New York to find partners there."

DOJ_NMG_0112843

The New York Times (1/5, De La Merced) reports, "Unlike most merger talks, which are conducted in secrecy, the firms announced in October that their top committees had given preliminary approval to the proposal. At every step in the process after that, the firms expressed confidence that the deal would go through." The Times adds, "The two had already decided upon the name Dewey Orrick for the combined firm. Dewey's chairman, Morton A. Pierce, and Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., would have served as co-chairmen, with Mr. Baxter taking on the additional title of presiding partner. … Partners were to have voted on the deal last month. But as several obstacles proved intractable, those elections were postponed to this month. … Among the most visible distress signals was the departure of 10 partners from Dewey since merger talks began. Most ominous were the exits of three lawyers from Dewey's mergers and acquisitions team, including Michael J. Aiello and Jack S. Bodner, who had been considered protégés of Mr. Pierce."

Prominent LSE Shareholder Increases Its Stake. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, MacDonald) reports, "The second-largest shareholder in London Stock Exchange PLC added to its stake in the company, indicating that some investors still expect Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. to raise its offer for the London market operator, even as LSE's shares have fallen closer to Nasdaq's current offering price." Heyman Investment Associates, an investment vehicle of U.S. businessman Samuel Heyman, "said it had increased its stake in LSE, Europe's largest exchange by the value of stocks traded, to 9.65% from 9.60%." Over the past three days, LSE's share price has gone down 1.8% "to close at £12.87 ($25.10) yesterday; it is now just 3.5% higher than Nasdaq's offer of £12.43 a share. Analysts believe that if LSE's share price falls below £12.43, enough hedge funds will sell their shares to Nasdaq to give it the 50% it says it needs to take over the London exchange."

ENVIRONMENT:

Park Service Still Sells "Creationist" Account Of Grand Canyon. The New York Times (1/5, Dean, 1.16M) reports that when "complaints emerged in 2004 over the sale of a creationist account of the formation of the Grand Canyon in National Park Service bookstores, Interior Department officials said they would review whether the book should be pulled from the shelves." But there "was no formal review, in part because of differences of opinion among the Park Service's own specialists, said David Barna, a spokesman for the agency, in an interview yesterday." In the end, "no formal action was taken, and the book remains on sale because, Mr. Barna said in a written statement, 'It is not our role to tell people what to believe.'"

EPA Official Warns Of Slow Progress On Chesapeake Bay Revitalization. The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Fahrenthold) reports, "The multibillion-dollar cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay, which government officials had pledged would succeed by 2010, will likely miss that deadline by a wide margin -- and, at the current pace, might drag on for decades more, an Environmental Protection Agency official acknowledged yesterday." The Post continues, "Rich Batiuk, an associate director of the EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program, made that projection at a meeting of the Chesapeake Bay Commission, an advisory group that includes state officials from Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania. … His talk was a blunt, and public, admission of something that the EPA had conceded in an agency report last year. A pledge to "save the bay," made six years ago in the so-called Chesapeake 2000 Agreement, is falling drastically short." The Post adds, "The news means a continued struggle for one of this area's most cherished bodies of water, one that Washingtonians turn to for seafood, sailing, recreational fishing and weekend scenery. It is also bad news for such Chesapeake tributaries as the Potomac River, where the pollution and runoff bring mud, algae blooms and dangerous chemicals on the way to the bay. … Batiuk's assessment was not news to many environmentalists, who have said for years that roads and suburbs in the watershed were growing too fast and that cleanup efforts at farms and sewage plants were moving too slowly for the deadline to be met."

DOJ_NMG_0112844

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Records Reveal Details Of Rehnquist Drug Dependence. The AP (1/5, Yost) reports, "A physician at the U.S. Capitol prescribed a powerful sleep aid for William Rehnquist for nearly a decade while he was an associate justice of the Supreme Court, according to newly released FBI records. The records present a picture of a justice with chronic back pain who for many months took three times the recommended dosage of the drug Placidyl and then went into withdrawal in 1981 when he abruptly stopped taking it. Rehnquist checked himself into George Washington University Hospital, where he tried to escape in his pajamas and imagined that the CIA was plotting against him, the records indicate." The AP notes, "The doctor who helped Rehnquist get off the drug said the justice's wife…felt that the prescribing physician and the pharmacist who filled the prescription were probably intimidated by such high-ranking officials as Supreme Court justices and senators and probably would have agreed to almost any request."

Files Also Show FBI Investigated Confirmation Witness Testimony. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (1/5, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "The files also show that during both of Rehnquist's confirmation battles…the Justice Department enlisted the FBI to find out what witnesses lined up by Senate Democrats were prepared to say." North Carolina lawyer Alexander Charns said that the files "contain evidence of 'the ongoing use of the FBI for political purposes, not only in the sixties and seventies but well into the 1980s.'" However, FBI spokesman Paul Bresson "denied that the FBI's background investigations for judicial nominees are partisan in any way. 'We are not political; we are apolitical. We're just trying to find the facts,' he said." Then-Assistant Attorney General John R. Bolton "said in a telephone interview yesterday that there was no political bias in the investigation, because the request actually came from Senate Democrats."

Judge Rejects Request To Throw Out Statements In Florida Torture Case. The St. Petersburg Times (1/5) reports, "Testifying for the first time since his arrest in a case involving allegations of torture, rape and murder, Scott Schweickert accused authorities Thursday of violating his rights by denying him a lawyer when he was first questioned." Schweickert "is charged with conspiracy and assisting in a drug-facilitated crime of violence against Michael Wachholtz and Jason Galehouse, both 26. The two men disappeared the same weekend in December 2003." DEA agent Scott Albrecht "testified that Schweickert had been informed of his right to an attorney several times but never requested one. … 'The evidence shows that at no time did the defendant request a lawyer,'" the judge said.

Grand Jury In Baltimore Indicts Five On Drug Charges. The Baltimore Sun (1/4) reported a grand jury in Baltimore indicted five defendants after federal agents "seized 23 kilograms of cocaine last month and arrested the men involved in the delivery to Howard County on conspiracy charges." According to court documents, a state trooper in North Carolina stopped a tractor-trailer Dec. 18 for speeding. The trooper "found cocaine in the vehicle, authorities said." The Sun says court documents show that DEA agents learned that two men were delivering the cocaine from California to a truck stop in Howard County.

Authorities To Use Racketeering Law Against Florida Gang Members As Murder Rate Rises. The Palm Beach Post (1/5) reports federal agents "will step in to help prosecute local gang members under the nation's racketeering laws," according to Palm Beach County Sheriff Ric Bradshaw. Members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and probably the Drug Enforcement Administration will go after those responsible for a surge in murders, Bradshaw said. The nation's racketeering law, stronger than the state statute, allows investigators to charge gang leaders who orchestrate a killing even if they did not pull the trigger." Defense attorneys "have criticized use of those laws, however, saying that federal agents have used tenuous links and a wide dragnet to win convictions of low-level gang members who were not responsible for violent crimes."

Sessions May Get Democratic Backing For Drug Sentencing Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions "may find better luck under Democratic control with his bill to reduce the sentencing disparity between crack and powder cocaine." Democratic backers "want to eliminate the disparity altogether, arguing it discriminates against black defendants. But they face law-enforcement resistance, leaving Sessions's proposal as a potential compromise."

DOJ_NMG_0112845

Colombia Extradites 2 To Face Drug-Smuggling Charges In US. There are more than 50 media references to Colombia's extradition of two men accused of helping to smuggle cocaine into the U.S. The AP (1/5) reports Colombia "has extradited to the United States a police officer and a former policeman charged with helping smuggle more than 2 tons of cocaine into the U.S. on cargo flights. Leonidas Molina Triana, a former major in the Colombia's national police, and Humberto Avila, a patrolman at Bogota's El Dorado airport, were arrested in April as part a joint probe by prosecutors in New York and law enforcement agencies in Colombia, the United States and Mexico. Four other current and former officers, as well as a commercial airline employee, are expected to be extradited soon, Erin McKenzie-Mulvey, a DEA spokeswoman in New York, told The Associated Press." Media outlets that used the AP story include the New York Times, Washington Post, Walls Street Journal, Los Angeles Times, Forbes, Newsday, the Houston Chronicle, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Fort Worth Star Telegram.

The Washington Times (1/5) reports DEA Special Agent in Charge John P. Gilbride "said Colombia's infamous Norte Valle drug cartel recruited Colombian police officials responsible for airport security and employees of Avianca Airlines to facilitate the smuggling of cocaine to the United States. … DEA spokesman Garrison K. Courtney said the extraditions are part of 'Operation Caso Dorado,' a joint investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's Office in New York, the DEA in Bogota and New York, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities. … The indictment also seeks the forfeiture of $50 million from the two men."

On its Web site, Voice of America (1/4) reports the indictment "alleges that Molina Triana was one of a number of corrupt officials who helped Colombia's Norte del Valle drug cartel recruit workers at Avianca Airlines, and police at El Dorado airport, to ship cocaine on commercial aircraft. … The United States, however, has assured Colombia it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from the South American country."

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Orders Deportation Of Wisconsin Man Accused Of Being Nazi Camp Guard. The AP (1/5) reports from Chicago, "An immigration judge ordered the deportation of an 81-year-old Wisconsin man accused of serving as a Nazi concentration camp guard, the Justice Department announced today." The AP continues, "Judge Jennie Giambastiani ordered Wednesday that Josias Kumpf be deported to Germany, Austria or Serbia. The department said Kumpf chose Germany, although it was unclear when he would be deported. … Kumpf's attorney, Peter Rogers of Pittsburgh, said his client would appeal the ruling within 30 days as required." The AP adds, "In July, the federal government asked the judge to deport Kumpf, who was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 2005 after a federal judge in Milwaukee concluded he had 'personally assisted' in the persecution of prisoners. … Kumpf served as an armed SS guard at Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp in Germany, an SS labor camp in Trawniki, Poland, and at construction sites in occupied France, the Justice Department said."

TAX:

DOJ Sues Illinois Couple Over Faulty Tax Returns. The Peoria (IL) Journal Star (1/5, Deshinsky) reports, "The Justice Department has brought a federal lawsuit against a Seneca (IL) couple accused of costing the U.S. Treasury more than $13 million in faulty income tax returns." The Star continues, "The suit, filed Dec. 29 in U.S. District Court in Chicago against Royanne and Neal Reddy, seeks to permanently bar them from preparing federal tax returns for others. Their companies are advertised as specializing in tax service for trucking and construction companies. … The Reddys own Royanne's Tax Service in Marseilles and Royanne and Company in Princeton. The couple has prepared more than 9,000 returns since 2002, according to a Justice Department news release." The Star adds, "The lawsuit alleges 70 of these returns, which were prepared by the Reddys or their employees, required adjustments and 64 returns contained improper deductions of as much as $30,000. The suit also says the savings from the under-reported returns averaged to about $2,775 per customer. … The Reddys are accused of fraudulently fabricating or inflating business expenses to reduce customers' incomes. They are also accused of fabricating income for some customers so they could receive earned income tax credits."

DOJ_NMG_0112846

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Take Control Of Congress In "Historic" Day. The AP (1/5, Espo) reports, "In a day of ceremony and historic change, Rep. Nancy Pelosi became the nation's first female House speaker on Thursday as Democrats eagerly took control of Congress for the final two years of President Bush's term. 'The Democrats are back,' rejoiced Pelosi, and she immediately set the rank-and-file to work passing tougher ethics rules." Media reports last night and this morning universally emphasize the "historic" nature of Pelosi's election. As McClatchy (1/5, Talev, Douglas) notes, Pelosi herself referred to the "historic moment for the Congress and for the women of this country" and "a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years." The AP (1/5, Werner) reports she also "marveled aloud at her long journey 'from the kitchen to the Congress.'"

In the midst of the "historic" House session, the Senate transfer of power is receiving much less attention. The AP (1/5) reports that "across the Capitol, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky took over as leader of minority Republicans, and said it was time to put an end to 'a culture of partisanship over principle.'" Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he was eager for cooperation, and he arranged for a rare closed-door meeting of all senators before the Senate convened to help set a more cordial tone." The Washington Times (1/5, Miller, 88K) quotes McConnell saying, "I stake my party to a pledge: when faced with an urgent issue, we will act; when faced with a problem, we will seek solutions, not mere political advantage." In his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (1/5, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank says Reid was bound to be overshadowed yesterday. Pelosi was the first woman to become speaker in American history. Reid was merely the 20th man to become Senate majority leader since the position was created 87 years ago. … Part of the disparity, however, was less about history than style. Pelosi scheduled four days of parties for her installation -- a festival Republicans dubbed the Pelosi-Palooza -- including an extravaganza featuring Tony Bennett, and a street naming for Pelosi in her native Baltimore."

Media coverage of the new Congress was generally very positive. The CBS Evening News (1/4, lead story, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Americans voted for a change in the last election and today we got it. … A CBS News poll out tonight finds 68% of Americans are optimistic about this new Congress. That includes 84% of the Democrats we polled but less than half of the Republicans." The New York Times (1/5, Leibovich, 1.16M) says this morning, "Against the sober backdrop of war and as Democrats ascended in both chambers, people of both parties spoke of how committed they were to working together and changing the political tone. … But maybe this time really will be different. Like 63-degree weather in January (and cherry blossoms out of season), Washington seemed to have flipped on its head, power-wise, karma-wise, at least for a few hours. There were children and flowers everywhere, and pictures of Vice President Dick Cheney and Senator Edward M. Kennedy mugging together."

But the Los Angeles Times (1/5, Simon, Havemann, 850K) says "there were signs of partisan tensions in the House even before Pelosi was elected speaker." She "pressed ahead with her agenda for the House's first 100 legislative hours -- over Republican grumbling that she planned House floor votes without the usual committee action first. … Next week, the House will begin voting on legislation that will need Senate consent and Bush's signature, including some highly controversial items. At the head of that list is a bill to expand embryonic stem cell research -- the subject of Bush's only veto in his six years in office."

In fact, says the Chicago Tribune (1/5, Zuckman, 617K) reports, "After convening, the House immediately adopted new rules Thursday tightening ethics guidelines by banning lobbyists from giving gifts, meals and tickets to members and their staffs. The rules would also prohibit lobbyists from paying for a lawmaker's travel or providing flights on corporate jets. The measure passed 235-195, largely along partisan lines."

On ABC World News (1/4, story 2, 1:40, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos noted House Democrats "are not banning fund-raising by lobbyists. This is an odd loophole. They can still host big, lavish parties at conventions. But this is a bipartisan conspiracy. Neither party right now wants to have campaign finance reform." And in his "Wonder Land" column, Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/5, 2.04M), "The biggest mistake you can make is thinking that the ethics package proposed by new Speaker Nancy Pelosi is mainly about 'cleaning up' politics. Maybe. But it's first of all about cleaning the clocks of the Republicans."

DOJ_NMG_0112847

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel, on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner), expressed hopes for lasting bipartisan collaboration: "I heard them today -- I heard Minority Leader Boehner, I've talked with Republicans on my committee. I really think that we believe that working together in a bipartisan way is good for our committees, it's good for the Congress, and I know it's good for the country. … I'm working with the leadership to see that we don't get caught doing the same thing that the Republicans did. All decisions have not been made, but I do believe that we should have an opportunity to have hearings on these issues within the 100 hours."

The Washington Post (1/6, A6, Eilperin, 690K) says Republicans "eschewed news conferences and raucous receptions yesterday and instead quietly conferred among themselves and observed the traditional Opening Day rites with their families and friends." But "GOP leaders signaled that they won't quietly fade into the background, and they pledged to promote innovative policies and stay true to conservative ideals -- a path that they hope will lead to victory in 2008. Although they will challenge Democrats on a broad range of domestic and foreign policy issues, they say they won't resort to guerrilla-style tactics or harsh rhetoric."

Outreach To Democrats Seen As Signaling "End Of An Era For Bush." The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Hook, 850K) says that "after Republicans' resounding defeat in the fall elections, Bush and his lieutenants are now paying attention to Democratic power brokers they had all but ignored for years." Reid is getting "red carpet treatment," Pelosi "got a Christmas Day phone call from Bush at home in San Francisco. New committee chairmen are enjoying quality face-time with Cabinet bigwigs. Even potential White House allies from the Democrats' conservative wing had been ignored for the past six years, but they now are being ushered into the Oval Office." Those "gestures and other bows to bipartisanship are signs that the swearing in of the new Congress is not just a fresh start for Democrats; it is the end of an era for Bush, who has had the luxury of governing for most of the last six years with his own party in charge of Congress."

Senate-House Differences, Ideological Divide Could Hinder Democratic Agenda. The Financial Times (1/5, Luce) reports Pelosi and Reid "both said that tackling the congressional 'culture of corruption' would be their chief priority during the next few days." Their proposals, "which are aimed at weakening the notorious links between lawmakers and so-called 'K Street' lobbyists that have ballooned in recent years, include a ban on accepting gifts or air tickets from lobby groups and forcing lawmakers to declare their names when they insert in legislation 'earmarks' that are sponsored by special interest groups." However, the New York Times (1/5, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) says that "in contrast" to the House plans, "the initial Senate ethics bill would ban only gifts or meals and not trips paid for by lobbyists or their employers. It would not restrict the use of corporate jets. It would require disclosure of the sponsors of only a small fraction of spending earmarks, excluding those added to supplementary material, called Congressional reports, that explain legislative intent or that are directed through federal agencies like the Defense Department. Nor does the Senate bill propose any independent enforcement." The Times adds, "Some senior Democratic aides said the House rules had upped the ante for the Senate."

The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports "it was clear yesterday that the Senate would have no choice but to take a more deliberative approach to the issues the House plans to bulldoze through. Senate leaders pledged bipartisanship, and in a chamber divided 51 to 49 , they will have no choice." Even in the House, "Democrats are already having trouble reconciling their promises even for the initial hundred-hour blitz. Senior House Democratic aides said a promise to cut student-loan interest rates in half will have to be phased in over five years to comply with a pledge to offset any additional deficit spending with equal spending cuts or tax hikes." The Post adds, "The loan pledge is proving just too expensive, and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and the committee's senior Republican, Charles E. Grassley (Iowa) introduced legislation yesterday to immediately repeal the alternative minimum tax, a proposal that would cost the Treasury hundreds of billions of dollars." In a similar story, the Wall Street Journal (1/5, Rogers, 2.04M) also says "Senate Democrats appear reluctant to be as bold as their House counterparts by trying to change rules unilaterally. Instead, the plan is to move with a hybrid package of rules and legislative changes."

Moreover, the New York Times (1/5, Broder, 1.16M) reports that "there were signs…of division among Democrats over how hard to push to undo the fruits of years of Republican rule. Many Democrats say those years moved the nation too far right, but others argue that the big tax cuts and regulatory relaxations are part of the permanent legislative framework that should be accepted." Analyzing that split, the New York Times (1/5, Hulse, 1.16M) also reports Democrats "must face reality." They "must reconcile diverse ideological factions within their ranks and make a fundamental choice. … In a meeting with the Congressional Black Caucus earlier in the day, Mrs. Pelosi made her own allusions to the competing tugs on Democrats, noting the party was rooted in its traditions but not hostage to the past."

DOJ_NMG_0112848

In his Washington Post column (1/5), Eugene Robinson appears to embody that split, writing that he doesn't mean "to belittle the Democratic agenda, as far as it goes. But it tiptoes around the big, ugly monster of an issue sitting in the middle of the room -- the war in Iraq. The new Congress is going to have to stop temporizing and stand up to George W. Bush on the war. … Very soon, perhaps inconveniently soon, Democrats are going to have to take a stand."

More Congressional Commentary On Democratic Agenda. Rep. Adam Putnam said on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner) that Democrats have "rolled out an ambitious schedule for just next week alone to deal with minimum wage, student loans, prescription drugs, their whole agenda, with no committee hearings, no opportunities for half of the Congress to prepare amendments and offer their version. And my take on the election last November was that, as much as anything, the American people were saying, 'You guys need to get your act together and clean up the House, get rid of this bumper-crop of scandals. We want to know that every member of Congress has an equal say and equal opportunity to impact legislation.' And not only are they depriving Republicans of the opportunity to be heard, but they're depriving talented chairmen like Mr. Rangel of the opportunity to refine these packages."

Rep. Chaka Fattah said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/4, Matthews), "Oversight's going to be a very important part of the work of the 110th Congress. But we promised, first and foremost, over these first 100 hours, that we would raise the minimum wage, that we would make the availability of stem cells available for medical research, that we would lower the interest rate on college loans. So it's important that we keep our word, keep our promise. The Democratic Party now has the majority. And we also have the moral compass to understand that the country doesn't want to see a lot of partisan back and forth, but they do want answers."

Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on MSNBC (1/4, Gregory), "I think what we're seeing is that they wanted things done one way. And when we were in the majority and wanted to have more rights and more participation -- and under the Republican majority they were given wonderful consideration. … They were always given motions to recommit. They were given committee debate. They had their legislation going through committee. And now that they are taking control, the bipartisanship seems to have gone by the wayside."

NYTimes Calls Tying Minimum Wage To Tax Cuts "Idiocy." The New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "As the minimum wage moves to the top of the new Congress's agenda, some politicians -- mainly President Bush and Senate Republicans -- seem incapable of viewing the issue as anything other than a pretext for more tax cuts. This time the lucky recipients would be small-business owners, who the politicians contend will be unduly harmed by having to pay higher wages. So much for ringing in the new. … It's that sort of idiocy the new Congress was elected to stop."

Democrats End Day With "Glitzy Fundraiser." The Washington Post (1/5, C1, Montgomery, Du Lac, 690K) reports, "Despite the promised 'new direction for America,' getting the money out of politics and all of that, some facts of Washington life appear immutable and eternal." The Democrats ended their "history-making day" with Pelosi "presiding over a glitzy fundraiser open to anyone with $1,000 for a ticket. … Organizers expected 1,000 to 1,500 guests, with checks to be made out to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Many complimentary tickets were given out, and DCCC spokeswoman Jen Psaki could not immediately say how much money was raised. She said fundraisers are usually closed to the news media, but arrangements were made to allow reporters to hear Pelosi's remarks."

Pelosi's Ascension To Speakership Greeted With Excitement. The Washington Post (1/5, Layton, 690K), in a story titled "Women Bask in New Speaker's Shining Moment," says this morning "This was the visual they had dreamed about for years, for decades, for a lifetime. A woman standing on the wooden dais before the high-backed leather chair of the speaker of the House, the gavel in her hand, the American flag draped behind her." When Pelosi "made American history yesterday and was formally elected speaker, the raucous cheers that rang through the House chamber came from young girls in Mary Janes, working women in business suits, elderly ladies carrying canes and more than a few men."

DOJ_NMG_0112849

TV coverage of Pelosi's ascension was extensive and also very positive. ABC World News (1/4, lead story, 3:45, Gibson, 8.78M) notes the "symbolic" picture of "the new Speaker…on the floor…holding her 6-year-old grandson," and "all the while, giving directions on how events were to proceed. It seemed the ultimate in multitasking -- taking care of the children and the country." NBC Nightly News (1/4, lead story, 2:45, Reid, 9.87M) said "on the floor of the House it was a day like no other -- children and grandchildren seemed to out number members of Congress." Democrats "were jubilant." NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 2, 2:25, Mitchell, 9.87M) later reported Pelosi's "arrival today had the excitement of a Presidential entrance," and added "women who fought for years to break down the barriers like, Pat Schroeder, returned to savor their victory." Rep. Loretta Sanchez was shown saying, "I think we were all in tears down on the House floor earlier as she was nominated and confirmed as our Speaker."

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 8, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) also said, "This was a big day for women, and not just Nancy Pelosi," and goes on to profile new Rep. Carol Shea Porter, a surprise winner in New Hampshire last November. The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 9, 0:45, Couric, 7.66M) added, "We can't let this historic day pass without mentioning Susan B. Anthony, who fought so hard for the right of women to vote but didn't live to see us get it."

House Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell said on MSNBC (1/4, Mitchell), "I think not only are the women pleased with these events, but, quite honestly, men like me are also quite delighted, because we are giving now another step toward real equality for all of our people." And Sen. Barbara Boxer said on MSNBC (1/4, Scarborough), "We shared some of the excitement of seeing our friend Nancy become the speaker. I served over there in the House for 10 years. Honestly, I thought I'd see a woman president before I saw a woman speaker, just because of the culture of the House."

The New York Times (1/5, Broder, 1.16M) says "even Republicans grudgingly acknowledged the unprecedented nature of the day on which a woman ascended to power on Capitol Hill by rising as one to applaud her." House Minority Whip Roy Blunt said on Fox News' Your World (1/4, Cavuto) said, "I think there is an appropriate attitude here today of recognizing the achievement Nancy Pelosi has made to become the first woman speaker. … The new majority whip, Jim Clyburn, is only the second African-American to hold that job. And this is a day for them that they have some right to celebrate."

And USA Today (1/5, Kiely, Schouten, 2.27M) notes "the 33 new or re-elected senators who took their oaths included seven women, bringing the total number of women in Congress' upper chamber to a record 16. There are a record 74 women in the House, including three non-voting delegates."

Waters Votes For Abzug, Steinem. The Washington Times (1/5, Hurt, 88K) notes Democratic Rep. Maxine Waters didn't vote for Pelosi for speaker. Instead, she "cast her vote in honor of feminist icons Bella Abzug and Gloria Steinem."

Bush, Pelosi Calls For Bipartisanship Seen As Insincere. In the Washington Post (1/5, A17, 690K), Greg Craig, a former Clinton White House aide, writes, "Forgive the cynicism, Mr. President, but if you were serious about cooperating and consulting with the new Congress, you wouldn't be parading your bipartisan bona fides through the op-ed pages of the Wall Street Journal. You wouldn't be holding news conferences in the Rose Garden telling the world how ready, willing and able you are -- we know you are not eager -- to work with the Democratic Congress. You would instead be meeting privately with Democratic leaders, identifying specific areas where progress can be made and joining with them to come up with a legislative agenda that is truly bipartisan." Craig adds, "To many of us, your post-November conversion to bipartisanship appears to be nothing but spin -- at least so far. You misunderestimate our capacity to remember the way you treated the Democrats when your party ran Congress. We will not soon forget your 'my way or the highway' approach. You will forgive us if we pay more attention to what you do than to what you say." Craig also criticizes Pelosi for not waiting "a decent interval before shoving legislation down the throats of the minority party. … Forgive me for being hard-boiled, but from my perspective inside the Beltway, it looks like 2007 is business as usual."

Webb Explains Snub Of Bush. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/4, Matthews) about his tense encounter with the President at a holiday party, Sen. Jim Webb said, "It's been a bit overblown, but I think when people are now seeing how John McCain is handling the situation with his son being in the Marine Corps, perhaps they can understand a little bit more what I was having to go through during the entire campaign. I greatly respect my son's service and all of the people who are serving. At the same time, I have not commented, even to many of my friends, about the operational side. That's personal to me, in terms of my feelings about it. And it was not a casual comment."

DOJ_NMG_0112850

Democrats' Control Of Senate Means End For "Candy Desk" Supply. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A1, Lueck, 2.04M) reports in a front page story that with Democrats "back in control of Congress for the first time in years, much is changing in the nation's capital, including a longtime tradition in the U.S. Senate: the 'candy desk.'" Outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum "stocked the desk with donations from home-state candy makers including Hershey Co. and Just Born Inc., maker of Hot Tamales and Peanut Chews." The desk has "been turned over to Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican from Wyoming. But his state is better known for bison than bonbons -- and that's a big problem." Ethics rules "forbid members accepting gifts worth $100 or more a year from a single source. One exception covers items produced in a senator's home state -- so long as they're used primarily by people other than the senator or his staff. The provision was crafted to allow senators to offer visitors home-grown snacks, such as Florida orange juice or Georgia peanuts." Wyoming "doesn't have any big, brand-name candy makers who could step into the breach. As a result, the candy-industry lobbying group, which coordinates stocking the desk, is cutting off the sweets, citing Wyoming's candy deficit and ethics rules."

Miers Resigns White House Post. The AP (1/5, Riechmann) reports, "Harriet Miers, President Bush's failed Supreme Court nominee and longtime adviser, on Thursday submitted her resignation as White House counsel." White House press secretary Tony Snow "said the president reluctantly accepted her resignation, which takes effect Jan. 31. He said a search for a successor is under way. … Asked why she was leaving, Snow said: 'Basically, she has been here six years.'"

The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Baker, Smith, 690K), under the headline "Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up for Battle," says Bush is remaking "his legal team to prepare for what aides expect to be a sustained struggle with a new Democratic Congress eager to investigate various aspects of his administration." Miers "led an office that will oversee legal clashes that could erupt if Democrats aggressively use their new subpoena power. Bush advisers inside and outside the White House concluded that she is not equipped for such a battle and that the president needs someone who can strongly defend his prerogatives." The Post adds, "At the Justice Department, lawyers in the Office of Legal Counsel have been meeting with counterparts from other agencies to discuss potential points of conflict with Congress and to map out legal strategies for responding to demands for documents and testimony, according to several officials. The department has also held internal meetings on this topic in recent weeks with representatives from the FBI and from Justice's other major components, one official said."

The New York Times (1/5, Rutenberg, 1.16M) notes Miers "started at the White House as staff secretary after the 2000 campaign and became a deputy chief of staff before moving to the White House counsel's office." Bush's "decision to nominate her to the Supreme Court in 2005 provoked the ire of liberals and conservatives, who criticized her as a Bush crony who did not have the legal intellectual credentials or résumé the job required. She withdrew her name from consideration but returned to Mr. Bush's inner circle and remained one of his closest advisers."

Before Resigning, Miers Joined Laura Bush, Others At Hughes Birthday Party. In its "The Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (1/5, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) relates, "Wednesday night's full moon brought all sorts of VIPs out on the town: Laura Bush, Condi Rice, Mary Matalin, Margaret Spellings and Harriet Miers at Cactus Cantina for a surprise birthday party for Karen Hughes. A dozen Bush administration power babes gathered at the Tex-Mex restaurant for fajitas, enchiladas, quesadillas, margaritas and chocolate cake with a 'classified' number of candles. (Hughes turned 50 on Dec. 27.) No word on how many hot chilies Miers ate, but she announced her resignation yesterday morning. Hmmmm."

Consumer Groups To Oppose Likely Bush CPSC Nominee. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that consumer groups are prepared "to assail rumored Bush candidate to head Consumer Product Safety Commission, National Association of Manufacturers lobbyist Michael Baroody." Rachel Weintraub of the Consumer Federation of America said, "It's sort of astonishing that the administration would pick someone from a regulated industry."

Health Issues May Prompt First Bush-Congress Conflict. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that health issues "may spark first big clash between Bush and new Congress." The House "votes next week on lifting federal stem-cell research limits, but proponents lack two-thirds needed to override another Bush veto. Senate backers claim the votes to do so, and most Republican 2008 presidential candidates back expanded research." Administration aides "and pharmaceutical lobbyists say Bush would veto as 'price controls' the House Democratic plan to require government negotiations with drug makers for lower Medicare costs. But the Senate may water down the legislation by merely permitting negotiations."

DOJ_NMG_0112851

Democrats Urged To End "Subsidy" To Medicare HMOs. In his New York Times column (1/5), Paul Krugmam says, "Universal health care, much as we need it, won't happen until there's a change of management in the White House. In the meantime, however, Congress can take an important step toward making our health care system less wasteful, by fixing the Medicare Middleman Multiplication Act of 2003." The new Democratic majority "is poised to reduce drug prices by allowing — and, probably, requiring — Medicare to negotiate prices on behalf of the private drug plans. But it should go further, and force Medicare to offer direct drug coverage that competes on a financially fair basis with the private plans. And it should end the subsidy to Medicare Advantage, forcing H.M.O.'s to engage in fair competition with traditional Medicare."

Medicare Part D Signups Encounter Fewer Glitches This Year. USA Today (1/5, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Patient advocates and pharmacists are reporting fewer glitches as the Medicare drug benefit begins its second year, but they say problems could still crop up in the coming weeks." While "confusion was widespread" last year when the program was implemented, this year, Mike James, a Raleigh, NC pharmacist, said "We're seeing similar problems as we saw in January '06, but they're not as prolific." However, USA Today adds, "Because many of the insurers have made changes to their policies since last year, new concerns could crop up in the coming weeks."

Ellison Sworn In With Jefferson's Quran. USA Today (1/5, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "On the same day Nancy Pelosi became the first female speaker of the House, freshman Rep. Keith Ellison got almost as much attention." Ellison, "the first Muslim elected to Congress, used a Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson rather than a Bible as he re-enacted his swearing-in with Pelosi." USA Today adds, "The scene created a human traffic jam near the House floor. About 30 members of Ellison's extended family posed before about two dozen TV cameras, including one from the Arab network Al-Arabiya."

The AP (1/5, Frommer) reports "the Quran was acquired in 1815 as part of a more than 6,400-volume collection that Jefferson sold for $24,000 to replace the congressional library that had been burned by British troops the year before, in the War of 1812." McClatchy (1/5) and the Washington Times (1/6, DeBose, 88K) run similar reports.

Bodman Fires Nuclear Weapons Chief Over Security Failures. The New York Times (1/5, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "The Energy Secretary fired the head of the department's nuclear weapons program on Thursday, citing a series of security failures at national laboratories, including the discovery of a computer device containing thousands of classified documents in the home of a former worker during a drug raid by the police. The official who was dismissed, Linton F. Brooks, had been administrator of the National Nuclear Security Agency since May 2003. The Times adds, "The agency was established in 2000 because of chronic security problems in the weapons program. The problems continued during Mr. Brooks's service. On Wednesday, the latest in a string of reports by [DOE's] inspector general criticizing the agency, dated Nov. 27, 2006, was released." Secretary Bodman "said in a statement on Thursday that lax security 'can have serious implications for the security of the United States.' Under Mr. Brooks, the agency "has done its best to address these concerns,' Mr. Bodman said. But he added, 'I do not believe that progress in correcting these issues has been adequate.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 2, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "On another matter, Sharyl's been leading the way for months in exposing security breaches at the nation's nuclear weapons facilities, things like missing or mishandled classified documents. Well today, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman fired the man in charge, Linton Brooks. Bodman said Brooks had not corrected the security problems and it's time for new leadership at the National Nuclear Security Administration."

The Washington Post (1/5, A7, Mufson, 690K) says, "The dismissal comes after embarrassing security lapses, including the Oct. 17 discovery of drug paraphernalia and computer flash drives containing highly classified information in the trailer home of a contractor." While "Bodman refused to elaborate on his statement, the removal of Brooks also comes as Democrats, determined to hold oversight hearings on the nuclear laboratories' security problems, take control of Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0112852

The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Vartabedian, 850K) reports Bodman "issued an unusual public statement Thursday saying he had asked for the resignation." As problems mounted, members of Congress "began to question the agency's performance, particularly multibillion-dollar cost overruns and technical setbacks on new weapons research facilities." The "tough handling of Brooks appeared intended to make a strong statement, particularly coming on the first day of Democratic control of House and Senate committees that have oversight of the nuclear weapons complex."

The AP (1/5, Hebert) adds, "Widely respected for his knowledge of nuclear weapons and nonproliferation issues, Brooks nevertheless has been a target of some members of Congress."

New Year Sparks Wave Of Federal Worker Retirements. The Washington Post's (1/5, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The start of the new year is when the village elders say their farewells across the government. Agencies lose valued, experienced hands; the retirees take on new pursuits." The Post adds, "Many federal employees retire around the turn of the year because provisions in federal retirement and leave laws make it advantageous," since "most senior employees are covered by the older of two retirement systems that permits them to receive a pension payment in February if they leave the federal payroll in early January. Many also retire at this time of the year because it seems the best time to make a break and step aside." Since most "agencies slow down for the holidays," that "seems to make it easier to say goodbyes and find the time to sort through files and pack boxes."

Democrats Urged To Make Tough Decisions To Restore Fiscal "Sanity." In his Washington Post column (1/5, A17), David Ignatius says, "A good way for the Democrats to start the new congressional season is to examine just how it happened that the federal government moved from budget surplus to deficit during the Bush presidency. If Democrats can be clear about what went wrong, then maybe (maybe) they can begin to fix it." An "honest budget discussion should start with an admission that the projected surpluses of the post-Clinton years were largely illusory -- in the sense that they were predicated on overly upbeat assumptions about the economy." But the Bush Administration "and the GOP Congress made a bad situation much worse -- by enacting tax and spending programs that shredded any semblance of fiscal responsibility." The Democrats "face the essential political decision as they take their seats: Do they want to make people happy by postponing tough decisions or do they want to get serious about restoring fiscal sanity? Are they the party of good times or good governance?"

NYTimes Says Congress Should Raise Federal Judges' Pay. The New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. is embracing with gusto a cause championed by his predecessor, William Rehnquist: the need for a substantial pay raise for federal judges. Justice Roberts devoted his second annual year-end report to this issue, and it should be required reading in Congress." Roberts is "right to note the link between maintaining an adequate standard of judicial compensation and preserving the quality and independence of the judiciary, and to prod Congress on this issue." The nation "would be well-served by a comprehensive bipartisan package that grants federal judges a sizable raise, ends the linkage between judicial and Congressional salaries, and requires judges to forgo privately financed junkets that cast an ethical cloud on the courts."

WSJournal Says Pelosi "Paygo" Is Tax Trap. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Congressional Democrats are dashing out of the gates to establish their fiscal conservative credentials. And as early as today House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will push through so-called 'pay-as-you-go' budget rules for Congress. Keep an eye on your wallet." "Paygo," "as Washington insiders call it, sounds like a fiscally prudent budget practice: If government spends more on program A, it has to spend less money on program B, and thus budget deficits will be restrained. We're all for that. But when Republicans proposed exactly that budget rule in recent years, House Democrats voted it down." Under Pelosi's "paygo plan, new entitlement programs and all new tax cuts would have to be offset by either cutbacks in other entitlement programs or tax increases. This version of paygo is a budget trapdoor, designed not to control expenditures but to make it easier to raise taxes while blocking future tax cuts."

DOJ_NMG_0112853

OTHER NEWS:

Oil Prices Fall To Lowest Level Since 2005.

USA Today (1/5, 1B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "Crude oil prices fell Thursday to the lowest level since mid-2005, pressured by warm weather, faltering demand and government data showing inventories at healthy levels. ... Crude oil for February delivery closed at $55.59 a barrel in New York trading, a 4.7% drop. That followed a 4.5% decline on Wednesday." USA Today adds, "Whether the lower prices will have staying power, helping consumers, is unclear. NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 7, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The big turnaround in stocks had something to do with the price of oil which has been plummeting in the first trading days of this New Year."

Fall In Commodity Prices Depresses Some Stocks. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A3, Bahree, Glader, Davis, 2.04M) reports, "Energy and copper prices continued their tumble yesterday, punishing shares of companies from oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp. to mining magnate Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc." The Journal adds, "There is no one factor behind the sharp declines in some key commodities. Warm winter weather has depressed oil prices, more than offsetting recent production cutbacks by OPEC." Whether "commodity prices continue to slide long term will depend in no small part on the world economy." If it "shows resilience, commodity prices are likely to rebound."

Friedman Calls On Bush To Complete Ford's Vision For Energy Independence. In his New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman suggests passage of a "Gerald Ford Energy Independence Act." The "greatest thing George Bush could do — for President Ford's legacy and his own — would be to dedicate his coming State of the Union address to completing the energy independence agenda that Mr. Ford initiated 32 years ago in the wake of the 1973 Arab oil embargo and energy shock." Completing Ford's vision "means asking Americans to do some hard things: accepting a gasoline or carbon tax; inducing Detroit to make more fuel-efficient cars, trucks and plug-in hybrids; setting a national requirement for utilities to provide 20 percent of their electricity from renewable wind, solar, hydro or nuclear power by 2015; and, finally, making large-scale investments in mass transit." Friedman adds, "It is stunning that since 9/11 the Bush team has never mounted a campaign to get Americans to conserve energy."

Proliferation Of Ethanol Plants Raises Concerns About Corn Supply For Food. The New York Times (1/5, Barrionuevo, 1.16M) reports, "Renewing concerns about whether there will be enough corn to support the demand for both fuel and food, a new study has found that ethanol plants could use as much as half of America's corn crop next year." The Times adds, "Dozens of new ethanol plants are being built by farmers and investors in a furious gold rush, spurred by a call last year from the Bush administration and politicians from farm states to produce more renewable fuels to curb America's reliance on oil. But the new study by the Earth Policy Institute, an environmental group, found that the number of ethanol plants coming on line has been underreported by more than 25 percent by both the Agriculture Department and the Renewable Fuels Association, the ethanol industry's main lobbying group."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Clayton, 59K) adds, "Ethanol production could pull so much corn out of the food supply by 2008 that US corn exports could plummet." And the "food-fuel competition could push corn prices so high that some ethanol producers in the fledgling industry, which many deem vital to US energy security, would merely break even - or, if corn gets pricey enough, actually lose money."

Service Sector Report Suggests US Economy Is Slowing.

The Wall Street Journal (1/5, Derby, Bater, 2.04M) reports the "latest readings on the service sector and labor market suggested that the U.S. economy softened a bit in December." The Institute for Supply Management said "its nonmanufacturing index, which surveys mostly service-related companies, slipped to 57.1 last month from 58.9 in November but was unchanged from the October reading." Economists had "looked for December's performance to be slightly stronger. The service sector is the single largest source of U.S. economic output." Despite a "gradual cooling, survey respondents remained upbeat about the service sector: 'Members' comments in December are generally positive concerning current business conditions,' said Anthony Nieves, who compiles the report."

Retailers Still Predict 5% Increase In Holiday Sales. USA Today (1/5, 5B, O'Donnell, 2.27M) reports, "Despite a somewhat gloomy picture, the National Retail Federation continues to predict that holiday season sales will be up 5% for 2006, thanks in large part to a strong November. The federation will release its final numbers next Friday." Experts also "caution that because gift cards are counted toward sales when they are redeemed, January could help retailers make up for lost sales earlier in the holiday season."

DOJ_NMG_0112854

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 4, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With temperatures above normal, people are not buying new coats. In fact, coat sales this season are predicted to be down 12%. That's about the last thing retailers want to hear coming off a bad December." CBS (Mason) added, "Retailers need" a good January "after a disappointing December. The Gap had a horrible holiday season. Sales plunged 8%." The Gap "wasn't alone, Ann Taylor sales fell more than 5%. Even mammoth Wal-Mart which accounts for 10% of retail traffic was up less than 1% for the holiday, its worst sales growth in a decade. But luxury retailers wrapped up a different package."

Holiday Retail Sales Less Indicative Of Economy's Health. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, Covert, 2.04M) reports, "Holiday retail sales, once considered a barometer of the health of the economy, are no longer a crystal ball." The same-store sales figures "dozens of retailers reported yesterday don't reflect two big shifts in the way consumers shop these days," because gift cards "aren't logged as sales until they are redeemed" and online sales "aren't included in the widely watched numbers." Overall, retailers "reported a 3.1% increase in December in sales at stores open at least a year, according to an index of 55 chains compiled by the International Council of Shopping Centers. That fell short of the 3.5% gain recorded a year earlier as well as the 3.6% increase in same-store sales the chains logged for the year as a whole." But "redemptions of gift cards could give retailers a lift in January, when roughly half of gift cards are typically used, often to buy full-price merchandise." The National Retail Federation "estimates that gift-card sales this holiday season totaled nearly $25 billion, up 34% from a year earlier and accounting for nearly a fifth of holiday gift spending."

Stocks Post Gains After Investor Jitters Sent Markets Down. NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 6, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to Wall Street here in New York where the stock market had another wild ride today. It plunged at the open and finished up at the end. The Dow gained just over six points [to close at 12,480.69]. NASDAQ was up more than 30 points [to close at 2,453.43] on the day."

USA Today/AP (1/5, 6B, Bruno) reports Wall Street "struggled but ultimately closed higher Thursday as a bounce in technology stocks and sharply lower oil prices helped investors brush off concerns about sluggish consumer spending." Retailers' "lackluster holiday sales reports initially sent major stock indexes significantly lower. Stocks climbed back after a drop in crude oil prices to below $56 a barrel raised hopes that cheaper gasoline might be on the way." In addition to the Dow and Nasdaq, "the Standard & Poor's 500 index edged up 1.74 points to 1418.34."

30-Year Rates Hold Steady. The AP (1/5, Singer) reports, "Mortgage giant Freddie Mac reported Thursday that 30-year, fixed-rate mortgages averaged 6.18 percent this week, the same as last week." Analysts "said the markets in recent days have gotten some confusing messages about how serious the current economic slowdown will be. 'Currently, the market is waiting for a clearer signal on the direction in which the economy is headed,' said Frank Nothaft, Freddie Mac's chief economist." The Freddie Mac survey "showed that other types of mortgage rates were mixed this week. Rates on 15-year, fixed-rate mortgages, a popular choice for refinancing, edged up slightly to 5.94 percent, compared to 5.93 percent last week."

Pending Real Estate Sales Index Drops. Bloomberg (1/5, Torres) reports that pending sales of existing homes "fell 0.5 percent, a third consecutive decline, to 107 from 107.5 in October, the National Association of Realtors said today in Washington." NAR's chief economist, David Lereah, said, "The index is pointing toward fairly stable home sales in the near future. ... This is another indication that home sales likely bottomed out in September." Economists "expected the index to rise 0.7 percent in November, according to the median of 17 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey, after a decline of 1.7 percent the month before. Estimates ranged from a drop of 1 percent to an increase of 2.1 percent."

Kansas High Court Mulls Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors. USA Today (1/5, 3A, Biskupic) reports, "A case before the Kansas Supreme Court has become a key test of the rights of sperm donors who want to be involved with their offspring over the objection of the children's mothers." USA continues, "The dispute, which has drawn national attention, involves a single woman, identified in court papers only as S.H., who gave birth to twins in May 2005 after being inseminated with the sperm of a friend, identified as D.H. … After the mother made it clear that she did not intend to share parenting, D.H. sued to establish paternity. He lost in a trial court because of a Kansas law that says the donor of sperm provided for artificial insemination is not the legal father of the child unless the donor and mother agree to it in writing." USA adds, "The major question in the case is whether requiring such written agreements in cases involving sperm donors known to the mother, not anonymous donors from sperm banks, violates the donor's constitutional rights as a parent. Like Kansas, many states have legal hurdles for donors seeking parental status. … The case arises at a time of increasing advances in reproductive technology. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the numbers of women being impregnated with eggs fertilized outside the womb is significantly on the rise. There are no reliable statistics on methods of conception with donated sperm."

DOJ_NMG_0112855

First African-American Sworn In As Massachusetts Governor. The AP (1/5, Johnson) reports, "Deval Laurdine Patrick was sworn in Thursday as the 71st governor of Massachusetts, the culmination of a longshot political campaign that also saw him become the state's first black chief executive and only the second elected in the nation." NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 4, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) noted Patrick is "only the second black elected governor in history," and that in his swearing-in ceremony, "he laid his hand on the bible that was originally given to President John Quincy Adams by the slaves of the slave ship 'Amistad.'"

The New York Times (1/5, Belluck, 1.16M) says Patrick "takes over from Mitt Romney, a Republican, who is planning to run for the presidency, and already Mr. Patrick has revealed many positions that oppose Mr. Romney's. The former governor did not attend the inauguration. Mr. Patrick has said that he will restore $383.6 million in budget cuts made by Mr. Romney to social services and other programs, that he will reverse the former governor's agreement authorizing the state police to arrest illegal immigrants, and that a Romney-endorsed effort to remove some Massachusetts Turnpike tolls is unrealistic." Patrick also "said he might revoke some of the 200 11th-hour appointments Mr. Romney made to boards and commissions." Patrick also has expressed his opposition to "a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage."

Romney Could Emerge As Nominee "If McCain Self-Destructs." The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Feldmann, 59K) reports that "despite prospects that don't look particularly strong on paper, analysts say" that ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) could win the GOP presidential nomination in '08. Although most polls in key early nominating contests show Romney trailing Arizona Sen. John McCain (R), ex-New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) and ex-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R), "the Republican field is fluid. Religious conservatives…remain skeptical of Senator McCain. And his advocacy for a stepped-up US presence in Iraq has thrown his political future squarely in line with a war that few believe is going well." Giuliani "remains untested on the national political stage and holds liberal positions on social issues that put him at odds with many GOP primary voters (as well as a colorful personal life)." And Gingrich's "short tenure as speaker and his three marriages could cause him to wilt under the klieg lights." Though Romney's evolving stances on several key social issues, along with his Mormon faith, could pose hurdles for him, "political analysts can see a clear path by which Romney becomes the GOP nominee, almost by default. Republicans 'want to win in November [2008],' says Ed Sarpolus, an independent pollster in Michigan who dismisses Gingrich's and Giuliani's chances. 'If McCain self-destructs because of Iraq, even in New Hampshire they'll hold their nose and vote for Mitt Romney.'"

McCain Profanely Questioned Usefulness Of Border Wall. The Washington Times (1/4, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The February issue of Vanity Fair features a profile of Sen. John McCain, in which the Arizona Republican used profanity to call into question the usefulness of a border fence in preventing illegal immigration." Vanity Fair "quotes Mr. McCain -- a leading contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- violating the Third Commandment when asked, during an October appearance before a group of businessmen in Milwaukee about immigration." McCain said, "In the short term, it probably galvanizes our base. In the long term, if you alienate the Hispanics, you'll pay a heavy price. By the way, I think the fence is least effective. But I'll build the [profanity] fence if they want it."

McCain Quizzed On Stolen Giuliani Campaign Playbook. On MSNBC (1/4), Brian Williams said to Sen. John McCain, "This missing briefcase from the Giuliani start-up presidential campaign -- Senator, can you look me in the eye, via the camera, and say that you had no prior knowledge this was missing until you read about it in the papers and that you've since not learned that, say, anyone connected to you has anything to do with it?" McCain: "I haven't learned anything about it, Brian. I know nothing about it." On MSNBC's Imus In The Morning (1/4), Don Imus also raised the question, asking McCain, "Did you steal Giuliani's playbook?" McCain: "No." Imus: "Yes you did." McCain: "No, I did not. I certainly was not anywhere in the area."

DOJ_NMG_0112856

Edwards Shuns Bill Clinton's Approach To Run To Left Of Clinton. Perry Bacon Jr. writes in TIME's website (1/15) that when ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) ran for president in 2004, he "spoke eloquently of the 'Two Americas.'" But "Edwards backed ideas that originated in the centrist group that created much of Bill Clinton's agenda, the Democratic Leadership Council. Not this time." In announcing his bid, Edwards "boldly declared that reducing the deficit, a hallmark of the Clinton Administration, was less important to him than spending government money on" such things as "creating a universal health-care system and stopping global warming. His call to end poverty in the U.S. over the next 30 years by spending more than $15 billion each year" is "the kind of Big Government liberalism Clinton shunned." Bacon notes, however, that if New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) enters the race, she could pick "up much of the money and endorsements from the party establishment. The remaining energy, activism and cash that any rival would need to challenge her are on the left, not the center." Which is "why Edwards has spent the past two years actively courting the liberal netroots…and wooing top union bosses." Bacon says that Sen. Clinton and potential presidential hopeful, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "act like front runners: cautiously," which "leaves room to emerge as the candidate who connects with Democratic voters by saying bold things that appeal to liberals, as when Edwards wrote 'I was wrong' in voting for the Iraq war in an Op-Ed in the Washington Post in the fall of 2005."

Michelman To Back Edwards. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column Sen. John Edwards is "reaches for feminists' backing while Clinton and Obama ponder options." Abortion-rights activist Kate Michelman is "expected to endorse the former North Carolina senator, who seeks fast new year's start." Aides "expect Clinton to signal her candidacy this month," but "some Democratic operatives question dearth of black campaign professionals on her team as Obama becomes top potential rival."

Bill Clinton Defers Questions On Wife's Ambitions. The AP (1/5, Jalonick) reports, "The Clinton who turned heads in the Senate Thursday was not Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, notwithstanding all the speculation about her running for president." Former President Clinton "cheerfully called out, 'Hi, everybody!' as he strolled through the Senate Press Gallery past correspondents for The Associated Press, The Washington Post and the Wall Street Journal." Clinton was "headed for the men's room - followed by his Secret Service agents and a cadre of reporters. The questions were obvious: 'Do you want to live in the White House again?" Clinton said, "I would like not to talk about it today." Asked if Mrs. Clinton was "going to run for president," the President said, "Ask her. … All I know is, this is a happy day. It's a great day for the largest number of women we've ever had in the Congress, a lot of new people coming in, I think it will be good. I'll be surprised if we don't see a lot of interesting, bipartisan things happening over the next six months."

Two Republicans Team Up In Effort To Oust GOP Texas House Speaker. The Washington Times (1/5, Aynesworth, 88K) reports, "Two conservative Republicans from the Dallas area joined forces yesterday in a move to oust" Texas House Speaker Tom Craddick (R). However, Craddick "said he still had enough votes to win re-election to the post on Tuesday. Rep. Brian McCall of Plano stunned his supporters yesterday by endorsing fellow Republican Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie at a press conference in Austin. In their brief appearance, the two challengers vowed Mr. Pitts would win the speakership, but they refused to list their backers," saying "they did not want to expose the supporters to intense pressure before the vote. 'But I guarantee you,' Mr. Pitts said, 'the race is over.'" McCall, "backed by many Democrats, was publicly criticized for having so many opposition-party supporters, which some Craddick allies cited as a strong reason to re-elect the speaker. The Democrats trail the Republicans by an 80-69 margin in the Texas House."

WPost Backs Kaine's Transportation Proposal. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/5, A16, 690K) says Republicans in the Virginia House of Delegates, "many of whom have signed no-new-taxes pledges," have no "serious, long-term plan to pay for the billions of dollars in transportation improvements needed around the state. By contrast, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) proposed a package yesterday that meets the state's transportation problem head-on. It would, for starters, broaden the powers of localities to reject development proposals and slow growth if local roads are too crowded. And it would yield $5.25 billion in new revenue over the next six years -- the first fresh funding for the state's beleaguered roads in a generation."

DOJ_NMG_0112857

Rice Announces $16 Million In Aid For Somalia. The AP (1/5) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Thursday the US "will provide $16 million in aid to Somalia and said the installation of a new government there gives Somalis a chance to move beyond two decades of chaos." Rice said the US is making $11.5 million in food aid available for the country, $1.5 million in nonfood assistance and $3.5 million to help refugees. In a statement, Rice said creation of a UN-backed government represents a "historic opportunity" for Somalis to end their recent spate of "warlordism, extreme violence and humanitarian suffering." She has also "dispatched her top aide for African affairs, Jendayi Frazer, to the region for discussions on promoting a peacekeeping force for Somalia and to urge a political dialogue leading to national reconciliation." Frazer held talks with Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni and Ethiopian president Meles Zenawi, and "will meet with diplomats from Europe, Africa and international organizations to coordinate future steps in Somalia," State Dept. spokesman Sean McCormack said.

The Washington Post/AP (1/5, A10) also notes the announcement briefly in an article about Somali and Ethiopian troops battling "600 Islamic militiamen Thursday" in the southern region of the country.

US Military Continues To Support Battle Against Islamic Militants. The Financial Times (1/5, Fidler, Wallis) reports a US-led naval task force off the Somali coast "has been boarding ships in recent days as part of efforts to prevent Islamist militants fleeing the country." The task force is "taking part in a broader US military effort to stop Islamist fighters in Somalia moving into neighbouring countries following a rout by Ethiopian forces." Kenya has officially closed its border with Somalia on in an effort to stem the transit of militants, officials said. Secretary Rice "hailed the military victory as a 'historic opportunity' for the war-ravaged country." Meanwhile, Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni said Thursday at a joint news conference in Addis Ababa with Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi that Uganda "is ready to provide peacekeepers for the force." Assistant Secretary Frazer "said Mr Museveni had promised to provide between 1,000 and 2,000 soldiers," and said she "hoped a peacekeeping force could be ready by the end of the month."

The Washington Times (1/5, A1, Pflanz, 88K) reports on its front page that as the US continues diplomatic and military efforts in Somalia, "a reported audio tape message by al Qaeda's No. 2 leader surfaced today, urging Somali Islamists to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla campaign of suicide and other forms of attacks against Ethiopian forces in Somalia."

The New York Times (1/5, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports that "just days after Ethiopian-led troops helped rout once powerful Islamist forces in Somalia and install a new government in the capital, security seemed to be unraveling across the country" as violence "is surging on two fronts: antigovernment attacks and increased banditry, both of which were virtually unheard of during the Islamists' short-lived reign." Similarly, the Washington Post (1/5, A10, McCrummen, 690K) reports that "since the Islamic movement was swept from power last week, men draped with AK-47s have appeared once again along the sandy lanes" in Mogadishu, "and with them a feeling of menace."

WPost Says Crisis Gives US Chance To Battle Terrorists In Africa. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/5, A16, 690K) says, "An unexpected turn of events in Somalia has given the Bush administration a rare opportunity to help stabilize a failed state that has been a harbor and breeding ground for al-Qaeda." Although, "frequently slow or stumbling in its response to developments in Somalia, the administration appears to recognize the chance for an advance in the global war with al-Qaeda: Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi E. Frazer…was in Ethiopia yesterday and is expected to chair an international contact group meeting today in Nairobi. … But the Bush administration, which by yesterday had not made any specific commitment to the mission, needs to be ready to quickly provide funding and logistical backing for an African force. If NATO airlift and supply assets can be mobilized, they should be. It may be that the prospect of stabilizing Somalia and eliminating it as a harbor for al-Qaeda will prove to be a mirage, but the administration must seize on the possibility that it is real."

Pentagon Expanding Role In Africa. The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Whittle, 59K) reports Africa "has generally taken a backseat in Pentagon planning - but US officials say that is about to change," noting that "one of Donald Rumsfeld's last acts before Robert Gates replaced him last month as Defense secretary was to urge President Bush to let the Pentagon create a new Africa Command to pay more attention to the troubled continent." Mr. Bush is "said to have agreed to the idea and is expected announce it early this year." The creation of the new command will "be more than an exercise in shuffling bureaucratic boxes, experts say. The US government's motives include countering Al Qaeda's known presence in Africa, safeguarding future oil supplies, and competing with China, which has been courting African governments in its own quest for petroleum, they suggest."

DOJ_NMG_0112858

No Breakthrough Reported At Mubarak-Olmert Talks. The AP (1/5, Nasrawi, Weizman) reports a summit between Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Thursday "fell short of its goal of igniting a new round of Mideast peace efforts, highlighting the significant disagreements between Israel and its Arab neighbors." Speaking at a news conference after the meeting, Mubarak "pushed Israel to hold talks with Syria and pursue peace with the Palestinians, despite the rise of the Islamic militant group Hamas." For his part, Olmert "thanked Mubarak for his efforts" to secure the release of a captured Israeli soldier, and said Israel was "ready to meet with Abbas. However, he rejected having any dealings with Hamas."

Under the headline "Israeli Raid Overshadows Olmert's Talks With Mubarak," the New York Times (1/5, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) says the meeting "was overshadowed by an Israeli raid in the West Bank in which four Palestinians were killed and 20 wounded." Mubarak was "clearly embarrassed by the timing of the raid, hours before the meeting," and "called it a hindrance to peace efforts." The Washington Post (1/5, A11, Wilson, 690K) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas issued a statement hours after the attack, saying it showed that "Israeli calls for peace and security are fake" and that "continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace."

Fighting Between Palestinian Factions Continues In Gaza. The AP (1/5, Laub) reports factional fighting among Palestinian groups Thursday "surged, leaving at least six dead and prompting a meeting early Friday between" Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh. ABC World News (1/4, story 6, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) said Thursday's violence in Gaza represented "an escalation between the rival Palestinian factions."

Treasury Department Increases Pressure On Syria. The AP (1/5, Aversa) reports the US Treasury Department, "intensifying pressure on Damascus, moved Thursday to financially clamp down on three Syrian institutions suspected of helping spread weapons of mass destruction." The department's action "means that any bank accounts or financial assets belonging to the three entities found in the United States would be frozen. Americans also are prohibited from doing business with them." The three entities targeted are the Higher Institute of Applied Science and Technology, the Electronics Institute and the National Standards and Calibration Laboratory.

Bush, Merkel Promise Cooperation On Global Warming. The AP (1/5, Feller) reports, "President Bush and German Chancellor Angela Merkel pledged closer cooperation on combating global warming and in trying to prod a Middle East peace on Thursday, brushing aside lingering differences between the two countries." Bush said "that he was open to new ideas to confront climate change, although he stopped short of some of the tight environmental standards favored by Germany and other European nations. 'We talked about climate change, and I assured the chancellor I'm committed to promoting new technologies that will promote energy efficiency and do a better job protecting the environment,' Bush said. 'I believe there is a chance now to put behind us the old stale debates of the past.'" Merkel said, "I was delighted to hear that there is a readiness there."

Bush Makes Light Of Massage "Gaffe." The AP (1/5) reports President Bush "has adopted a hands-off policy with German Chancellor Angela Merkel." Meeting with reporters, Bush joked, "No back rubs" as he posed for pictures with Merkel at the White House, "making light of his own gaffe" at a summit of G-8 when "he gave an impromptu rub of Merkel's neck and shoulders."

Richardson To Lead Diplomatic Mission To Sudan. The AP (1/5) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said Thursday he is "heading to Sudan on a diplomatic trip that would add to his extensive international experience as he prepares to announce whether he will run for president." Richardson will "try to meet with Sudanese officials and persuade them to accept a peacekeeping force in the war-torn Darfur region," according to a statement from his office. He is to arrive Sunday after traveling overnight and plans to travel to Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0112859

Spanish Police Discover Bomb In Basque Region. The Washington Post/AP (1/5, A14, Roman) reports Spanish police found "a large explosive device in the Basque region Thursday, five days after a car bombing in Madrid that was blamed on the separatist group ETA shattered a nine-month cease-fire." Meanwhile, Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero "said Saturday's attack made him more determined to end ETA's nearly four-decade-long campaign of violence," but he announced "no new strategy or even a hint of his next move."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Reaches Out To Skeptical Democrats."
"Thinking Outside The Box."
"Gov. Tops Party Cast With A Real Character."
"U.S.-Iraqi Forces Launch Assault On Sunni Haven."
"Naming New Generals A Key Step In Shift On Iraq."
"Tijuana Police Abandon Posts."

USA Today:
"Football-Crazy Ohio State Does All Sports In Big Way."
"Bush To Shuffle His War Advisers."
"The Party's Over."
"Adults Penalized For Teen Drinking."

New York Times:
"Jubilant Democrats Assume Control On Capitol Hill."
"Speculation Surrounds Choice By Spy Chief To Take Step Back."
"Bush To Name A New General To Oversee Iraq."
"Along A Newark Street, Signs Of Urban Renewal."
"A Terror Detainee Longs For Court."
"Remain silent? Some in custody Spell It All Out."

Washington Post:
"Democrats Take Control on Hill."
"Bush Making Changes in His Iraq Team."
"Fenty Details Proposal To Take Over Schools."
"A Revitalized Chesapeake May Be Decades Away."
"Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up for Battle."
"Kaine Again Floats Tax Hike for Traffic Ills."
"Sedative Withdrawal Made Rehnquist Delusional in '81."

Washington Times:
"Joyful Democrats Salute Speaker Pelosi."
"Medical Teams Saving More Troops."
"Fenty Plan To Control Schools Irks Bobb."
"US Ships Hunt For al Qaeda Off Somalia."
"Street Cars Return To D.C."

Detroit Free Press:
"Inside Cheli's Bloody Horror."
"El Nino Tames Winter."
"First Female Gets The Gavel."
"Hot Event Could Suggest GM Stands For Glamorous Models."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Historic Power Shift And Swiftly To Action."
"CEO's Get Big Bucks If They Fail."
"Fulton Jail Falls Short In Support To Federal Judge."
"Prostitution Bust Made Behind Sugarloaf Gates."

Houston Chronicle:
"Democrats AIM To Cut Breaks For Oil Industry."
"She Was Driven To Protect Them."
"Pitts Offering A Relaxing Change."
"Second Hip Surgery For Elder Bush A Success."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New Democratic Congress; New Democratic Congress-Analysis; Diplomatic Team Changes; North Korean Nuclear Testing; Fatah Hamas Conflict; New Democratic Member's Interview; Searching Mail; Diet Pills; Space Junk; Freedom Riders.
CBS: New Democratic Congress; New Administration Changes; Strange Weather; Retail Sales; Space Junk; Diet Pills; Stroke Recovery; Long Shot Congresswoman; Susan B. Anthony Remembered.
NBC: New Democratic Congress; New House Speaker; New Democratic Congress-Analysis; New Massachusetts Governor; New Personal Moves; Stock Market; Oil Prices; Searching Mail; Diet Pills; Care Seat Safety; Subway Superman.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: UT-Snow And Ice; CO-Stranded Cattle; LA-Tornado; Upper Midwest And East US-Mild Temperatures, North Korea-Possible Upcoming Nuclear Test; Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak Accuses US Of Obstructing Peace Between Israel And Syria; US To Provide Aid To Security Forces Loyal To Abbas In Palestine; Diet Pill Makers Fined.

DOJ_NMG_0112860

CBS: Iraq-Casey Reassigned; Bush-Troop Levels In Iraq; Bush-Saddam Execution; New Congress-First Day; LA-Tornado; GA-Search For Missing Woman Whose Family Was Murdered; Harvard-Soap And Water As Effective As Hand Sanitizers.

NPR: Bush Expected To Name Zalmay Khalilzad As US Ambassador To The UN And Announce Negroponte's Resignation; Harriet Miers Resigns; Head Of National Nuclear Security Administration Asked To Step Down; New Congress-First Day; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Wall Street; Holiday Sales Figures; CO-Russian Rocket.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: 9 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for legislative business.

Other: PELOSI SWEARING IN WEEK _ Schedule for House Speaker- designate Nancy Pelosi. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Open House reception. Room 345, Cannon.

LAW SCHOOLS-CONFERENCE _ Immigration debate, surveillance and security issues are among topics at the Association of American Law Schools Annual Meeting. Over 3,500 law faculty expected to attend. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Section on Constitutional Law presents ``The Bush Presidency and the Constitution." Location: Marriott Wardman Park.

IRAQ STRATEGY _ 11 a.m. - 1:30 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a discussion, ``Iraq: A Turing Point, with reports from Iraq from Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn. recently returned from a fact-finding mission to Iraq. Both held extensive discussions with U.S. forces and Iraqi government officials. Also, AEI resident scholar Frederick W. Kagan and former acting Army chief of staff General Jack Keane will release the updated and final version of phase one of ``Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq. Highlights: 11 a.m. Panel I: Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq. Panelists: Frederick W. Kagan, AEI; and General Jack Keane, U.S. Army (retired). 12:30 p.m. Panel II: Reports from Iraq. Panelists: Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn. Location: AEI's Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

OPEN HOUSE _ 9 a.m. Faith and anti-abortion leaders hold a news conference before attending Speaker Pelosi's Open House. Location: Independence Ave. and 1st St. SE.

PENATGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9:15 a.m. UK Army Maj. Gen. Simon Mayall, deputy commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, will brief live from Iraq to provide an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

IRAN _ 10 a.m. The Iran Policy Committee holds a news conference to discuss new intelligence and to review Iraqi policy options. Location: National Press Club.

IRAQ _ 10 a.m. Rep. Heather Wilson speaks on Iraq policy at a ``Newsmaker" forum. Location: National Press Club.

SPELINGS-NCLB _ 10 a.m. US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings will commemorate the fifth anniversary of the signing of the No Child Left Behind Act by President Bush with a speech to national education leaders. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, 1615 H St. NW.

VOTING MACHINES _ 10 a.m. People for the American Way, NAACP, Common Cause, others hold a forum on voting machines and voter verification with Kindra Muntz, of the Sarasota Alliance for Fair Elections, Lawrence Norden, of the Brennan Center for Justice, others. Location: NEA Auditorium, 1201 16th St., NW.

GUTIERREZ-OUTLOOK _ 11:45 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez discusses economic initiatives and the outlook for 2007 at a US Chamber of Commerce event. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

IRAQ-MCCAIN-LIEBERMAN _ 12 p.m. MoveOn members hold a rally to oppose pro-war Iraq speeches by Sens. John McCain and Joseph Lieberman. Location: Outside American Enterprise Institute offices, 1150 17th St. NW.

GLOBAL WARMING-FORUM _ 12:30 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Center for American Progress presentation titled ``Global Warming: The Solution and the Politics." With Joseph Romm, author of ``Hell and High Water," former EPA chief Carol Browner and Ana Unruh Cohen, Center for American Progress. Location: 1333 H St. NW.

DEMORACTS-110TH CONGRESS _ 2:30 p.m. Following the Democratic Issues Conference, the new Senate Leadership will discuss their plans for the 110th Congress. Joined by members of the Democratic Caucus, the leaders will lay out their vision of the Senate working together in a bipartisan manner to deliver results for the American people. Partcipants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; Assistant Senate Majority Leader Dick Durbin; Democratic Conference Vice Chairman Charles Schumer; Democratic Conference Secretary Patty Murray; and members of the Senate Democratic Caucus. Location: Great Hall, Thomas Jefferson Building of the Library of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0112861

HOYT _ 4 p.m. Swearing in ceremony for Treasury Department General Counsel Robert Hoyt. Location: Cash Room, main Treasury.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

White House Defends Assertion Of Power To Inspect Mail 3
Gonzales To Be Questioned On Interrogation Tactics 4
Qatari National Wants Court Review Of "Enemy Combatant" Label 4
Defense Rests At Chicago Hamas Trial 4
New York Grocer Admits Misleading FBI In Suicide Bomber Probe 4

Homeland Response:

Siraj Faces Sentencing Monday For NYC Subway Bombing Plot 5
Alleged Illinois Mall Bomb Plotter Indicted On WMD Charges 5
Democrats Unveil Homeland Security Bill 5
Four Cities Added To Homeland Security Grant List As Four Are Removed 5
Hayden Briefs CIA Employees On Agency Strategy 5

War News:

Bush Iraq Strategy To Include Large Aid Boost, 20,000 Troop "Surge." 5
As He Prepares To Unveil Iraq Strategy, Bush Faces Skeptical Congress 6
Bush To Shake Up Diplomatic, Military Team 9
Bush Says Saddam "Was Given Justice." 11
New Offensive Targets Sunni Insurgents In Diyala Province 11
Bombing Kills 13 In Baghdad 11
Source In Numerous AP Stories On Iraq Said Not To Exist 11
Arrested Iranians Reported To Be Ranking Intelligence Officials 12
Partition Could Bring Need For US To Relocate Iraqis 12
Mother Defends Soldier Who Refused Iraq Deployment 12
Iraq War Booty Traced To Manassas Self-Storage Facility 12
Mullah Omar Denounces Karzai Government, Vows Resistance 12
Pakistani PM Calls For Afghan Refugee Repatriation 13
Medical Teams Performing Better In Iraq, Afghanistan Than In Past Wars 13

DOJ:

Magazine Names Gonzales One Of Most Influential Hispanics .. 13
Native American Woman Recommended For Arizona US Attorney Post 13
Baltimore US Attorney Profiled 14

Corporate Scandals:

Federal Prosecutors Conclude Accounting-Fraud Case Against Former AOL Officials 14
Activist Shareholders Claim Victory With Home Depot CEO's Departure 14
WPost Says Apple Investors Face Dilemma In Jobs Stock Options Scandal 15

Criminal Law:

Federal Prosecutors List More Favors By Ney To Abramoff Clients 15
Former Massachusetts House Speaker To Plead Guilty To Obstruction 15
Former Illinois Secretary Of State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison 16
Former Advertising CEO Sentenced In Philly Airport Corruption Probe 16
Judge Rejects Nevada Commissioner's Request To Delay Surrender For Prison 16
Potential Jurors Complete Questionnaires For Federal Abortion Murder Trial 16
23 Indicted In $3.5 Million NYC Mortgage Fraud Scheme 17
Washington Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Conspiracy Charges 17
Michigan Health Care Executive Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud 17
Missouri Official Indicted For Mortgage Fraud, Calls Federal Probe "Political Terrorism." 17
Death Penalty Sentences Fall To 30 Year Low 17
Today Marks Twelfth Anniversary Of Bulger Disappearance 18
Study Finds Embezzlement In Most Catholic Dioceses 18
Voluntary Statements By Suspects Seen As Window Into Criminal Process 18

Civil Law:

FTC Fines Diet Pill Marketers For False-Ad Claims 19
Eli Lilly Settles Thousands More Suits Over Zyprexa 19

Civil Rights:

DOJ Will Not Probe Death In Virginia Jail 19
DC Seeks Dismissal Of DOJ Boys Town Suit 19

Antitrust:
Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Settled 20
Visa, Mastercard Settle Debit-Card Dispute With US 20
EU Intensifies Probe Of Energy Companies 20
Dingell Generates Concerns At FCC, Even Among Democrats . 21
South Korea Launches Antitrust Probe Of Qualcomm 21
Major Law Firms Scrap Merger Plans 21
Prominent LSE Shareholder Increases Its Stake 21

Environment:
Park Service Still Sells "Creationist" Account Of Grand Canyon. 22
EPA Official Warns Of Slow Progress On Chesapeake Bay Revitalization 22

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
FBI Records Reveal Details Of Rehnquist Drug Dependence 22
Judge Rejects Request To Throw Out Statements In Florida Torture Case 22
Grand Jury In Baltimore Indicts Five On Drug Charges 22
Authorities To Use Racketeering Law Against Florida Gang Members As Murder Rate Rises 23
Sessions May Get Democratic Backing For Drug Sentencing Bill23
Colombia Extradites 2 To Face Drug-Smuggling Charges In US 23

Immigration:
Judge Orders Deportation Of Wisconsin Man Accused Of Being Nazi Camp Guard 23

Tax:
DOJ Sues Illinois Couple Over Faulty Tax Returns 23

Congress-Administration:
Democrats Take Control Of Congress In "Historic" Day 24
Miers Resigns White House Post 27
Consumer Groups To Oppose Likely Bush CPSC Nominee 28
Health Issues May Prompt First Bush-Congress Conflict 28
Ellison Sworn In With Jefferson's Quran 28
Bodman Fires Nuclear Weapons Chief Over Security Failures .. 29
New Year Sparks Wave Of Federal Worker Retirements 29
Democrats Urged To Make Tough Decisions To Restore Fiscal "Sanity." 29
NYTimes Says Congress Should Raise Federal Judges' Pay 29
WSJournal Says Pelosi "Paygo" Is Tax Trap 30

Other News:
Oil Prices Fall To Lowest Level Since 2005 30
Service Sector Report Suggests US Economy Is Slowing 30
Kansas High Court Mulls Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors 31
First African-American Sworn In As Massachusetts Governor ... 32
Romney Could Emerge As Nominee "If McCain Self-Destructs." 32
McCain Profanely Questioned Usefulness Of Border Wall 32
Edwards Shuns Bill Clinton's Approach To Run To Left Of Clinton 32
Bill Clinton Defers Questions On Wife's Ambitions 33
Two Republicans Team Up In Effort To Oust GOP Texas House Speaker 33
WPost Backs Kaine's Transportation Proposal 33
Rice Announces $16 Million In Aid For Somalia 33
No Breakthrough Reported At Mubarak-Olmert Talks 34
Treasury Department Increases Pressure On Syria 35
Bush, Merkel Promise Cooperation On Global Warming 35
Richardson To Lead Diplomatic Mission To Sudan 35
Spanish Police Discover Bomb In Basque Region 35

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 35

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 36

DOJ_NMG_0112864

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Defends Assertion Of Power To Inspect Mail. In a story that reverberated through the media and among privacy advocates yesterday, the New York Daily News (1/4, Meek, 729K) reported President Bush "has quietly claimed sweeping new powers to open Americans' mail without a judge's warrant, the Daily News has learned." Bush "asserted his new authority when he signed a postal reform bill into law on Dec. 20" by issuing "a 'signing statement' that declared his right to open people's mail under emergency conditions. That claim is contrary to existing law and contradicted the bill he had just signed, say experts who have reviewed it." The signing came "during the winter congressional recess and a year after his secret domestic electronic eavesdropping program was first revealed. It caught Capitol Hill by surprise."

On his Fox News Your World (1/4) show, host Neil Cavuto said, "The New York Daily News jumping ugly all over President Bush, this time for declaring the right to open American's mail under emergency conditions, even though the headline does make it seem like he wants to just read your mail willy-nilly." He then asked House Subcommittee on Investigations Chairman Bart Stupak, "It's not really open season on people's mail, is it?" Stupak: "No, it's not. But even if the President says he has the right to open it in an emergency, I still feel that's contrary to the law and to our Constitution."

ABC World News (1/4, story 8, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Bush Administration, which has already taken heat over warrantless wiretaps, is now asserting its power to search mail. It was revealed today, the President signed a statement saying the law will be interpreted to allow the searchers to the maximum extent possible. Civil liberties groups are demanding to know whether mail is already being opened."

The White House countered by saying the signing statement was simply a reiteration of existing law. NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 8, 2:05, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In signing the postal bill just before Christmas, President Bush said Federal law gives government authority to open the law for foreign intelligence collection. White House spokesman Tony Snow said that is nothing new." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "The signing statement indicates what present laws allow in making it clear what the provisions are." P. Williams: "But members of Congress, Republicans and Democrats say that is not what they intended the law to do. They call it another example of a President claiming new legal authority while signing a bill into law." Sen. Susan Collins: "I was really surprised. There was nothing in the Postal Reform Bill that in any way diminished or changed the privacy protection for domestic sealed mail."

USA Today (1/5, Hall, Jackson, 2.27M) reports the White House "on Thursday defended a policy allowing the government to open mail without a warrant, despite criticism that the crime-fighting tactic might lead to privacy breaches." Bush Administration and Postal Service officials "said citizens' mail remains constitutionally protected from unreasonable search and seizure. But White House spokesman Tony Snow said the United States needs to have the power to inspect mail in emergencies." The "mail controversy erupted Wednesday after a report in the New York Daily News that President Bush on Dec. 20 attached a so-called signing statement to a new postal law. The statement grants the government the authority during emergencies to bypass a law forbidding mail to be opened without a warrant."

The New York Times (1/5, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports the White House "said Thursday that President Bush was not claiming any new executive authority last month when he issued a statement suggesting that postal inspectors could open mail without a warrant in emergency circumstances." White House spokesman Tony Snow said "the statement Mr. Bush issued in signing postal legislation was merely a restatement of existing law allowing mail to be opened without a warrant in 'exigent circumstances' to protect public safety." Snow "said Mr. Bush had not claimed any 'sweeping new powers' through the statement, as The Daily News article asserted, and the Postal Service issued a statement Thursday echoing that assessment."

The Washington Post (1/5, A3, Eggen, 690K) reports the "little-noticed statement last month asserting the authority to open U.S. mail without judicial warrants in emergencies or foreign intelligence cases" prompted "warnings yesterday from Democrats and privacy advocates that the administration is attempting to circumvent legal restrictions on its powers." White House and US Postal Service "officials said the statement was not intended to expand the powers of the executive branch but merely to clarify existing ones for extreme cases." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "This is not a change in law, this is not new, it is not…a sweeping new power by the president. It is, in fact, merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president of the United States." The Post adds, "Some civil liberties and national-security law experts said the statement's language is unduly vague and appears to go beyond long-recognized limits on the ability of the government to open letters and other U.S. mail without approval from a judge."

CBS News (1/5) reports, "The law as passed by the House and Senate requires government agents to get warrants to open first-class letters. … But the presidential statement, signed on December 20, added that sealed mail can be searched in 'exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence.' … The White House said the president is not claiming any new authority and that the statement does not change the scope of current law. … Spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore told CBS News White House correspondent Mark Knoller, 'The signing statement merely recognizes a legal proposition that is totally uncontroversial: that in certain circumstances … the Constitution does not require warrants for reasonable searches.' … But CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen questioned why the president felt it necessary to attach the language to the bill if nothing has changed. … 'I don't think the White House would have included this language into a signing statement unless the feds were either already searching mail without a warrant or planning to do so,' Cohen said. 'And if the legal right to do so were as clear as the White House now says it's hard to believe that there was a need to remind everyone of the fact in a bill about the postal service.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112865

Gonzales To Be Questioned On Interrogation Tactics. CNN The Situation Room (1/4, 7:30 p.m.) broadcasted the news of new Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy's efforts to investigate the Justice Department over interrogation tactics, "The House and Senate judiciary committees are going to pounce all over Attorney General Alberto Gonzales with questions about how he is protecting or not protecting basic civil liberties in the country."

Qatari National Wants Court Review Of "Enemy Combatant" Label. In an approximately 2,400 word story, the New York Times (1/5, Liptak, 1.16M) reports on the plight of Ali al-Marri, "whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda and who is the only person on the American mainland still held as an enemy combatant." Al-Marri, arrested in 2001, "spends his days in a small cell in solitary confinement at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C." Al-Marri "waits for word from a federal appeals court, which will soon rule on one of the most urgent questions in American law, one his case presents in stark form: May the government indefinitely detain a foreigner living legally in the United States, without charges and without access to the courts?" Marri, a citizen of Qatar, "wants the right to challenge President Bush's assertion that he is a terrorist and 'a grave danger to the national security of the United States.'"

Defense Rests At Chicago Hamas Trial. The AP (1/5, Robinson) reports, "Attorneys for one of two men accused of furnishing thousands of dollars and fresh recruits to a Palestinian terrorist network rested their case Thursday following testimony from an expert on torture." The AP continues, "Closing arguments were set for Monday at the racketeering trial of former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University. … Federal prosecutors say the two men were members of the Palestinian militant group Hamas and helped to bankroll a wave of terror that included bombings, kidnappings and murder aimed at toppling the Israeli government. … 'Ladies and gentlemen, we are done with the evidentiary portion of this case,' U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve, who has presided over the 10-week trial, told the jurors before sending them home for the weekend." The AP adds, "Attorney William Moffitt, who represents Ashqar, rested his case weeks ago. Salah attorney Michael E. Deutsch rested Thursday following testimony from a psychiatrist and torture expert, Dr. Metin Basoglu. … Basoglu, an authority on the psychological mechanisms created by torture, testified over a live video feed from Istanbul where he lives. … Basoglu said a slipped disc in his back kept him from traveling. … Salah's attorneys are hoping Basoglu's testimony will reinforce Salah's claim that after his January 1993 arrest he was tortured by Israel's Shin Bet security agents into making incriminating statements."

New York Grocer Admits Misleading FBI In Suicide Bomber Probe. The Rochester Democrat & Chronicle (1/5, Zeigler) reports, "A Rochester grocer admitted today that he misled FBI agents about his brother's declared intent to travel to Israel and become a suicide bomber." Mohamed Subeh "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to concealing a material fact from investigators when he destroyed a letter in which his brother said he wanted to become a suicide bomber, then denied ever seeing the letter." Defense lawyer John Parrinello said that "Subeh was worried that his brother would jeopardize his U.S. immigration status by leaving but knew his brother was 'just blowing off steam' when he claimed in the letter that he intended to be a suicide bomber." The Democrat & Chronicle notes that Subeh's brother, Ismail Dorgham, "drew the attention of law-enforcement officials on May 22, 2003, when he went to Greater Rochester International Airport with no luggage and paid cash for a one-way connecting flight to Jordan. In a search of Dorgham's wallet, an FBI counterterrorism agent found a newspaper article about a 2002 suicide bombing in Jerusalem that killed 10 Israelis. Dorgham told the agent that the bomber was his cousin." The AP (1/5) also posts a truncated version of the Democrat & Chronicle story on Subeh's plea.

DOJ_NMG_0112866

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Siraj Faces Sentencing Monday For NYC Subway Bombing Plot. The AP (1/5, Hays) reports, "Shahawar Matin Siraj was either a naive stooge lured into a phony bomb plot or a homegrown terrorist determined to inflict misery on New Yorkers as revenge for wartime abuses of Iraqis. The conflicting portraits of Siraj — convicted on conspiracy charges in a scheme to blow up one of the city's busiest subway stations — were painted in court papers recently filed in advance of his sentencing on Monday in federal court in Brooklyn. Defense attorneys have sought to convince a judge that their client's sentence should not exceed 10 years since the attack never came close to being carried out." However, "prosecutors countered that the Pakistani immigrant deserves at least 30 years — and possibly life — behind bars as the 'driving force' behind a 'workable terrorist plot' to set off explosives at the subway station of Herald Square."

Alleged Illinois Mall Bomb Plotter Indicted On WMD Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/5) reports, "A man accused of plotting to use hand grenades in an attack on holiday shoppers was indicted Thursday on charges of attempting to use weapons of mass destruction." Derrick Shareef "was arrested Dec. 6 by an FBI-led anti-terrorism task force following a sting operation in which an undercover informant secretly tape-recorded his plans." Shareef "met an undercover agent to trade a pair of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a handgun to use at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford…federal prosecutors said." The Rockford Register Star (1/5) also briefly reports on the indictment.

Democrats Unveil Homeland Security Bill. The AP (1/5, Miller) reports that shortly after they assumed control of Congress, House Democrats "disclosed a plan they said would strengthen homeland security after five years of complaining that Republicans weren't doing enough." Democrats said their bill "would implement the unfinished 9/11 Commission recommendations that fall under the Homeland Security Committee's jurisdiction." The bill would "require private companies to prepare for terrorism and the government would have to inspect cargo on passenger planes and shipping containers leaving the largest ports." Airport screeners "would be given whistle-blower protection, money would be set aside to develop technology for detecting explosives at checkpoints and an appeals process would be established for airline passengers mistaken for terrorists on watch lists."

Four Cities Added To Homeland Security Grant List As Four Are Removed. The AP (1/5, Barrett) reports, "Four U.S. cities will get a fresh infusion of federal anti-terror grant money, and four others will be cut off from such grants, under a new government list of urban areas considered at serious risk of attacks and eligible to share $747 million." The list "shows the four newly eligible cities are El Paso, Texas; Norfolk, Va.; Providence, R.I.; and Tucson, Ariz. The cities that were cut from the list of 45 metropolitan areas are Toledo, Ohio; Baton Rouge, La.; Louisville, Ky.; and Omaha, Neb." The Homeland Security Department has "come under intense scrutiny for its decisions in the Urban Area Security Initiative, or UASI, which is the only pool of federal money designed to go to localities based solely on their risk of terror attacks."

Hayden Briefs CIA Employees On Agency Strategy. The Washington Times (1/5, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "CIA Director Michael V. Hayden spoke to CIA employees yesterday for a town-hall-style meeting where he revealed the agency's new 'Strategic Intent' report and outlined some of the reforms taken. They include setting up a new operations center with representatives from the collection, analysis and technical services branches." The report "lists the long war on terrorism, arms proliferation and the rise of China and India as part of the current 'unstable and dangerous 'strategic environment." One "initiative: the creation of a CIA associate deputy director for counterintelligence that supporters hope will give the agency something it badly needs in the current environment of aggressive foreign intelligence activities."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Iraq Strategy To Include Large Aid Boost, 20,000 Troop "Surge." The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A1, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration's new strategy for Iraq, which the president is set to announce next week, will include a big boost in spending to fund reconstruction, economic growth and job creation, as part of a broader effort to help embattled Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. People familiar with the matter say that Mr. Bush will detail his request for billions of dollars in new aid for Iraq next week in an eagerly awaited speech on his strategy to contain sectarian violence there and clear the way for an eventual US military withdrawal." Bush "will also call for the deployment of as many as 20,000 additional American combat troops to Iraq as part of a controversial 'surge' designed to stabilize Baghdad and other violent regions of the country." The Journal adds, "The administration's emerging Iraq strategy, which it is calling

DOJ_NMG_0112867

'The New Way Forward,' will also include an effort to funnel US money to moderate Iraqi political parties as a means of building a centrist political coalition to support Mr. Maliki, according to people familiar with the matter."

The Washington Times (1/5, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "spoke with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for nearly two hours yesterday," saying he had been gauging al-Maliki's will to protect the Iraqi people, and that "he was 'in the process of making up my final decision as to what to recommend' on a way forward in Iraq." Bush was meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who "said she will urge her neighbors to support efforts to stabilize Iraq." The Times notes that Bush is expected to order a surge in US troop levels in Iraq.

On its front page, the Washington Post (1/5, A1, Wright, Abramowitz, 690K) says that "deep divisions remain between the White House on one side and the Joint Chiefs and congressional leaders on the other about whether a surge of up to 20,000 troops will turn around the deteriorating situation," according to US officials. The US military is "increasingly resigned to the probability that Bush will deploy a relatively small number of additional troops -- between one and five brigades -- in part because he has few other dramatic options available to signal U.S. determination in Iraq, officials said. But the Joint Chiefs have not given up making the case that the potential dangers outweigh the benefits for several reasons," officials said.

Zakheim Says US Must Shift Troops To Iraq Border Regions. In a Financial Times (1/5) op-ed, Dov Zakheim, undersecretary of defense during President Bush's first term, writes on "Why America Should Operate From Iraq's Borders," saying that while "the White House accepts that there has to be a change in approach," its "underlying premises -- that Iraq's sectarian strife is not a civil war and that the keys to a stable Iraq are a stable Baghdad and Anbar province -- are the same as before. These assumptions need to be revisited, fast. … There is no doubt that Iraq is enmeshed in a bitter civil war. The US has had minimal impact on the course of that war." Zakheim says the US needs to shift "primary responsibility for pacifying Baghdad" to Iraqis, and "then the US must reposition its forces to foster regional stability and minimise casualties. Up to two brigades should be devoted to Kurdistan and a roughly equal number to the far west of Anbar province." He also says the US should "move a division-sized force to the south, with a significant presence on the border with Iran."

More Commentary. In his column for the Washington Post (1/5, A17, 690K), conservative columnist Charles Krauthammer makes a similar point, writing, "We should not be surging American troops in defense" Iraq's "governing coalition -- Maliki's Dawa, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and Sadr's Mahdi Army," which "seems intent on crushing the Sunnis at all costs. Maliki should be made to know that if he insists on having this sectarian war, he can well have it without us."

And Dan Senor and Roman Martinez, who served as foreign-policy advisers to the Bush administration, based in Baghdad from April 2003 through June 2004, write in the Wall Street Journal (1/5, 2.04M), "The president is on the cusp of making the most important decision of his second term: increasing our troop presence in Baghdad and Anbar in an effort to stave off Iraqi civil war. A troop surge into Baghdad will not solve problems overnight. But by helping to establish security, more troops can weaken the insurgency, which is the first step to addressing most of Iraq's other problems, including the growth of Shiite militias."

As He Prepares To Unveil Iraq Strategy, Bush Faces Skeptical Congress. The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Levey, 850K) reports, "As President Bush prepares a major new initiative for Iraq, he confronts a wary and distrustful new Congress eager for solutions but unconvinced the administration can chart a successful exit from the war. The new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate are reluctant to assume responsibility for the war, leaving unclear Congress' willingness to block any troop escalation or to compel Bush to change strategy." Bush "is expected to unveil a new Iraq plan that would feature at least a temporary increase in troop levels in an effort to control sectarian violence. Troop increases have been endorsed by a few lawmakers, including Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.)." But "such a proposal is certain to be fiercely opposed by most Democrats."

AFP (1/5) notes McCain reaffirmed his support for the deployment of thousands of additional US troops in Iraq, a proposal expected to figure in President George W. Bush's upcoming reassessment of US strategy there." McCain told MSNBC (1/4, Williams), "When I raise my hand and vote to send young men and women, American men and women into harm's way and fight a war, I am committing to accomplishing the mission." He added "the fight against Islamic extremism must be joined with renewed fervor." McCain also said, "The consequences of failure are chaos and disaster. And these people...want to destroy the United States of America,' McCain said."

ABC World News (1/4, story 2, 1:40, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported that "starting with…Pelosi, the overwhelming majority of Democrats, including the leaders in the Senate as well, are going to be against a surge of troops in Baghdad. The problem for them is there's nothing they can do for it. They've taken cutting off funding for the troops off the table. So they can have hearings. They can try to redirect the President's policy. But they cannot force a change."

But E.J. Dionne, in a Washington Post column (1/5, A17) titled "Short-Circuiting The Surge," that "an outright escalation of an unpopular war" is "seen by most Democrats and some Republicans as a rebuke to the majority whose November ballots signaled a negative verdict on the Iraq war." Democrats "are quietly but urgently seeking ways of pressuring the president to change course, including the possibility of having Congress reconsider its original authorization of force, passed in October 2002. … Given the limited options, Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, has suggested to his colleagues that the strongest response to the surge would be a congressional resolution explicitly opposing the step." Dionne adds, "Bush has the power to order a surge. But if he insists on doing so in the face of widespread skepticism, a president proudly famous for relying on his gut will discover that he faces a Congress that does not regard his instincts as a reliable guide to the defense of American interests."

DOJ_NMG_0112868

Underscoring Dionne's point, the New York Times (1/5, Broder, 1.16M) reports that in remarks, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "delivered the obligatory promise of partnership with Republicans. But she immediately added a blunt warning to Mr. Bush on the war in Iraq. 'The American people rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end,' she said, bringing Democrats to their feet." Pelosi "signaled to Mr. Bush that any plan to increase the American military presence in Iraq would meet stiff opposition in the new Congress." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/4, Malone, 379K) says Pelosi's comments foreshadowed "a possible clash with the Bush administration," and notes "new Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada was even less specific. 'Iraq is an issue that we all need to work on, and we will work on that,' he said as he emerged from a closed-door bipartisan meeting for the entire Senate membership."

Democrats are under strong pressure from anti-war activists. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Democrats face conflicting pressures on potential Iraq troop 'surge.'" Moveon.org "plans protest outside speech today by Sens. McCain and Lieberman backing a surge, underscoring ire of Democratic base." Senate Democrats "plan to grill" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates "as part of more than a dozen hearings to mobilize public opposition over next three weeks. Republicans brace for additional defections, while McCain cautions that 20,000 more soldiers might not be enough." McCain said, "There are still people around [Bush] who think things aren't that bad."

The Washington Times (1/5, Fagan, 88K) also reports that "as Democrats reveled in their new majority yesterday, anti-war activists complained of cowardice on the Iraq war and pledged that they won't let Democrats cave to…Bush." In addition, on NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 3, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert noted the effect of the 2008 presidential campaign on Bush's announcement. When the President "makes his speech next week," said Russert, "it will not be in a vacuum. We have 10 people running for President of the United States. Barak Obama saying I was against the war from the beginning." McCain "saying we should have sent more troops way back when. This President will make his announcement in the middle of a preprimary Presidential campaign and that will drive our Iraq policy in a considerable way."

Biden Says White House Has Concluded War Has Been Lost. The Washington Post (1/5, A6, Kessler, 690K) reports, "Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said yesterday that he believes top officials in the Bush administration have privately concluded they have lost Iraq and are simply trying to postpone disaster so the next president will 'be the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof,' in a chaotic withdrawal reminiscent of Vietnam." Said Biden, "I have reached the tentative conclusion that a significant portion of this administration, maybe even including the vice president, believes Iraq is lost. … They have no answer to deal with how badly they have screwed it up. I am not being facetious now. Therefore, the best thing to do is keep it from totally collapsing on your watch and hand it off to the next guy -- literally, not figuratively."

Three Newly-Elected Democrats Could "Go Along" With Surge. ABC World News (1/4, story 7, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) interviewed "three new House Democrats today. Heath Shuler of North Carolina. Nancy Boyda of Kansas. And Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania. They said they are not satisfied with the President's handling in Iraq." But "they are inclined to go along with" with a surge. Murphy said he "served over in Baghdad with the 86th [sic] Airborne Division. I saw with my own eyes what's going on over there. The fact is that we need to change direction with what's going on in Iraq. We need to listen to the military experts, people like General Colin Powell, General Abizaid, that say, listen, the surge isn't going to work." Asked about the surge option, Shuler said, "I don't think that's the solution. With the exception, if that's what our military leaders say, that the increase is troops is the answer, then that would be more acceptable. But not just one person saying -- even the President. Not just one person saying that increasing our troop level is going to create the sense of security in Iraq." Boyda said, "I would be happy to vote for more troops. But I am not happy to vote for more troops without a clear mission and sending more men into harm's way." Boyda later said, "He is the commander in chief, Charlie. We don't get that choice. Congress doesn't make that decision."

Shays, Lott Sound Ambivalent Note On "Surge." Meanwhile, the Hartford Courant (1/4, Lockhart, 190K) reported that GOP Rep. Christopher Shays said "it would be a 'huge mistake' to send more American troops to Iraq if that country's government 'doesn't do the heavy lifting it has to do.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112869

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/4), host Chris Matthews asked Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, "Is there a chance you'll say no to the surge?" Lott: "There is." Matthews: "Thanks for making news here."

Most Congressional Commentary On "Surge" Breaks Along Party Lines. Sen. Jim Webb said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/4, Matthews), "The problem that I've had for five years with respect to Iraq is the lack of a strategic vision. We've been looking for an articulation of national strategy from this Administration, and you don't have a national strategy unless you can tell the American people very clearly what your end point is. So when we're talking about this issue of the surge, the first thing to remember is that over the past couple of years we've seen the troop levels oscillate up and down a bit little bit along a basic line of about 120,000 to 140,000 people. So in a sense, we may be arguing about the wrong issue in terms of trying to find a solution." In similar comments on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), Webb said, "What I really would like to focus on in the part that I'm able to play in these hearings is the articulation of a clear set of goals with an end point. You don't have a strategy if you cannot clearly articulate the end point of your strategy. That's been the frustration all along. And so we find ourselves in these arguments about whether putting 20,000 or 30,000 more troops in and holding them longer is going to affect the overall solution in Iraq."

Sen. Barbara Boxer said on MSNBC (1/4, Scarborough), "This isn't really, in the Senate, a partisan issue. But I can tell you that there's a lot of angst about this so-called surge idea. Many of us do believe the election was about extricating ourselves from a terrible situation. Yes, we could re-deploy to the region, but we've got to re-deploy out of Iraq. Instead, the President may actually get us in deeper. He's just digging the hole deeper and deeper."

Sen. Amy Klobuchar said on MSNBC (1/4, O'Donnell), "I know that there are a number of Democrats and -- including some Republicans -- that are very concerned about adding more troops. I personally don't believe we should be doing that. I think we should be redeploying our troops to areas surrounding Iraq. I think we need to send a strong message that we need to transition to Iraqi authority and stop this culture of dependency."

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel said on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner), "Americans are way ahead of the Congress in being able to demand that we have hearings, that we ask questions as to why we are asking 20,000, 30,000, 40,000 American men and women to get involved in Iraq in a surge. We will have hearings for the first time. What is a surge? How many people will be in harm's way with a surge? What's the additional $100 billion for? What have we done with the last $400 billion? How many of our friends in the area, Egyptians, Saudis, Jordanians, are going to be involved in the so-called surge? And if the military says we can't have a military victory, Mr. President, what are we doing there, and how long do we have to be there?" Rangel raised similar questions on MSNBC's Tucker (1/4, Carlson), saying, "Mr. President, what is a surge? How many people can we lose in the surge? Can we have a military victory? What is this victory that you're talking about? If it's not a civil war, what would you call it? The American people are going to put a stop to this war."

Rep. Jack Murtha, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), said President Bush "says we have an honest disagreement, but hopefully we can work things out. Well, I hope we can work things out, too. But we can't work things out if they propose something without consultation. … If you are going to surge, you're going to have to keep people there in Iraq -- in other words, extend them. You're going to have to stop loss, which means you won't let people get out. And then you're going to have to send people back that have less than a year in country with their families. … But it's not going to prove anything because we sent another 15,000 troops into Baghdad and it's gotten worse." On MSNBC (1/4, Williams), Murtha made similar comments, then added, "The policy has to be changed. You can't continue and sustain a war when young people are going back with less than a year in this country. They're extending and stop-lossing people in the country themselves. And it is very unpopular, even with the troops themselves, when they don't understand the mission."

GOP Sen. Mel Martinez, incoming chairman of the Republican National Committee, said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), "I would hope the President is going to propose a comprehensive plan for success in Iraq. We have to understand that there's a lot at stake, not just in Iraq but on the global war on terror and in the entirety of the Middle Eastern situation. For us to not succeed, for us to cut and run or fail there, would be a terrible disaster for our country. And it would be a bad thing for the Iraqi people, as well."

GOP Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), "You've got five-star generals on both sides of the issue. You've got retired generals and colonels on both sides of the issue. Clearly, this is a subject about which reasonable people can differ. And so it's no surprise that political experts such as my colleagues would be in some disagreement. … If that is the President's decision -- and I know we're being a bit premature here -- I think we ought to give it a chance to try to help the President and see if that can work."

GOP Rep. Adam Putnam said on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner), "Republicans have never been 100% in lock-step. And we even today more fully realize that there's an independent role for the legislative branch, an independent role for the executive branch. The President is our commander-in-chief, and we look forward to his recommendations on the new way forward in Iraq. But we owe the American people adequate oversight, adequate investigation, but total support of the men and women in harm's way."

DOJ_NMG_0112870

GOP Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on MSNBC (1/4, Gregory), "I will support being certain that we win in Iraq. And if our commanders in the field -- and this is where I think it's important -- we have to listen to the commanders in the field and the troops in the field. They know what is needed."

Bush To Shake Up Diplomatic, Military Team. In coming days, President Bush is expected to announce several changes in top military and diplomatic posts, in what media reports portray as part of his new strategy in Iraq. USA Today/AP (1/5) says Bush is "shaking up the team responsible for carrying out his military and diplomatic strategies in Iraq as he prepares to outline a new direction for the war." McClatchy (1/5, Hutcheson, Strobel) says the "overhaul" will "bring new faces" as "as the president is putting the finishing touches on a new strategy for Iraq." On its front page, the Washington Post (1/5, A1, Wright, Abramowitz, 690K) reports the personnel changes are being made even though "significant policy details" are "left to be worked out this weekend." The Post also says the President will likely reveal his plan during an address Wednesday.

NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 5, 3:05, Gregory, 9.87M) said the change reflect the fact that "this is the beginning of the final two years of this Administration which will include significant change in Iraq and when it comes to relations with Congress." And the CBS Evening News (1/4, story 2, 2:20, Borger, 7.66M) said it is "very clear that this White House wanted to get these personnel decisions, not only the generals but the diplomatic appointments,…out of the way before the President speaks to the country on Iraq, which we think will be next week."

Military Changes. On the military front, USA Today/AP (1/5) reports Bush will replace Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the chief general in Iraq, "in the coming weeks." Bush reportedly plans to replace Abizaid "with Adm. William Fallon, the top US commander in the Pacific, and Casey's replacement will be Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces." Assigning Fallon and Petraeus to the top military posts in the Middle East "would help Bush to assert that he is taking a fresh approach in the region and help pave the way for him to turn policy there in a new direction."

On its front page, the New York Times (1/5, A1, Gordon, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Senior administration officials said that the choice of General Petraeus was part of a broader effort to change almost all of the top American officials in Iraq as Mr. Bush changes his strategy there." One official was quoted as saying, "The idea is to put the whole new team in at roughly the same time, and send some clear messages that we are trying a new approach." The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Spiegel, 850K) says the "choice of Petraeus in particular could have wide-ranging significance. Although his selection does not come as a surprise, Petraeus is closely associated with the push for a more complex counterinsurgency campaign, which would move US soldiers out of their large bases and into smaller outposts in troubled neighborhoods."

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 2, 2:20, Borger, 7.66M) said, "The new Secretary of Defense, Bob Gates, clearly decided that he needed to get his own team in place and that's exactly what he's done and he also wants a team that he knows is going to support the President's new strategy on Iraq." ABC World News (1/4, story 3, 2:15, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "What the President wants, according to one official, is a clean sweep -- a new plan and new commanders." Regarding Admiral Fallon, ABC calls his selection "a wild card choice," saying it is "highly unusual that a Navy admiral would be called upon to run, essentially, two ground operations."

Diplomatic Changes. Meanwhile, on the diplomatic front, ABC World News (1/4, story 4, 0:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "changes in the President's diplomatic team dealing with Iraq. We have learned the President will nominate the US Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalizad, to be Ambassador to the United Nations. Brian Crocker, the US Ambassador to Pakistan, will be nominated to take his place in Baghdad. And the National Intelligence Director, John Negroponte, is going to become the number two at the State Department, playing a major role in shaping policy in Iraq. While a retired Vice Admiral, Mike McConnell, is the choice to become the new National Intelligence Director."

The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Wright, Abramowitz, 690K) reports in a front page article that "with significant policy details [on Iraq] left to be worked out this weekend, the administration is nonetheless moving ahead on several personnel changes," including plans to replace some Bush's top military commanders in the region. The Post notes the likely appointments to US posts in Baghdad, at the UN and Negroponte's move to the State Department.

The Financial Times (1/5, Dinmore) reports Negroponte's "abrupt shift from being the first US director of national intelligence to number two at the State Department reflects continued troubles in the intelligence community and a further concentration of power around Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Analysts see Negroponte's return to the State Department "as part of a broader and somewhat confused reshuffle of the Bush administration that began with the sacking of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary and has Iraq and the wider Middle East as its focus." Meanwhile, officials said President Bush would announce the changes on Friday, "possibly including his nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad, ambassador to Baghdad, as the new US envoy to the UN. There was also speculation on Thursday night that Ryan Crocker, US ambassador to Pakistan, would replace Khalilzad." In continuing speculation about Negroponte's decision to leave his DNI post, former intelligence officials said he "was tired of bureaucratic turf wars and wanted to return to his diplomatic career." Meanwhile, at a press conference, White House spokesman Tony Snow "rolled his eyes at a suggestion that Ms Rice, perhaps the closest in the cabinet to the president and now no longer challenged by Mr Rumsfeld, was set to move on."

DOJ_NMG_0112871

The New York Times (1/5, A6, Stolberg, 1.16M) says if confirmed by the Senate, the appointments "would put seasoned, respected diplomats into two of the State Department's most challenging posts." Bush's decision to transfer Khalilzad, it notes, "would effectively accomplish two goals for the administration. As a Sunni Muslim, Mr. Khalilzad has been perceived by some Iraqi Shiites as not sympathetic enough to their views; removing him from Baghdad would help Mr. Bush make a fresh start there." And the change "also would give the United States the strong voice it needs at the United Nations, particularly after the storm surrounding Mr. Bolton."

The Washington Post (1/5, A5, Deyoung, Pincus, 690K) says Negroponte's "move to become…Rice's deputy, and his replacement by retired Navy Adm. John M. McConnell, had little to do with any assessment of Negroponte's tenure or with the unfinished state of intelligence integration, a range of senior administration officials said." Instead, it "stemmed directly from the urgent need to fill a State Department job, vacant since early last summer, that was seen as crucial to implementing the new Iraq policy that President Bush plans to announce next week."

The Washington Post's (1/5, A 15) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Negroponte "is a guy who clearly can't hold a job. This would be his fourth since joining the administration just over five years ago. And the chatter has already begun that he may not be in this one too long before he moves up one level."

On its front page, the New York Times (1/5, A1, Mazzetti, Sanger, 1.16M) says that "from the start" Negroponte "felt miscast as the nation's first director of national intelligence, a diplomat who never seemed comfortable in spook's clothing, colleagues and friends of his said." The Times reports that "Rice had requested over the summer that Mr. Negroponte become her deputy. But the decision languished for months as the White House sought an adequate replacement for the spy chief." The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Miller, 850K) says Negroponte's departure "as the nation's spy chief prompted angry responses from Capitol Hill and triggered new debate Thursday over whether a position created to fix the nation's intelligence problems is itself fundamentally flawed." The Washington Times (1/5, Gertz, Sands, 88K) also reports on the moves.

The AP (1/5, Schweid) says the anticipated nomination of Ambassador Khalilzad to the UN post, saying the move "has been rumored for months, along with the expectation that Crocker, now ambassador to Pakistan, would succeed him in Baghdad." ABC News first reported Thursday that Bush had made the decision. A US official "said some minor details still must be worked out on Crocker, but they are considered manageable."

Sen. Jay Rockefeller was asked on Fox News (1/4, Skinner) about Negroponte's move to the State Department. Rockefeller said, "It was a very clumsy handling of an extraordinarily important position…clumsy in the fact that nobody was informed of it. I read about it in the newspaper this morning. So nobody on the Intelligence Committee knew about it. And this is, after all, a person that we created to coordinate all of intelligence. … Now, he's going to be undersecretary of state. I think that's fine, but up until about an hour and a half ago, we had no idea whether there was going to be either a director or a deputy."

NYTimes Welcomes Negroponte's Move To State. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) says Negroponte's move is "technically a step down," but it "has a certain logic to it," noting that "the diplomacy-challenged Bush administration could surely use the help." The Times says it hopes Negroponte "can provide Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with the intellectual and bureaucratic reinforcement she so desperately needs to help guide the administration to a wiser course on Iraq." However, Bush now "must quickly find a credible replacement for Mr. Negroponte, preferably one who is willing to jolt his bosses with the truth. This administration's record of failures in Iraq is matched only by its failures on intelligence."

However, the Los Angeles Times (1/5, 850K) editorializes, "His acceptance of the job may be more a reflection of the problems of his previous position than the promise of his new one." Instead, it suggests "the more interesting question, however, is why Bush, acting through Cheney (or is it the other way around?), wanted Negroponte at State. Word inside and outside the State Department for months has been that Rice has been unable to fill top jobs because her choices have either declined to sign up for a stint likely to be best remembered for the debacle in Iraq or have been vetoed as too liberal by the White House." Negroponte, it writes, "reportedly was the only person acceptable to both Rice and Cheney."

Bush Expected To Announce McConnell Nomination Friday. The AP (1/5, Shrader) reports President Bush is expected to announce Friday the nomination of retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to replace Negroponte as National Intelligence Director. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A4, Solomon, Block, 2.04M) says the nomination "stirred concerns about the expanding control of current and retired Pentagon officials over the US intelligence community." McConnell's "greatest challenge" as director of national intelligence, say members of the intelligence community, "will be to try to claim control of these Pentagon intelligence assets while striking a balance between the development of tactical and strategic intelligence."

DOJ_NMG_0112872

USA Today (1/5, 4A, Kelley, Willing, 2.27M) notes that McConnell "has been a leading figure in outsourcing US intelligence operations to private industry, records and interviews show." Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/5, Shane, 1.16M) says that with the selection of McConnell, President Bush "is turning again to a steady intelligence professional who first achieved prominence during his father's administration." Sources say he was "first approached several months ago about the possibility of replacing General Hayden" as deputy to Negroponte, but he "turned down that job and was eventually invited to succeed Mr. Negroponte in the top job."

Bush Says Saddam "Was Given Justice." The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "President Bush said Thursday that he would have preferred that the execution of Saddam Hussein had been conducted in a more "dignified" manner, but said the deposed dictator met the fate he deserved." Said Bush, "He was given justice. The thousands of people he killed were not."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/5, Zeleny, Cooper, 1.16M) says leading members of Congress said Thursday that the conduct surrounding the hanging could undermine United States strategy in Iraq and complicate efforts to help the new Iraqi government succeed. … Several Republican senators who have been among President Bush's biggest supporters in the Iraq war said they were troubled by the video and fearful of the reverberations it could provoke. 'It's a very bad thing, it's harmful, and I'm sorry that it happened,' said Senator John McCain, an Arizona Republican who has been a White House ally on its Iraq policy. 'Obviously, it unnecessarily inflames the emotions of the Sunnis.'"

GOP Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/4, Blitzer), "You can't argue on the one hand that we need to turn it over to the Iraqis and let them do it their way, and then criticize them when they do it their way. … At a certain point, if we turn it over to them, we can expect that they're not going to do things exactly as we would."

Two Guards Arrested For Saddam Video. The Washington Post (1/5, A12, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "Two guards were reportedly arrested Thursday for recording former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's execution with a video cellphone."

More Commentary. In his column for the Washington Post (1/5, A17, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Of the 6 billion people on this Earth, not one killed more people than Saddam Hussein. … For the Iraqi government to have botched both his trial and execution, therefore, and turned monster into victim, is not just a tragedy but a crime -- against the new Iraq that Americans are dying for and against justice itself."

New Offensive Targets Sunni Insurgents In Diyala Province. The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Zavis, 850K) reports, "About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops launched a major offensive at dawn Thursday in Diyala province, an increasingly violent zone east of Baghdad that has become a haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents." Insurgents responded with trenches and sabotage of bridges, possibly "to divert approaching vehicles toward roadside bombs." The Times notes that there was friction and some mistrust in the joint operation, but that "Iraqi soldiers appeared eager to work with their American partners. Some sang celebratory songs in unison as they grabbed their gear and assembled near their Humvees."

Bombing Kills 13 In Baghdad. USA Today/AP (1/5, 5A) reports, "Twin car bombings killed 13 people Thursday in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood." The explosions "went off one after the other at 10:30 a.m. in the Mansour neighborhood, setting fire to a gas station and incinerating at least a half-dozen cars. At least 25 people were wounded, police said." The New York Times (1/5, Santora, Spanner, 1.16M) says "the attack was apparently aimed at a gasoline station. Cars were lined up around the block waiting for fuel, and dozens of people, grasping large plastic jugs, hoped to buy heating fuel. Just moments after the first explosion, a second, larger, car bomb detonated."

In addition, says the Washington Times/AP (1/6, Frayer), "Police said 47 tortured bodies were found dumped across Baghdad yesterday, in addition to the 27 a day earlier. A U.S. soldier was killed by small-arms fire in western Baghdad, the military said. "

Source In Numerous AP Stories On Iraq Said Not To Exist. The Washington Times (1/5, Harper, 88K) reports, "Media critics and Internet bloggers are questioning the credibility of an Associated Press source in Iraq, claiming that 'police captain Jamil Hussein' does not exist, though he has been cited in 60 AP dispatches over the past two years. Two of the skeptics -- syndicated columnist Michelle Malkin and former CNN news chief Eason Jordan -- say they will go to Iraq to find the elusive Capt. Hussein in hopes of proving that the venerable wire service was either practicing shoddy journalism or had been dangerously duped by a media-savvy terrorist or enemy agent." The AP announced that it is standing by its stories, and "reported that the Iraqi Interior Ministry acknowledged the existence of the captain, whose name is Jamil Gholaiem Hussein, and said he now faces arrest for speaking to the press."

DOJ_NMG_0112873

Arrested Iranians Reported To Be Ranking Intelligence Officials. AFP (1/5) reports that the BBC has identified five Iranians arrested by the US in Baghdad last month as "senior intelligence officers engaged in a covert political mission to influence the Iraqi government," and quoted British officials as saying that while important intelligence was attained, "there was no 'smoking gun' about weapons supplies or attacks. Instead, the Iranians were there to hold high-level meetings with representatives of several Iraqi Shiite factions that have come to prominence since the fall of president Saddam Hussein in 2003."

The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that the "recent arrest of Iranian diplomats in Baghdad, allegedly for ties to militants, was part of Pentagon strategy to ratchet up efforts to curb Tehran's growing influence inside Iraq. 'I think you can expect more' in the months ahead, said one official."

Iranian Influence Seen As Worse Than Saddam Regime. In a New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) op-ed, Slavoj Zizek of the Birkbeck Institute for the Humanities, analyzes "what went wrong with the United States occupation of Iraq," suggesting that the US had been able to handle Saddam Hussein, since he led as a pragmatic secularist, his overthrow "has generated a much more uncompromising 'fundamentalist' politico-ideological constellation in Iraq. This has led to a predominance of the pro-Iranian political forces there — the intervention basically delivered Iraq to Iranian influence." Zizek suggests that President Bush acted in Iran's direct interest by invading, and that this is worse than leaving Saddam in power would have been.

Partition Could Bring Need For US To Relocate Iraqis. The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Grier, 59K) runs an analysis piece titled, "If Iraq fragments, What's Plan B?" about the possibility that Iraq will fragment into Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite zones, exploring what could be done to prevent this, but mainly focuses on "how the United States might handle Iraq's partition." The article notes the relocation work the US military did during the Bosnian civil war, which "would perhaps preempt the violent Balkans-style ethnic cleansing that is already occurring in Iraq," according to the Brookings Institution's Michael O'Hanlon. The Monitor suggests that the planned troop surge could serve to strengthen infrastructure, and by extension the Iraqi government, "but events in Iraq now may be running at a speed that outpaces the US ability to respond." The article continues to consider how ethnic relocation could best be achieved.

Mother Defends Soldier Who Refused Iraq Deployment. The Washington Post (1/5, C1, Weeks, 690K) reports on the efforts of Carolyn Ho, mother of Army 1st. Lt. Ehren Watada, "the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq," to rally support for her son in Washington. Watada is expected to stand court martial. "Like many Americans, she believed she could come to the capital city and change the world." Ho "sees her efforts as part of a larger, multifaceted wave that is challenging the Bush administration form every angle." Ho says her son's refusal to serve in Iraq is based on the assertion that the war was entered under false pretenses, and is therefore illegal. Her extensive efforts to garner support for her sun's cause has culminated in a letter from CA35 Maxine Waters (D), which praised Watada's "integrity and dignity in his objection to the war in Iraq." The Post concludes, "Ho sighed and said she found the letter to be 'disappointing.' But it was something."

Iraq War Booty Traced To Manassas Self-Storage Facility. The Washington Post (1/5, B1, Vargas, 690K) reports that NCIS agents filed "a 10-page affidavit" for a warrant to search a self-storage center in Manassas, Virginia, in connection with a federal investigation into USMC gunnery sergeant Gary Maziarz. Mariarz "was placed in pretrial confinement at Camp Pendleton because…'reasonable grounds exist that he poses a serious threat to the national security of the Unites States.'" Moreover, he "is charged with larceny of computer and camera equipment, larceny of weaponry and possession of steroids." In his apartment, investigators "found steroids and three commemorative Colt 1911 .45-caliber pistols 'reputed to have been presented to Saddam Hussein.'" Investigators also found "two folders containing approximately 250 pages of material marked 'SECRET.'"

Mullah Omar Denounces Karzai Government, Vows Resistance. The New York Times (1/5, Khan, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "In what appears to be the first exchange with a journalist since going into hiding five years ago, the Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, said that he had not seen Al Qaeda's chief, Osama bin Laden, in five years and that he would never negotiate with the United States-backed government of Hamid Karzai in Afghanistan. He also threatened to continue the war until foreign troops withdraw from Afghanistan." The Times notes that the statements were made by a circuitous email method, and were therefore not authenticated, adding that "the statements, if authentic, would be Mullah Omar's first exchange with a journalist since he was driven from power in 2001," and that he is believed to be in Pakistan.

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (1/5, King, 850K) reports on the impact Mullah Omar's ability to avoid capture for over five years with a $10-million US bounty has had on his reputation in the area adjacent to the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. His freedom "is celebrated here as proof of his mystical powers." The Times continues to relate the details of Omar's rule in Afghanistan, and speculates on his current whereabouts.

DOJ_NMG_0112874

Pakistani PM Calls For Afghan Refugee Repatriation. The New York Times (1/5, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, said Thursday that he wanted the three million Afghan refugees still living in Pakistan to go home as one way to end the problem of insurgents using the country as a haven. It is the first time Pakistan has been so blunt in demanding that the Afghans, to whom it has served as host for more than 20 years since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, leave." The Times notes that Aziz's comments came as he was in Afghanistan meeting with President Hamid Karzai to try to ease strains over "Pakistan's plan to fence and mine the border, and Afghanistan's project to convene two tribal gatherings, or jirgas, of national representatives from both countries, to try to foster peace between the countries."

Medical Teams Performing Better In Iraq, Afghanistan Than In Past Wars. The Washington Times (1/5, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The killed-in-action rate in the Iraq-Afghanistan wars is half what it was in World War II and a third less than Vietnam and Desert Storm, according to internal Pentagon documents that say battlefield medical teams are doing a better job of stabilizing the wounded and getting them to doctors." The improvement can be "little solace to the families of the American troops who have died or been seriously wounded..." The briefings showed that the rate is "12.5 percent for the current wars compared with 25.3 percent for World War II and 18.6 percent for Vietnam/Desert Storm."

US Said To Be Ill-Equipped To Care For Injured Soldiers. Linda Bilmes, Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/5, 850K) that although "better medical care and stronger body armor are enabling many more soldiers to survive injuries that might have led, in earlier generations, to death," the Bush administration "failed to foresee what it would mean, failed to plan for the growing tide of veterans who would be in urgent need of medical and disability care." The result is that "as the Iraq war approaches its fourth anniversary, the Department of Veterans Affairs is buckling under a growing volume of disability claims and rising demand for medical attention."

DOJ:

Magazine Names Gonzales One Of Most Influential Hispanics. The AP (1/5) reports, "Jennifer Lopez is among the entertainers selected by People en Espanol for its '100 Most Influential Hispanics' issue, which honors those who have made an impact in the Hispanic community. … Lopez, who graces the cover of the magazine's February issue, on newsstands Friday, says 'being an example to others is a big part of my work.'" The AP continues, "Lopez tops the list of entertainers, which also includes Antonio Banderas, Carlos Santana, Eva Longoria, George Lopez, Gloria Estefan, Ricky Martin, Salma Hayek and Shakira, among others. … The magazine also honors filmmaker Alejandro Gonzalez Inarritu (culture/the arts), Attorney General Alberto Gonzales (politics/public affairs), businessman Carlos Slim Helu (business), MTV President Christina Norman (media), Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim owner Arturo Arte Moreno (sports), sociologist Aida Giachello (science and technology/health) and teacher Bertha Flores (education)."

Native American Woman Recommended For Arizona US Attorney Post. The Arizona Republic (1/5, House) reports, "A Hopi woman who has served most of her career as a federal prosecutor n Arizona is being recommended to President Bush as a potential nominee to become the next U.S. Attorney for the District of Arizona." The Republic continues, "Diane J. Humetewa, 42, who is now the senior litigation counsel and tribal liaison under retiring U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton, was recommended to the White House Thursday by Republican Sens. Jon Kyl and John McCain. … She would be the first Native American U.S. Attorney in Arizona if nominated by Bush and confirmed by the Senate. Officials were researching whether she would also be the nation's first Native American U.S. Attorney. … 'I am proud to recommend Diane to serve our country in this noble role. As a native Arizonan, Diane has a sound appreciation for the culture and legal issues unique to the region,' said McCain. Humetewa served as a counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Indian Affairs from August 1993 to March 1996, when McCain was chairman of the panel. … 'Her distinguished career in public service, her experience as a prosecutor, and work on behalf of crime victims make her an ideal nominee for this role,' added Kyl." The Republic adds, "Humetewa is married and a 1993 graduate of the Arizona State University College of Law. She began her career with the U.S. Attorney's Office as a victim advocate for then-U.S. Attorney Stephen M. McNamee in 1987, and has served no less than six U.S. Attorneys, according to a news release announcing the appointment. … White House officials said they have no timeframe for considering McCain and Kyl's recommendation. … Charlton was appointed U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona on Nov. 12, 2001, by President Bush. He announced last month that he is quitting as U.S. Attorney to enter private legal practice at the end of January. He is to be a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy."

DOJ_NMG_0112875

Baltimore US Attorney Profiled. The Maryland Gazette (1/5, Ford) reports from Baltimore, "U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein has the polite manner and looks of a friendly youth pastor. … But county prosecutors across the state describe Rosenstein as nose-to-the-grindstone federal prosecutor who has raised the profile of the office through frequent news conferences and aggressive prosecutions ranging from corporate corruption to gang crimes." The Gazette continues, "Since his appointment in May 2005, Rosenstein has brought innovative ideas to the office, including bringing the first racketeering charges against members of the street gang MS-13, said Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler (D). … 'This U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein is one of the best that we've had here in Maryland in recent times,' said Gansler, who was Montgomery County's top prosecutor for eight years and an assistant U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C., before that. 'He's a prosecutor's prosecutor.'" The Gazette adds, "Federal prosecutors obtained racketeering charges against 22 suspected Mara Salvatrucha members in August 2005 — the first use of the RICO statute for street gangs in Maryland. Under the 1970 Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization statute, members of an organization can be convicted for involvement in all the crimes committed by the group. … Federal prosecutors worked closely with Montgomery's prosecutors in going after members of the violent gang, Gansler said. … Rosenstein 'came to the office weeks after taking over,' Gansler said. 'We discussed our mutual concerns and the reality of the gang problem.' … When the MS-13 indictments were handed down in August 2005, Rosenstein praised the work and cooperation of the state's attorneys and police departments in Montgomery and Prince George's counties as well as the FBI and other agencies."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Federal Prosecutors Conclude Accounting-Fraud Case Against Former AOL Officials. The Washington Post (1/5, D1, Johnson) reports, "Federal prosecutors concluded their accounting-fraud case against two former AOL executives yesterday afternoon, signaling that the long-running trial soon may end after unusual twists including a mistrial for one of the defendants." The Post continues, "The case, which began in an Alexandria federal courtroom in mid-October, is one of the longest criminal trials ever in a jurisdiction that is widely known as 'the rocket docket' for its speedy and efficient justice, legal analysts said." The Post adds, "More than three dozen government witnesses testified about complex accounting tricks that hearkened back to early 2001, when the technology boom had turned into a bust. At the time, the Dulles Internet service provider struggled to show revenue and advertising gains by making questionable deals with dot-com business partners in which no revenue changed hands. … 'There was an intense focus to get revenue,' testified Jason Witt, a manager in AOL's aggressive and freewheeling business affairs unit, which has been disbanded. 'It's probably the greatest pressure I've seen since ever.'" The Post notes, "A number of witnesses recounted how the AOL defendants -- former business affairs executive Kent D. Wakeford and former Netbusiness unit vice president John P. Tuli -- felt squeezed between the expectations of their employer to close more deals and demands from dot-com clients who themselves were struggling to stay afloat. … But the trial perhaps is most notable for the absence of the former AOL officials who led the business-affairs operation, such as David M. Colburn and Eric Keller, whose names came up regularly in testimony and who once had been the focus of government investigation. Time Warner, which absorbed AOL, agreed to pay more than $500 million to settle joint civil and criminal charges two years ago."

Activist Shareholders Claim Victory With Home Depot CEO's Departure. The New York Times (1/5, Duhigg) reports, "For decades, activist shareholders were an entertaining, but largely ignored, Wall Street sideshow. Disgruntled investors would attend annual meetings to harangue executives, criticize strategies — and protest that their complaints were being ignored. One agitator appeared in face paint and a red nose after executives called him a clown. … Today, however, it seems that activists have captured the center ring and are directing the main event." The Times continues, "On Wednesday, shareholder advocates could claim one of their biggest prizes yet when Home Depot announced the resignation of its chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, long a target of shareholder ire for his large compensation and the company's flagging stock price." The Times adds, "The main investor who pressed for the overthrow at Home Depot might at first glance seem an unlikely rebel: Ralph V. Whitworth, a lawyer educated at Georgetown and a former campaign worker for President Ronald Reagan who in December announced he had bought about $1 billion of the retailer's stock, or a 1.2 percent stake, through his fund, Relational Investors. … But the rapid success of Mr. Whitworth's campaign against the management and strategy of Home Depot demonstrates how thoroughly activists have moved into Wall Street's inner sanctum. Mr. Whitworth has said he still intended to nominate himself and at least one other candidate to Home Depot's board at its shareholder meeting in the spring. … The shake-up at Home Depot may be just a taste of things to come as shareholders and management at a number of companies, including Brink's, the Borders Group and Applebee's International, square off for battle at annual meetings this spring."

DOJ_NMG_0112876

WSJournal Says Critics Wrong In Calling Nardelli's Pay "Severance." The Wall Street Journal (1/5, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Few Home Depot shareholders are mourning the departure of Robert Nardelli as CEO this week, and we aren't about to defend his performance. But someone needs to rebut the claim, which is almost as rampant as the Schadenfreude at his fall, that Mr. Nardelli is getting a $210 million 'severance' package as a reward for having failed." The "truth is that nearly all of that $210 million isn't severance at all but was part of Mr. Nardelli's original employment contract." But his "contract can't be abrogated now simply because the board has concluded it made a mistake. Of that $210 million figure, more than $180 million is owed to Mr. Nardelli as part of his original job offer."

WPost Says Apple Investors Face Dilemma In Jobs Stock Options Scandal. The Washington Post (1/5, A16, 690K) says in an editorial, "The scandal at Apple Computer presents a dilemma with no easy solution. On the one hand, the company has changed its story on its use of manipulated stock options, which boosted executive salaries at the expense of shareholders, and Apple still appears to be bending over backward to protect Steve Jobs, its storied chief executive. On the other hand, if Apple's board were to come clean and oust Mr. Jobs, the shareholders would be punished yet again, since Apple is worth more with him than without him. Or, to put the dilemma a little differently: It doesn't seem right to let an executive float above corporate governance rules, but it seems equally perverse to enforce those rules if doing so would damage the investors for whom such rules exist in the first place."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Prosecutors List More Favors By Ney To Abramoff Clients. The Washington Post (1/5, A7, Schmidt) reports, "Federal prosecutors seeking a stiff prison sentence for former Ohio congressman Robert W. Ney have listed previously undisclosed favors that he and his staff provided to clients of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including two Russian energy executives who have been linked to former House majority leader Tom DeLay." The Post continues, "Ney pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy, admitting that he performed official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and skybox sports tickets. He is to be sentenced Jan. 19." The Post adds, "The Republican congressman and his staff offered to aid Abramoff's clients in the summer of 2003 as Ney prepared for a trip to Russia, according to newly released e-mails attached to a Justice Department filing in federal court late Wednesday. Abramoff's lobbying team got the congressman to intervene with the U.S. Consulate in Moscow to help resolve a passport issue for the daughter of Abramoff client Alexander Koulakovsky, the e-mails show. … Koulakovsky and his business partner, Marina Nevskaya, hired Abramoff to help them arrange meetings with DeLay and to lobby for federal aid to their businesses. The Russian executives helped pay for a trip to Moscow taken by DeLay, his wife and aides in 1997. … A charity sponsored by DeLay received a $1 million check from a London law firm linked to the two. Former charity officials told The Washington Post last year the donation originated with Russian oil and gas executives, and was intended to influence DeLay's vote on an issue affecting the Russian economy."

Former Massachusetts House Speaker To Plead Guilty To Obstruction. The AP (1/5, Lavoie) reports, "A former Massachusetts House speaker accused of lying during his testimony in a voting rights lawsuit plans to plead guilty Friday to obstruction of justice, a person familiar with the agreement said Thursday." The AP continues, "The lawsuit had claimed that a 2001 state law that redrew legislative district boundaries discriminated against minorities in Boston while protecting incumbents, including the now-former House speaker, Thomas Finneran. … Finneran's trial on perjury and obstruction of justice charges had been scheduled to begin Jan. 16." The AP adds, "Under the plea deal, Finneran won't face prison time, and federal prosecutors will drop the three perjury counts, the person familiar with the deal told The Associated Press. He will serve probation, pay a fine and agree not to seek political office for five years. … Finneran, 56, has agreed to admit to some, but not all, of the allegations in the obstruction charge, which accuses him of obstructing justice by lying during the trial and in a deposition, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the deal has not yet been finalized in court. … During his eight years as speaker, Finneran was considered the state's most powerful lawmaker. Known for his authoritarian style, he was once dubbed 'King Tom' for pushing through a rules change that eliminated term limits for House speakers. .. .He resigned as speaker in September 2004 and was indicted nine months later on charges that he lied under oath about his role in the state's legislative redistricting. The testimony was before a federal appeals court in 2003 in the voting rights lawsuit brought by a coalition of minority groups."

DOJ_NMG_0112877

The Boston Globe (1/5, Saltzman, 413K) reports Finneran "faces the almost certain loss of his $30,000-a-year pension because of a decision last year by the state Supreme Judicial Court. The state's highest court ruled unanimously in March that Boston Juvenile Court Clerk-Magistrate John P. Bulger forfeited his pension when he admitted that he lied to two federal grand juries investigating the disappearance of his brother, fugitive mobster James J. 'Whitey' Bulger. Alden Bianchi, cochairman of a Boston Bar Association committee on pensions, said Finneran's case appears to be a more obvious violation of the Massachusetts law that bars employees from receiving a pension if convicted of a 'criminal offense involving violation of the laws applicable to his office or position.'"

The Boston Herald (1/5, Wedge, 184K) notes, "Sources told the Herald Finneran will leave his $500,000-a-year post at the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council as a result of his pending felony conviction." Additionally, "sources close to the ex-speaker said his decision to plead guilty was made in part to spare embarrassment, with a parade of as many as 40 lawmakers slated to testify. Many had already received subpoenas, including his top aide Charles Rasmussen, sources said. Finneran, who is expected to land a plum talk-show host gig, could continue lobbying since there are no state laws barring convicted felons from being registered lobbyists, officials said."

Former Illinois Secretary Of State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison. The AP (1/5, Dennis) reports, "A former high-ranking Illinois Secretary of State official was sentenced Thursday to 30 months in prison for helping three janitors pocket nearly $200,000 in state pay for work they didn't do. Cecil Turner, 60, is the former director of the secretary of state's physical services division. He was convicted in September of four federal counts of wire fraud for allegedly helping the janitors hide the six-year scheme, and two counts of lying to investigators. Turner also was ordered to pay more than $49,000 in restitution to the state for money the janitors pocketed." The AP notes, "Turner's sentence was seven months less than the range of 37 to 46 months recommended in a pre-sentence report." US District Judge Joe B. McDade "said he trimmed the federal term based on an inch-thick stack of letters he received citing Turner's long history of work for youth, his neighborhood and community. But McDade said he also needed to send a message to others in state government that corruption won't be tolerated."

Former Advertising CEO Sentenced In Philly Airport Corruption Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/5, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "The former CEO of an advertising company was sentenced yesterday to 51/2 months in a halfway house for his role in a pay-to-play scheme at Philadelphia International Airport." Former Sky Sites CEO Joseph Evans "will also serve 51/2 months of home detention. Evans pleaded guilty to misappropriating company funds to make a political contribution. Three codefendants pleaded guilty to funneling $30,000 in campaign contributions to Mayor Street's 2003 reelection campaign to help secure a contract at Philadelphia International Airport." The Inquirer notes, "Neither the mayor nor any other public official has been accused of wrongdoing. The case is part of a continuing FBI investigation into corruption at Philadelphia International Airport and is related to federal authorities' City Hall probe."

The Philadelphia Daily News (1/5, Hinkelman, 106K) reports Evans also was ordered to "perform 100 hours of community service," and US District Judge James T. Giles said he "should use the community service to counsel others who might contemplate similar conduct. 'It gives you an opportunity to use the wisdom you've come to learn in a hard way to perpetuate that lesson,' Giles said. 'There are those who will now learn of your predicament.' Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan Markman and Evans' attorney, Cheryl Krause, said they were satisfied with the sentence." Evans "could have been sent to prison for 10 to 16 months under sentencing guidelines."

Judge Rejects Nevada Commissioner's Request To Delay Surrender For Prison. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (1/4, Bach) reported, "U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks on Wednesday refused a request to push back the surrender date of former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera, who in August was convicted of charges stemming from political corruption. 'The grounds argued in support of an extension of Herrera's surrender are founded upon arguments of financial hardship and inconvenience,' Hicks wrote in a court order. 'Given the severity of the defendants's criminal offenses and a surrender date that was more than abundant to prepare for incarceration, the motion is denied.' Hicks said Herrera is still expected to surrender to federal authorities on or before noon on Jan. 12." The AP (1/5) also reports on the ruling, in a story based primarily on the Review-Journal article.

Potential Jurors Complete Questionnaires For Federal Abortion Murder Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/5, Thompson) reports, "Jury selection began Thursday in the federal trial of an anti-abortion extremist who shot and killed an abortion provider, on a charge that could keep him behind bars forever. The roughly 100 people in the jury pool were questioned about their views on abortion and their knowledge of the the 1998 sniper slaying of Dr. Barnett Slepian." The AP notes James Kopp "admitted firing the fatal shot from the woods outside but said he meant only to wound the doctor to stop him from performing any more abortions. … Authorities hunted 2 1/2 years for Kopp after the shooting, adding him to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999."

DOJ_NMG_0112878

23 Indicted In $3.5 Million NYC Mortgage Fraud Scheme. The New York Daily News (1/5, Zambito, 729K) reports, "Twenty-three brokers, appraisers and bankers were indicted yesterday in a $3.5 million scheme to dupe banks and other lenders by recruiting 'straw' buyers to fill out bogus mortgage and loan applications, Manhattan federal prosecutors said. Brooklyn brokerages AGA Capital NY, Northside Capital and its successor Lending Universe Corp. earned $4 million in commissions between 2004 and 2006 brokering some 1,000 mortgages and home equity loans valued at $200 million, prosecutors say. The actual losses to banks and other lenders was pegged at $3.5million." The Daily News notes, "Eighteen defendants were arrested yesterday by agents from the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Four more are expected to surrender today and one is a fugitive."

The New York Post (1/5, Cornell, 631K) adds, "AGA Brokers Aleksander 'Shorty' Lipkin, Igor 'Ryzhiy' Mishelevich, Alex 'Lyosha' Gorvits and several others are accused of supervising the scheme to submit fraudulent loan applications from 2004 to 2006. … In some cases, the ring 'stole the identities of persons who fit a certain financial profile and submitted loan applications on behalf of these persons without their knowledge,' court papers said." WNBC-TV New York (1/4) noted that the "case was investigated by the The Eurasian Organized Crime Task Force, a joint effort by FBI agents and NYPD detectives, and the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency."

Washington Lawyer Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Conspiracy Charges. The AP (1/5) reports, "A lawyer accused of taking thousands of dollars from a Kennewick youth program has pleaded innocent to federal bribery and conspiracy charges. U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael Leavitt entered a not guilty plea for Jeff L. Finney, of Benton City, and allowed the former defense lawyer to remain free without bond during an initial court appearance Wednesday." The AP notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Shogren said Finney has cooperated for months with the investigation in the case, which the Tri-City Herald reported involves between $50,000 to $140,000 missing from the city of Kennewick's Home Base youth program. … A yearlong FBI investigation focused on Finney and Tyler M. Morris, 36, a former assistant city prosecutor for Kennewick."

Michigan Health Care Executive Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud. The AP (1/5) reports, "The former owner of a Michigan health care company pleaded guilty to federal charges of stealing nearly $800,000 by fraudulently billing Medicare." Iftakhar Khan "and his brother were indicted in 2003. They were charged with mail, wire and health care fraud." Amjad Khan "pleaded guilty in August." The AP notes Iftakhar Khan "was president of Livonia-based Michigan Rehabilitation and Pain Management. The company closed after the FBI and other agencies raided it in 2000. Amjad Khan operated Warren-based American Home Health Care, which also closed."

Missouri Official Indicted For Mortgage Fraud, Calls Federal Probe "Political Terrorism." The AP (1/5, Twiddy) reports, "Former Jackson County Executive Katheryn Shields and her husband were indicted Thursday on federal charges of taking part in a mortgage fraud scheme. … Federal prosecutors allege that the couple were approached by a group of individuals last fall who offered to sell their home, which was listed at $699,950, for $1.2 million. The couple was to receive $707,000 of that amount, the remainder being split among other co-defendants and explained to lenders as a 'management fee.' To get the mortgage approved, the defendants allegedly provided lenders with fraudulent financial information and inflated property appraisals. Officials said the FBI stopped the transaction from going through." The AP notes, "Shields has survived more than three years of fruitless federal investigations into her work as the county's highest elected official, and the indictment came the day before she planned to file to run for Kansas City mayor -- a decision she said she will not change. 'I think I've been subjected for the last three-plus years to political terrorism and I will not give in to political terrorism,' Shields said."

Death Penalty Sentences Fall To 30 Year Low. The AP (1/5, Tanner) reports, "The number of death sentences handed out in the United States dropped in 2006 to the lowest level since capital punishment was reinstated 30 years ago, reflecting what some experts say is a growing fear that the criminal justice system will make a tragic and irreversible mistake. Executions fell, too, to the fewest in a decade." Death sentences "fell in 2006 to 114 or fewer, according to an estimate from the group. That is down from 128 in 2005," and "down sharply from the high of 317 in 1996." A "total of 53 executions were carried out in 2006, down from 60 in 2005. Executions over the past three decades peaked at 98 in 1999."

NYTimes Praises New Jersey For Recommendation To End Death Penalty. The New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "New Jersey could take the lead among states in abolishing the death penalty if it follows the recommendation that a legislative commission made this week. It is the right thing to do, and not just because capital punishment is barbaric and a poor deterrent. It has become increasingly clear as the use of DNA evidence has grown that there is simply too great a risk of making an irreversible mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0112879

Today Marks Twelfth Anniversary Of Bulger Disappearance. Under the headline "No Whitey After All These Years," the Boston Herald (1/5, Sweet, 184K) reports, "With the 12 days of Christmas safely behind us, Boston can pause to reflect on today's 12th anniversary of the disappearance of mobster madman James 'Whitey' Bulger. 'The Bulger Task Force . . . continues to dedicate an extraordinary amount of time and effort in the conduct of a worldwide investigation to locate fugitive James Bulger,' said Robert Krekorian, executive assistant U.S. attorney." The Herald notes, "Coincidentally, former FBI Boston Special Agent in Charge Kenneth Kaiser will be feted today at the Omni Parker House. Kaiser, tapped by Washington to serve as assistant director of the FBI's Inspection Division, made finding Bulger 'a priority'" said Hub office spokeswoman Gail Marcinkiewicz. 'He's disappointed that it didn't come to fruition during his tenure here in Boston.'"

The Boston Globe (1/5, Murphy, 413K) reports, "A federal grand jury investigating whether William M. Bulger or his family obstructed efforts to capture his gangster brother…has been extended at least another month, according to two sources familiar with the probe. Federal prosecutors are nearing a decision on whether there is sufficient evidence to ask the grand jury to indict William Bulger…on perjury or obstruction of justice charges, the sources said. The investigation is focusing on whether William Bulge…testified truthfully in April 2001 before a federal grand jury that was looking into whether family or friends of the fugitive knew his whereabouts or were helping him evade capture." The Globe also notes, "Today marks the beginning of Whitey Bulger's 12th year on the run. The longtime FBI informant was warned by his handler, retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., to flee just before his January 1995 federal racketeering indictment."

Study Finds Embezzlement In Most Catholic Dioceses. The New York Times (1/5, Goodstein, Strom) reports, "A survey by researchers at Villanova University has found that 85 percent of Roman Catholic dioceses that responded had discovered embezzlement of church money in the last five years, with 11 percent reporting that more than $500,000 had been stolen." The Times continues, "The Catholic Church has some of the most rigorous financial guidelines of any denomination, specialists in church ethics said, but the survey found that the guidelines were often ignored in parishes. And when no one is looking, the cash that goes into the collection plate does not always get deposited into the church's bank account. … Specialists in church ethics said they believed this was the first study to assess the extent of embezzlement in a denomination." The Times adds, "Officials at the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said they had seen the study, which was released just before Christmas and was first reported in the National Catholic Reporter, and were considering ways that parishes could tighten their financial controls." The Times notes that "the survey did not ask who stole the church money. But it did ask who detected the theft, and found that it was most often the parish priest, followed by the bookkeeper, an internal auditor or the parish finance council. … In October alone, three large cases of embezzlement surfaced, including one in Delray Beach, Fla., where two priests spent $8.6 million on trips to Las Vegas, dental work, property taxes and other expenses over four decades. … Most denominations have had cases of embezzlement, sometimes by top officials. In June, the Presbyterian Church U.S.A. fired its second-ranking financial officer, Judy Golliher, after she admitted stealing money that church officials put at more than $132,000."

Voluntary Statements By Suspects Seen As Window Into Criminal Process. The New York Times (1/5, Hartocollis) reports, "The 'Beast of Broadway,' as the tabloids call him, a successful actor, has been accused of sexually abusing a 15-year-old girl. But his grade-school teacher would be proud of him in at least one respect: He is a good speller. … That much was clear in the two and-a-half page written statement he gave the police after he was arrested, a statement that recounted a behind-the-scenes theater tour for the girl. He wrote these words voluntarily despite a constitutional right to remain silent that is ingrained not only in criminal law, but also in popular culture. But he was hardly the only person arrested in New York in recent years who opened up once the cuffs went on." The Times continues, "A former Women's Wear Daily writer, accused of disguising himself in a firefighter's costume and sexually assaulting a former colleague on Halloween, kept detectives spellbound with his disquisitions on Chinese menus and book rights. … A homeless man accused of stabbing a tourist as he rode with his girlfriend on the subway found that words weren't enough. Asked to sign his confession, he instead sketched a cartoon version of his crime: a pair of lovers' faces — one happy and one sad — and a stormy black cloud floating over a subway train." The Times adds, "Such statements — and occasional illustrations — by defendants in New York City courts are one element of what prosecutors call the V.D.F., more formally known as the People's Voluntary Disclosure Form. To read them is to experience a kind of poetry of everyday criminal life in New York City. … By turns raw, ugly, poignant, defiant, rarely remorseful and almost always damaging, the statements are a window into the criminal process, part of the common language between detectives and suspects. … Because they can be so revealing, the V.D.F.'s are a bane of defense lawyers' existence, and they often try to suppress them so they cannot be used in court. … More technically, the Voluntary Disclosure Form is a rough, preliminary summary of the evidence, which the prosecution is required to give to the defense."

DOJ_NMG_0112880

CIVIL LAW:

FTC Fines Diet Pill Marketers For False-Ad Claims. The Washington Post (1/5, D1, Shin) reports, "The ads for CortiStress said it could reduce your chances of developing Alzheimer's disease. Xenadrine EFX's 'thermogenic technology' was supposed to give your metabolism a lift. And TrimSpa said it contained a plant 'used by African bushmen for centuries' that could help you lose weight so you could 'become all you ever envied.' … Those claims are not credible, the Federal Trade Commission concluded, yesterday announcing it will collect about $25 million from the marketers of those popular weight-control pills to settle allegations that they misled consumers." The Post continues, "None of the products was deemed dangerous to a person's health, and the pills will be allowed to remain on store shelves, FTC officials said. The promoters, however, must change their advertising." The Post adds, "The pharmaceutical company Bayer, which was among the FTC's targets, agreed to pay a $3.2 million civil penalty to settle charges that it violated a previous FTC order that required all health claims for its One-a-Day vitamins be 'supported by competent and reliable scientific evidence.' In national ads, Bayer claimed its One-a-Day WeightSmart contained epigallocatechin gallate (EGCG), a green-tea extract that can help prevent weight gain in women older than 30 who 'can gain 10 pounds a decade, due in part to a slowing metabolism.' … Those claims were not 'substantiated by competent and reliable scientific evidence,' the agency said. … The settlement with Bayer 'is a wake-up call to any company that wants to push the envelope,' FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said. 'Every claim they make they have to have the science to back it up.'"

USA Today (1/5, 1B, Iwata) reports, "Nancy Metcalf, senior project editor at Consumers Union, said the group has lobbied for years to strengthen federal oversight of weight-loss supplements. … 'We have advised people not to take them,' she said."

Eli Lilly Settles Thousands More Suits Over Zyprexa. The Washington Post/AP (1/5, D6, Callahan) reports, "Drugmaker Eli Lilly said Thursday that it will settle about 18,000 additional lawsuits alleging it did not adequately warn patients that its anti-psychotic medication Zyprexa carries a heightened risk of diabetes." The AP continues, "Lilly did not disclose the amount of the settlement but said in a statement that it would take a fourth-quarter settlement charge that's not expected to exceed $500 million." The AP adds, "In a June 2005 settlement, the Indianapolis company agreed to pay about $700 million to resolve more than 8,000 similar lawsuits involving Zyprexa, its top-selling drug. … Lilly spokeswoman Tarra Ryker said the new settlement covered more plaintiffs for less money because the 18,000 cases were less viable due to a 2003 Zyprexa labeling change, which addressed the drug's possible diabetes risk. … She said the company plans to go to trial, beginning in April, to defend itself against the 1,200 remaining claims, which she said are not being settled for 'various reasons.' Lilly declined to elaborate on the specific reasons."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Will Not Probe Death In Virginia Jail. The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (1/5, Mccaffery) reports, "Federal authorities have declined to investigate the July death of an inmate in Portsmouth City Jail." The Virginian-Pilot continues, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation in Norfolk and the Department of Justice informed city officials in Portsmouth last month that they found insufficient evidence to suggest that federal civil rights laws were violated in connection with Joseph Combs's death. … After six days in the city jail, Combs, 57, died of severe dehydration and acute pneumonia, with bipolar disorder contributing, according to his autopsy. … Portsmouth City Attorney Tim Oksman sent letters to federal authorities in November, requesting a civil rights investigation into his death." The Virginian-Pilot adds, "Lamarr Brown , president of the Norfolk-based Organization of African-American Concerns , is speaking for Combs' widow, Granada Combs . … 'This is usually the protocol by the FBI in the Hampton Roads area when the death of a black person is concerned,' Brown said."

DC Seeks Dismissal Of DOJ Boys Town Suit. The Washington Times (1/5, McElhatton) reports, "D.C. officials want a federal judge to throw out a civil rights complaint filed by the U.S. Justice Department after a jury deadlocked on whether the city discriminated against a group home for disadvantaged youth on Capitol Hill." The times continues, "The complaint centered on whether D.C. officials broke federal housing laws and discriminated against the nonprofit Father Flanagan's Girls and Boys Home, also known as Boys Town. … The Nebraska-based group sued the District in 2001, saying city officials kept Boys Town from opening a group home on Potomac Avenue Southeast by stonewalling project applications amid community opposition to the plans." The Times adds, "The Justice Department later joined as a plaintiff in the federal lawsuit. … 'There was no direct evidence of handicap or racial discrimination against the Boys Town project,' attorneys for the District argued in recent court pleadings. Federal officials declined to say yesterday how they plan to proceed. … 'We're obviously disappointed the jury didn't return a verdict for the United States,' said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department. 'But we continue to think the District of Columbia violated the Fair Housing Act.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112881

ANTITRUST:

Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Settled. The Legal Intelligencer (1/5, Duffy) reports, "The final two defendants in a class action antitrust suit against the top manufacturers of automotive refinishing paint have agreed to pay $39 million to settle claims that they participated in a price-fixing conspiracy, bringing the total recovery in the case to more than $105 million." The Intelligencer continues, "In a six-page opinion in In re Automotive Refinishing Paint Antitrust Litigation handed down on Dec. 28, Eastern District of Pennsylvania Judge R. Barclay Surrick granted preliminary approval of the two settlements -- $16 million from Sherwin-Williams Co. and $23 million from PPG Industries -- clearing the way for notices to be sent to the class." The Intelligencer adds, "In prior settlements, E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. paid $36 million; Akzo Nobel Car Refinishes, a subsidiary of Dutch chemical giant Akzo Nobel NV, paid $18.7 million; and two related German companies, BASF and BASF Coatings, paid $12 million total. … The plaintiffs in the suit are a class of direct purchasers -- mostly auto repair shops -- that claim in the suit that the paint manufacturers conducted secret meetings in Europe in which they agreed to 'fix, raise, maintain and stabilize' the prices of refinishing paints. … The suit alleges that during the 1990s, the price increases for auto refinishing paints continued to rise despite a drop in the prices of crude oil and natural gas -- the principal raw materials used to manufacture refinishing paints. … Dozens of suits were filed in 2001 in the wake of news accounts of the Justice Department's probe focused on Akzo Nobel, which had pleaded guilty in 1997 and was fined $10 million for participating in a separate international conspiracy to fix the price of sodium gluconate, an industrial cleaner."

Visa, Mastercard Settle Debit-Card Dispute With US. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, C2) reports, "The federal government is set to collect at least $7 million as part of an 11-year-old court battle that pitted retailers against Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard Inc. in a dispute over debit-card fees." The Journal continues, "Although plaintiffs in the class-action lawsuit settled the case in 2003, the U.S. submitted a claim only last February. That claim then became the subject of a separate dispute when lawyers representing the plaintiffs contended that the government shouldn't get a piece of the $3 billion settlement fund that had been set up for retailers." The Journal adds, "By filing a claim, the government essentially contended that it, like the nation's retailers, had been hurt by Visa and MasterCard rules that required merchants to accept their branded debit cards if they also accepted their credit cards. Government facilities-ranging from military PXs to the souvenir shop at the Smithsonian Institution accept plastic. The government's claim had been submitted by the antitrust division of the Justice Department. … Under the settlement, which was announced late Wednesday, Visa and MasterCard will pay a total of $3.5 million to the government. The settlement fund will contribute $3.7 million. The government may receive additional funds later if there is money left in the settlement fund."

EU Intensifies Probe Of Energy Companies. The Financial Times (1/5, Buck) reports, "Europe's biggest energy companies face an intensified crackdown by the European Union competition commissioner following an inquiry into the sector that found evidence of collusion and other severe market failings." The Times continues, "In a summary of a 16-month investigation, Neelie Kroes warns she will make 'full and combined use' of her powers over mergers, government subsidies and antitrust abuses to tackle the lack of competition in the sector. … Her report, a copy of which has been obtained by the Financial Times, states: 'Market concentration has been identified as a major concern for the success of the liberalisation process. The market power of pre-liberalisation monopolies has not yet been eroded.'" The Times adds, "The final results of Ms Kroes' sector inquiry are expected to be announced next week, along with a broader review of the EU's energy policy that will also look at cutting greenhouse gas emissions and bolstering the security of Europe's energy supplies. … Her assessment will make uncomfortable reading for many of Europe's biggest energy companies, including Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF in France and Eni in Italy. These groups are already the target of Commission antitrust investigations, and have seen their offices raided by Brussels officials at least once during the past seven months. … The report makes clear that they – and other dominant energy groups – are likely to face further pressure from the Brussels regulator in the near future, for example to cede control over gas pipelines and the power grid or to terminate some of their long-term contracts with customers and energy suppliers."

DOJ_NMG_0112882

Dingell Generates Concerns At FCC, Even Among Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Rep. John Dingell "alarms FCC Democrats, too." Back as "chairman of House Energy and Commerce panel after 12 years, the Michigan Democrat has blasted the Republican-controlled communications panel. But his statement of 'significant concerns' about ATT-BellSouth merger rankled Democratic commissioners. The agency's two Democratic board members had won concessions from AT&T to approve the deal. A Dingell aide said he wasn't referring to the Democrats' actions."

South Korea Launches Antitrust Probe Of Qualcomm. The Financial Times (1/5, Nuttall) reports, "South Korean antitrust regulators say they have launched a full-scale investigation into the business practices of Qualcomm, the US wireless chipmaker." The Times continues, "Qualcomm has been the subject of complaints from other chipmakers and handset makers in Europe, Japan and Korea, but the move by the Korean Fair TradeCommission represented the first time that formal action had been taken by the authorities." The Times adds, "An FTC official said a task force had been formed since early in December to step up an investigation into allegations that Qualcomm had used its dominant market position to charge excessive royalties. … It had received complaints between April and June last year from Broadcom and Texas Instruments, rival chipmakers in the US, and Korea's Nextreaming and Thin Multimedia. … They had alleged monopolistic practices by Qualcomm in bundling multimedia products into its chipsets and not opening up its programming interface to allow others to build complementary software applications."

The AP (1/5, Olsen) reports, "Between April and June last year, the FTC received complaints about Qualcomm from Broadcom Corp. and Texas Instruments Inc., both of the U.S., and two South Korean companies, claiming Qualcomm abused its market dominance. … Qualcomm is embroiled in legal and trade disputes with a number of rivals that contend it extracts excessive royalty payments, a charge the company vigorously denies. Korea has long been one of Qualcomm's strongest markets, accounting for 32 percent of $7.53 billion in revenue for its fiscal year that ended Sept. 24."

Major Law Firms Scrap Merger Plans. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, B1, Koppel) reports, "New York law firm Dewey Ballantine LLP is best known for its deals practice. But this time, it wasn't able to pull off a deal of its own." The Journal continues, "Merger plans between Dewey and another major firm, Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, founded in San Francisco, fell apart yesterday amid concerns over money, power and prestige. At least 11 Dewey partners had left in recent months, some taking business with them. … The merger had been heralded as one of the biggest in years and notable given Dewey's stature and lucrative Wall Street practice. … In recent years, many law firms have merged to add practice depth quickly and to enter new national and international markets. Firms are particularly keen on adding lawyers in New York, the world's most lucrative legal market, thanks to a steady supply of corporate-deal work. If the tie-up had gone forward, other New York firms might have felt pressure to join the merger frenzy that has long gripped firms based in others parts of the country. … The failure of this merger may make it harder for firms outside New York to find partners there."

The New York Times (1/5, De La Merced) reports, "Unlike most merger talks, which are conducted in secrecy, the firms announced in October that their top committees had given preliminary approval to the proposal. At every step in the process after that, the firms expressed confidence that the deal would go through." The Times adds, "The two had already decided upon the name Dewey Orrick for the combined firm. Dewey's chairman, Morton A. Pierce, and Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., would have served as co-chairmen, with Mr. Baxter taking on the additional title of presiding partner. … Partners were to have voted on the deal last month. But as several obstacles proved intractable, those elections were postponed to this month. … Among the most visible distress signals was the departure of 10 partners from Dewey since merger talks began. Most ominous were the exits of three lawyers from Dewey's mergers and acquisitions team, including Michael J. Aiello and Jack S. Bodner, who had been considered protégés of Mr. Pierce."

Prominent LSE Shareholder Increases Its Stake. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, MacDonald) reports, "The second-largest shareholder in London Stock Exchange PLC added to its stake in the company, indicating that some investors still expect Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. to raise its offer for the London market operator, even as LSE's shares have fallen closer to Nasdaq's current offering price." Heyman Investment Associates, an investment vehicle of U.S. businessman Samuel Heyman, "said it had increased its stake in LSE, Europe's largest exchange by the value of stocks traded, to 9.65% from 9.60%." Over the past three days, LSE's share price has gone down 1.8% "to close at £12.87 ($25.10) yesterday; it is now just 3.5% higher than Nasdaq's offer of £12.43 a share. Analysts believe that if LSE's share price falls below £12.43, enough hedge funds will sell their shares to Nasdaq to give it the 50% it says it needs to take over the London exchange."

DOJ_NMG_0112883

ENVIRONMENT:

Park Service Still Sells "Creationist" Account Of Grand Canyon. The New York Times (1/5, Dean, 1.16M) reports that when "complaints emerged in 2004 over the sale of a creationist account of the formation of the Grand Canyon in National Park Service bookstores, Interior Department officials said they would review whether the book should be pulled from the shelves." But there "was no formal review, in part because of differences of opinion among the Park Service's own specialists, said David Barna, a spokesman for the agency, in an interview yesterday." In the end, "no formal action was taken, and the book remains on sale because, Mr. Barna said in a written statement, 'It is not our role to tell people what to believe.'"

EPA Official Warns Of Slow Progress On Chesapeake Bay Revitalization. The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Fahrenthold) reports, "The multibillion-dollar cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay, which government officials had pledged would succeed by 2010, will likely miss that deadline by a wide margin -- and, at the current pace, might drag on for decades more, an Environmental Protection Agency official acknowledged yesterday." The Post continues, "Rich Batiuk, an associate director of the EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program, made that projection at a meeting of the Chesapeake Bay Commission, an advisory group that includes state officials from Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania. … His talk was a blunt, and public, admission of something that the EPA had conceded in an agency report last year. A pledge to "save the bay," made six years ago in the so-called Chesapeake 2000 Agreement, is falling drastically short." The Post adds, "The news means a continued struggle for one of this area's most cherished bodies of water, one that Washingtonians turn to for seafood, sailing, recreational fishing and weekend scenery. It is also bad news for such Chesapeake tributaries as the Potomac River, where the pollution and runoff bring mud, algae blooms and dangerous chemicals on the way to the bay. … Batiuk's assessment was not news to many environmentalists, who have said for years that roads and suburbs in the watershed were growing too fast and that cleanup efforts at farms and sewage plants were moving too slowly for the deadline to be met."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Records Reveal Details Of Rehnquist Drug Dependence. The AP (1/5, Yost) reports, "A physician at the U.S. Capitol prescribed a powerful sleep aid for William Rehnquist for nearly a decade while he was an associate justice of the Supreme Court, according to newly released FBI records. The records present a picture of a justice with chronic back pain who for many months took three times the recommended dosage of the drug Placidyl and then went into withdrawal in 1981 when he abruptly stopped taking it. Rehnquist checked himself into George Washington University Hospital, where he tried to escape in his pajamas and imagined that the CIA was plotting against him, the records indicate." The AP notes, "The doctor who helped Rehnquist get off the drug said the justice's wife…felt that the prescribing physician and the pharmacist who filled the prescription were probably intimidated by such high-ranking officials as Supreme Court justices and senators and probably would have agreed to almost any request."

Files Also Show FBI Investigated Confirmation Witness Testimony. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (1/5, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "The files also show that during both of Rehnquist's confirmation battles…the Justice Department enlisted the FBI to find out what witnesses lined up by Senate Democrats were prepared to say." North Carolina lawyer Alexander Charns said that the files "contain evidence of 'the ongoing use of the FBI for political purposes, not only in the sixties and seventies but well into the 1980s.'" However, FBI spokesman Paul Bresson "denied that the FBI's background investigations for judicial nominees are partisan in any way. 'We are not political; we are apolitical. We're just trying to find the facts,' he said." Then-Assistant Attorney General John R. Bolton "said in a telephone interview yesterday that there was no political bias in the investigation, because the request actually came from Senate Democrats."

Judge Rejects Request To Throw Out Statements In Florida Torture Case. The St. Petersburg Times (1/5) reports, "Testifying for the first time since his arrest in a case involving allegations of torture, rape and murder, Scott Schweickert accused authorities Thursday of violating his rights by denying him a lawyer when he was first questioned." Schweickert "is charged with conspiracy and assisting in a drug-facilitated crime of violence against Michael Wachholtz and Jason Galehouse, both 26. The two men disappeared the same weekend in December 2003." DEA agent Scott Albrecht "testified that Schweickert had been informed of his right to an attorney several times but never requested one. … 'The evidence shows that at no time did the defendant request a lawyer,'" the judge said.

Grand Jury In Baltimore Indicts Five On Drug Charges. The Baltimore Sun (1/4) reported a grand jury in Baltimore indicted five defendants after federal agents "seized 23 kilograms of cocaine last month and arrested the men involved in the delivery to Howard County on conspiracy charges." According to court documents, a state trooper in North Carolina stopped a tractor-trailer Dec. 18 for speeding. The trooper "found cocaine in the vehicle, authorities said." The Sun says court documents show that DEA agents learned that two men were delivering the cocaine from California to a truck stop in Howard County.

DOJ_NMG_0112884

Authorities To Use Racketeering Law Against Florida Gang Members As Murder Rate Rises. The Palm Beach Post (1/5) reports federal agents "will step in to help prosecute local gang members under the nation's racketeering laws," according to Palm Beach County Sheriff Ric Bradshaw. Members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and probably the Drug Enforcement Administration will go after those responsible for a surge in murders, Bradshaw said. The nation's racketeering law, stronger than the state statute, allows investigators to charge gang leaders who orchestrate a killing even if they did not pull the trigger." Defense attorneys "have criticized use of those laws, however, saying that federal agents have used tenuous links and a wide dragnet to win convictions of low-level gang members who were not responsible for violent crimes."

Sessions May Get Democratic Backing For Drug Sentencing Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions "may find better luck under Democratic control with his bill to reduce the sentencing disparity between crack and powder cocaine." Democratic backers "want to eliminate the disparity altogether, arguing it discriminates against black defendants. But they face law-enforcement resistance, leaving Sessions's proposal as a potential compromise."

Colombia Extradites 2 To Face Drug-Smuggling Charges In US. There are more than 50 media references to Colombia's extradition of two men accused of helping to smuggle cocaine into the U.S. The AP (1/5) reports Colombia "has extradited to the United States a police officer and a former policeman charged with helping smuggle more than 2 tons of cocaine into the U.S. on cargo flights. Leonidas Molina Triana, a former major in the Colombia's national police, and Humberto Avila, a patrolman at Bogota's El Dorado airport, were arrested in April as part a joint probe by prosecutors in New York and law enforcement agencies in Colombia, the United States and Mexico. Four other current and former officers, as well as a commercial airline employee, are expected to be extradited soon, Erin McKenzie-Mulvey, a DEA spokeswoman in New York, told The Associated Press." Media outlets that used the AP story include the New York Times, Washington Post, Walls Street Journal, Los Angeles Times, Forbes, Newsday, the Houston Chronicle, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Fort Worth Star Telegram.

The Washington Times (1/5) reports DEA Special Agent in Charge John P. Gilbride "said Colombia's infamous Norte Valle drug cartel recruited Colombian police officials responsible for airport security and employees of Avianca Airlines to facilitate the smuggling of cocaine to the United States. … DEA spokesman Garrison K. Courtney said the extraditions are part of 'Operation Caso Dorado,' a joint investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's Office in New York, the DEA in Bogota and New York, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities. … The indictment also seeks the forfeiture of $50 million from the two men."

On its Web site, Voice of America (1/4) reports the indictment "alleges that Molina Triana was one of a number of corrupt officials who helped Colombia's Norte del Valle drug cartel recruit workers at Avianca Airlines, and police at El Dorado airport, to ship cocaine on commercial aircraft. … The United States, however, has assured Colombia it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from the South American country."

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Orders Deportation Of Wisconsin Man Accused Of Being Nazi Camp Guard. The AP (1/5) reports from Chicago, "An immigration judge ordered the deportation of an 81-year-old Wisconsin man accused of serving as a Nazi concentration camp guard, the Justice Department announced today." The AP continues, "Judge Jennie Giambastiani ordered Wednesday that Josias Kumpf be deported to Germany, Austria or Serbia. The department said Kumpf chose Germany, although it was unclear when he would be deported. … Kumpf's attorney, Peter Rogers of Pittsburgh, said his client would appeal the ruling within 30 days as required." The AP adds, "In July, the federal government asked the judge to deport Kumpf, who was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 2005 after a federal judge in Milwaukee concluded he had 'personally assisted' in the persecution of prisoners. … Kumpf served as an armed SS guard at Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp in Germany, an SS labor camp in Trawniki, Poland, and at construction sites in occupied France, the Justice Department said."

TAX:

DOJ Sues Illinois Couple Over Faulty Tax Returns. The Peoria (IL) Journal Star (1/5, Deshinsky) reports, "The Justice Department has brought a federal lawsuit against a Seneca (IL) couple accused of costing the U.S. Treasury more than $13 million in faulty income tax returns." The Star continues, "The suit, filed Dec. 29 in U.S. District Court in Chicago against Royanne and Neal Reddy, seeks to permanently bar them from preparing federal tax returns for others. Their companies are advertised as specializing in tax service for trucking and construction companies. … The Reddys own Royanne's Tax Service in Marseilles and Royanne and Company in Princeton. The couple has prepared more than 9,000 returns since 2002, according to a Justice Department news release." The Star adds, "The lawsuit alleges 70 of these returns, which were prepared by the Reddys or their employees, required adjustments and 64 returns contained improper deductions of as much as $30,000. The suit also says the savings from the under-reported returns averaged to about $2,775 per customer. … The Reddys are accused of fraudulently fabricating or inflating business expenses to reduce customers' incomes. They are also accused of fabricating income for some customers so they could receive earned income tax credits."

DOJ_NMG_0112885

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Take Control Of Congress In "Historic" Day. The AP (1/5, Espo) reports, "In a day of ceremony and historic change, Rep. Nancy Pelosi became the nation's first female House speaker on Thursday as Democrats eagerly took control of Congress for the final two years of President Bush's term. 'The Democrats are back,' rejoiced Pelosi, and she immediately set the rank-and-file to work passing tougher ethics rules." Media reports last night and this morning universally emphasize the "historic" nature of Pelosi's election. As McClatchy (1/5, Talev, Douglas) notes, Pelosi herself referred to the "historic moment for the Congress and for the women of this country" and "a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years." The AP (1/5, Werner) reports she also "marveled aloud at her long journey 'from the kitchen to the Congress.'"

In the midst of the "historic" House session, the Senate transfer of power is receiving much less attention. The AP (1/5) reports that "across the Capitol, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky took over as leader of minority Republicans, and said it was time to put an end to 'a culture of partisanship over principle.'" Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he was eager for cooperation, and he arranged for a rare closed-door meeting of all senators before the Senate convened to help set a more cordial tone." The Washington Times (1/5, Miller, 88K) quotes McConnell saying, "I stake my party to a pledge: when faced with an urgent issue, we will act; when faced with a problem, we will seek solutions, not mere political advantage." In his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (1/5, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank says Reid was bound to be overshadowed yesterday. Pelosi was the first woman to become speaker in American history. Reid was merely the 20th man to become Senate majority leader since the position was created 87 years ago. … Part of the disparity, however, was less about history than style. Pelosi scheduled four days of parties for her installation -- a festival Republicans dubbed the Pelosi-Palooza -- including an extravaganza featuring Tony Bennett, and a street naming for Pelosi in her native Baltimore."

Media coverage of the new Congress was generally very positive. The CBS Evening News (1/4, lead story, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Americans voted for a change in the last election and today we got it. … A CBS News poll out tonight finds 68% of Americans are optimistic about this new Congress. That includes 84% of the Democrats we polled but less than half of the Republicans." The New York Times (1/5, Leibovich, 1.16M) says this morning, "Against the sober backdrop of war and as Democrats ascended in both chambers, people of both parties spoke of how committed they were to working together and changing the political tone. … But maybe this time really will be different. Like 63-degree weather in January (and cherry blossoms out of season), Washington seemed to have flipped on its head, power-wise, karma-wise, at least for a few hours. There were children and flowers everywhere, and pictures of Vice President Dick Cheney and Senator Edward M. Kennedy mugging together."

But the Los Angeles Times (1/5, Simon, Havemann, 850K) says "there were signs of partisan tensions in the House even before Pelosi was elected speaker." She "pressed ahead with her agenda for the House's first 100 legislative hours -- over Republican grumbling that she planned House floor votes without the usual committee action first. … Next week, the House will begin voting on legislation that will need Senate consent and Bush's signature, including some highly controversial items. At the head of that list is a bill to expand embryonic stem cell research -- the subject of Bush's only veto in his six years in office."

In fact, says the Chicago Tribune (1/5, Zuckman, 617K) reports, "After convening, the House immediately adopted new rules Thursday tightening ethics guidelines by banning lobbyists from giving gifts, meals and tickets to members and their staffs. The rules would also prohibit lobbyists from paying for a lawmaker's travel or providing flights on corporate jets. The measure passed 235-195, largely along partisan lines."

On ABC World News (1/4, story 2, 1:40, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos noted House Democrats "are not banning fund-raising by lobbyists. This is an odd loophole. They can still host big, lavish parties at conventions. But this is a bipartisan conspiracy. Neither party right now wants to have campaign finance reform." And in his "Wonder Land" column, Daniel Henninger writes in the Wall Street Journal

DOJ_NMG_0112886

(1/5, 2.04M), "The biggest mistake you can make is thinking that the ethics package proposed by new Speaker Nancy Pelosi is mainly about 'cleaning up' politics. Maybe. But it's first of all about cleaning the clocks of the Republicans."

House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel, on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner), expressed hopes for lasting bipartisan collaboration: "I heard them today -- I heard Minority Leader Boehner, I've talked with Republicans on my committee. I really think that we believe that working together in a bipartisan way is good for our committees, it's good for the Congress, and I know it's good for the country. … I'm working with the leadership to see that we don't get caught doing the same thing that the Republicans did. All decisions have not been made, but I do believe that we should have an opportunity to have hearings on these issues within the 100 hours."

The Washington Post (1/6, A6, Eilperin, 690K) says Republicans "eschewed news conferences and raucous receptions yesterday and instead quietly conferred among themselves and observed the traditional Opening Day rites with their families and friends." But "GOP leaders signaled that they won't quietly fade into the background, and they pledged to promote innovative policies and stay true to conservative ideals -- a path that they hope will lead to victory in 2008. Although they will challenge Democrats on a broad range of domestic and foreign policy issues, they say they won't resort to guerrilla-style tactics or harsh rhetoric."

Outreach To Democrats Seen As Signaling "End Of An Era For Bush." The Los Angeles Times (1/5, Hook, 850K) says that "after Republicans' resounding defeat in the fall elections, Bush and his lieutenants are now paying attention to Democratic power brokers they had all but ignored for years." Reid is getting "red carpet treatment," Pelosi "got a Christmas Day phone call from Bush at home in San Francisco. New committee chairmen are enjoying quality face-time with Cabinet bigwigs. Even potential White House allies from the Democrats' conservative wing had been ignored for the past six years, but they now are being ushered into the Oval Office." Those "gestures and other bows to bipartisanship are signs that the swearing in of the new Congress is not just a fresh start for Democrats; it is the end of an era for Bush, who has had the luxury of governing for most of the last six years with his own party in charge of Congress."

Senate-House Differences, Ideological Divide Could Hinder Democratic Agenda. The Financial Times (1/5, Luce) reports Pelosi and Reid "both said that tackling the congressional 'culture of corruption' would be their chief priority during the next few days." Their proposals, "which are aimed at weakening the notorious links between lawmakers and so-called 'K Street' lobbyists that have ballooned in recent years, include a ban on accepting gifts or air tickets from lobby groups and forcing lawmakers to declare their names when they insert in legislation 'earmarks' that are sponsored by special interest groups." However, the New York Times (1/5, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) says that "in contrast" to the House plans, "the initial Senate ethics bill would ban only gifts or meals and not trips paid for by lobbyists or their employers. It would not restrict the use of corporate jets. It would require disclosure of the sponsors of only a small fraction of spending earmarks, excluding those added to supplementary material, called Congressional reports, that explain legislative intent or that are directed through federal agencies like the Defense Department. Nor does the Senate bill propose any independent enforcement." The Times adds, "Some senior Democratic aides said the House rules had upped the ante for the Senate."

The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports "it was clear yesterday that the Senate would have no choice but to take a more deliberative approach to the issues the House plans to bulldoze through. Senate leaders pledged bipartisanship, and in a chamber divided 51 to 49 , they will have no choice." Even in the House, "Democrats are already having trouble reconciling their promises even for the initial hundred-hour blitz. Senior House Democratic aides said a promise to cut student-loan interest rates in half will have to be phased in over five years to comply with a pledge to offset any additional deficit spending with equal spending cuts or tax hikes." The Post adds, "The loan pledge is proving just too expensive, and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and the committee's senior Republican, Charles E. Grassley (Iowa) introduced legislation yesterday to immediately repeal the alternative minimum tax, a proposal that would cost the Treasury hundreds of billions of dollars." In a similar story, the Wall Street Journal (1/5, Rogers, 2.04M) also says "Senate Democrats appear reluctant to be as bold as their House counterparts by trying to change rules unilaterally. Instead, the plan is to move with a hybrid package of rules and legislative changes."

Moreover, the New York Times (1/5, Broder, 1.16M) reports that "there were signs…of division among Democrats over how hard to push to undo the fruits of years of Republican rule. Many Democrats say those years moved the nation too far right, but others argue that the big tax cuts and regulatory relaxations are part of the permanent legislative framework that should be accepted." Analyzing that split, the New York Times (1/5, Hulse, 1.16M) also reports Democrats "must face reality." They "must reconcile diverse ideological factions within their ranks and make a fundamental choice. … In a meeting with the Congressional Black Caucus earlier in the day, Mrs. Pelosi made her own allusions to the competing tugs on Democrats, noting the party was rooted in its traditions but not hostage to the past."

In his Washington Post column (1/5), Eugene Robinson appears to embody that split, writing that he doesn't mean "to belittle the Democratic agenda, as far as it goes. But it tiptoes around the big, ugly monster of an issue sitting in the middle of the room -- the war in Iraq. The new Congress is going to have to stop temporizing and stand up to George W. Bush on the war. … Very soon, perhaps inconveniently soon, Democrats are going to have to take a stand."

DOJ_NMG_0112887

More Congressional Commentary On Democratic Agenda. Rep. Adam Putnam said on PBS' NewsHour (1/4, Warner) that Democrats have "rolled out an ambitious schedule for just next week alone to deal with minimum wage, student loans, prescription drugs, their whole agenda, with no committee hearings, no opportunities for half of the Congress to prepare amendments and offer their version. And my take on the election last November was that, as much as anything, the American people were saying, 'You guys need to get your act together and clean up the House, get rid of this bumper-crop of scandals. We want to know that every member of Congress has an equal say and equal opportunity to impact legislation.' And not only are they depriving Republicans of the opportunity to be heard, but they're depriving talented chairmen like Mr. Rangel of the opportunity to refine these packages."

Rep. Chaka Fattah said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/4, Matthews), "Oversight's going to be a very important part of the work of the 110th Congress. But we promised, first and foremost, over these first 100 hours, that we would raise the minimum wage, that we would make the availability of stem cells available for medical research, that we would lower the interest rate on college loans. So it's important that we keep our word, keep our promise. The Democratic Party now has the majority. And we also have the moral compass to understand that the country doesn't want to see a lot of partisan back and forth, but they do want answers."

Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on MSNBC (1/4, Gregory), "I think what we're seeing is that they wanted things done one way. And when we were in the majority and wanted to have more rights and more participation -- and under the Republican majority they were given wonderful consideration. … They were always given motions to recommit. They were given committee debate. They had their legislation going through committee. And now that they are taking control, the bipartisanship seems to have gone by the wayside."

NYTimes Calls Tying Minimum Wage To Tax Cuts "Idiocy." The New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "As the minimum wage moves to the top of the new Congress's agenda, some politicians -- mainly President Bush and Senate Republicans -- seem incapable of viewing the issue as anything other than a pretext for more tax cuts. This time the lucky recipients would be small-business owners, who the politicians contend will be unduly harmed by having to pay higher wages. So much for ringing in the new. … It's that sort of idiocy the new Congress was elected to stop."

Democrats End Day With "Glitzy Fundraiser." The Washington Post (1/5, C1, Montgomery, Du Lac, 690K) reports, "Despite the promised 'new direction for America,' getting the money out of politics and all of that, some facts of Washington life appear immutable and eternal." The Democrats ended their "history-making day" with Pelosi "presiding over a glitzy fundraiser open to anyone with $1,000 for a ticket. … Organizers expected 1,000 to 1,500 guests, with checks to be made out to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Many complimentary tickets were given out, and DCCC spokeswoman Jen Psaki could not immediately say how much money was raised. She said fundraisers are usually closed to the news media, but arrangements were made to allow reporters to hear Pelosi's remarks."

Pelosi's Ascension To Speakership Greeted With Excitement. The Washington Post (1/5, Layton, 690K), in a story titled "Women Bask in New Speaker's Shining Moment," says this morning "This was the visual they had dreamed about for years, for decades, for a lifetime. A woman standing on the wooden dais before the high-backed leather chair of the speaker of the House, the gavel in her hand, the American flag draped behind her." When Pelosi "made American history yesterday and was formally elected speaker, the raucous cheers that rang through the House chamber came from young girls in Mary Janes, working women in business suits, elderly ladies carrying canes and more than a few men."

TV coverage of Pelosi's ascension was extensive and also very positive. ABC World News (1/4, lead story, 3:45, Gibson, 8.78M) notes the "symbolic" picture of "the new Speaker…on the floor…holding her 6-year-old grandson," and "all the while, giving directions on how events were to proceed. It seemed the ultimate in multitasking -- taking care of the children and the country." NBC Nightly News (1/4, lead story, 2:45, Reid, 9.87M) said "on the floor of the House it was a day like no other -- children and grandchildren seemed to out number members of Congress." Democrats "were jubilant." NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 2, 2:25, Mitchell, 9.87M) later reported Pelosi's "arrival today had the excitement of a Presidential entrance," and added "women who fought for years to break down the barriers like, Pat Schroeder, returned to savor their victory." Rep. Loretta Sanchez was shown saying, "I think we were all in tears down on the House floor earlier as she was nominated and confirmed as our Speaker."

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 8, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) also said, "This was a big day for women, and not just Nancy Pelosi," and goes on to profile new Rep. Carol Shea Porter, a surprise winner in New Hampshire last November. The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 9, 0:45, Couric, 7.66M) added, "We can't let this historic day pass without mentioning

DOJ_NMG_0112888

Susan B. Anthony, who fought so hard for the right of women to vote but didn't live to see us get it."

House Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell said on MSNBC (1/4, Mitchell), "I think not only are the women pleased with these events, but, quite honestly, men like me are also quite delighted, because we are giving now another step toward real equality for all of our people." And Sen. Barbara Boxer said on MSNBC (1/4, Scarborough), "We shared some of the excitement of seeing our friend Nancy become the speaker. I served over there in the House for 10 years. Honestly, I thought I'd see a woman president before I saw a woman speaker, just because of the culture of the House."

The New York Times (1/5, Broder, 1.16M) says "even Republicans grudgingly acknowledged the unprecedented nature of the day on which a woman ascended to power on Capitol Hill by rising as one to applaud her." House Minority Whip Roy Blunt said on Fox News' Your World (1/4, Cavuto) said, "I think there is an appropriate attitude here today of recognizing the achievement Nancy Pelosi has made to become the first woman speaker. … The new majority whip, Jim Clyburn, is only the second African-American to hold that job. And this is a day for them that they have some right to celebrate."

And USA Today (1/5, Kiely, Schouten, 2.27M) notes "the 33 new or re-elected senators who took their oaths included seven women, bringing the total number of women in Congress' upper chamber to a record 16. There are a record 74 women in the House, including three non-voting delegates."

Waters Votes For Abzug, Steinem. The Washington Times (1/5, Hurt, 88K) notes Democratic Rep. Maxine Waters didn't vote for Pelosi for speaker. Instead, she "cast her vote in honor of feminist icons Bella Abzug and Gloria Steinem."

Bush, Pelosi Calls For Bipartisanship Seen As Insincere. In the Washington Post (1/5, A17, 690K), Greg Craig, a former Clinton White House aide, writes, "Forgive the cynicism, Mr. President, but if you were serious about cooperating and consulting with the new Congress, you wouldn't be parading your bipartisan bona fides through the op-ed pages of the Wall Street Journal. You wouldn't be holding news conferences in the Rose Garden telling the world how ready, willing and able you are -- we know you are not eager -- to work with the Democratic Congress. You would instead be meeting privately with Democratic leaders, identifying specific areas where progress can be made and joining with them to come up with a legislative agenda that is truly bipartisan." Craig adds, "To many of us, your post-November conversion to bipartisanship appears to be nothing but spin -- at least so far. You misunderestimate our capacity to remember the way you treated the Democrats when your party ran Congress. We will not soon forget your 'my way or the highway' approach. You will forgive us if we pay more attention to what you do than to what you say." Craig also criticizes Pelosi for not waiting "a decent interval before shoving legislation down the throats of the minority party. … Forgive me for being hard-boiled, but from my perspective inside the Beltway, it looks like 2007 is business as usual."

Webb Explains Snub Of Bush. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (1/4, Matthews) about his tense encounter with the President at a holiday party, Sen. Jim Webb said, "It's been a bit overblown, but I think when people are now seeing how John McCain is handling the situation with his son being in the Marine Corps, perhaps they can understand a little bit more what I was having to go through during the entire campaign. I greatly respect my son's service and all of the people who are serving. At the same time, I have not commented, even to many of my friends, about the operational side. That's personal to me, in terms of my feelings about it. And it was not a casual comment."

Democrats' Control Of Senate Means End For "Candy Desk" Supply. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A1, Lueck, 2.04M) reports in a front page story that with Democrats "back in control of Congress for the first time in years, much is changing in the nation's capital, including a longtime tradition in the U.S. Senate: the 'candy desk.'" Outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum "stocked the desk with donations from home-state candy makers including Hershey Co. and Just Born Inc., maker of Hot Tamales and Peanut Chews." The desk has "been turned over to Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican from Wyoming. But his state is better known for bison than bonbons -- and that's a big problem." Ethics rules "forbid members accepting gifts worth $100 or more a year from a single source. One exception covers items produced in a senator's home state -- so long as they're used primarily by people other than the senator or his staff. The provision was crafted to allow senators to offer visitors home-grown snacks, such as Florida orange juice or Georgia peanuts." Wyoming "doesn't have any big, brand-name candy makers who could step into the breach. As a result, the candy-industry lobbying group, which coordinates stocking the desk, is cutting off the sweets, citing Wyoming's candy deficit and ethics rules."

Miers Resigns White House Post. The AP (1/5, Riechmann) reports, "Harriet Miers, President Bush's failed Supreme Court nominee and longtime adviser, on Thursday submitted her resignation as White House counsel." White House press secretary Tony Snow "said the president reluctantly accepted her resignation, which takes effect Jan. 31. He said a search for a successor is under way. … Asked why she was leaving, Snow said: 'Basically, she has been here six years.'"

The Washington Post (1/5, A1, Baker, Smith, 690K), under the headline "Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up for Battle," says Bush is remaking "his legal team to prepare for what aides expect to be a sustained struggle with a new Democratic Congress eager to investigate various aspects of his administration." Miers "led an office that will oversee legal clashes that could erupt if Democrats aggressively use their new subpoena power. Bush advisers inside and outside the White House concluded that she is not equipped for such a battle and that the president needs someone who can strongly defend his prerogatives." The Post adds, "At the Justice Department, lawyers in the Office of Legal Counsel have been meeting with counterparts from other agencies to discuss potential points of conflict with Congress and to map out legal strategies for responding to demands for documents and testimony, according to several officials. The department has also held internal meetings on this topic in recent weeks with representatives from the FBI and from Justice's other major components, one official said."

DOJ_NMG_0112889

The New York Times (1/5, Rutenberg, 1.16M) notes Miers "started at the White House as staff secretary after the 2000 campaign and became a deputy chief of staff before moving to the White House counsel's office." Bush's "decision to nominate her to the Supreme Court in 2005 provoked the ire of liberals and conservatives, who criticized her as a Bush crony who did not have the legal intellectual credentials or résumé the job required. She withdrew her name from consideration but returned to Mr. Bush's inner circle and remained one of his closest advisers."

Before Resigning, Miers Joined Laura Bush, Others At Hughes Birthday Party. In its "The Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (1/5, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) relates, "Wednesday night's full moon brought all sorts of VIPs out on the town: Laura Bush, Condi Rice, Mary Matalin, Margaret Spellings and Harriet Miers at Cactus Cantina for a surprise birthday party for Karen Hughes. A dozen Bush administration power babes gathered at the Tex-Mex restaurant for fajitas, enchiladas, quesadillas, margaritas and chocolate cake with a 'classified' number of candles. (Hughes turned 50 on Dec. 27.) No word on how many hot chilies Miers ate, but she announced her resignation yesterday morning. Hmmmm."

Consumer Groups To Oppose Likely Bush CPSC Nominee. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that consumer groups are prepared "to assail rumored Bush candidate to head Consumer Product Safety Commission, National Association of Manufacturers lobbyist Michael Baroody." Rachel Weintraub of the Consumer Federation of America said, "It's sort of astonishing that the administration would pick someone from a regulated industry."

Health Issues May Prompt First Bush-Congress Conflict. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that health issues "may spark first big clash between Bush and new Congress." The House "votes next week on lifting federal stem-cell research limits, but proponents lack two-thirds needed to override another Bush veto. Senate backers claim the votes to do so, and most Republican 2008 presidential candidates back expanded research." Administration aides "and pharmaceutical lobbyists say Bush would veto as 'price controls' the House Democratic plan to require government negotiations with drug makers for lower Medicare costs. But the Senate may water down the legislation by merely permitting negotiations."

Democrats Urged To End "Subsidy" To Medicare HMOs. In his New York Times column (1/5), Paul Krugmam says, "Universal health care, much as we need it, won't happen until there's a change of management in the White House. In the meantime, however, Congress can take an important step toward making our health care system less wasteful, by fixing the Medicare Middleman Multiplication Act of 2003." The new Democratic majority "is poised to reduce drug prices by allowing — and, probably, requiring — Medicare to negotiate prices on behalf of the private drug plans. But it should go further, and force Medicare to offer direct drug coverage that competes on a financially fair basis with the private plans. And it should end the subsidy to Medicare Advantage, forcing H.M.O.'s to engage in fair competition with traditional Medicare."

Medicare Part D Signups Encounter Fewer Glitches This Year. USA Today (1/5, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Patient advocates and pharmacists are reporting fewer glitches as the Medicare drug benefit begins its second year, but they say problems could still crop up in the coming weeks." While "confusion was widespread" last year when the program was implemented, this year, Mike James, a Raleigh, NC pharmacist, said "We're seeing similar problems as we saw in January '06, but they're not as prolific." However, USA Today adds, "Because many of the insurers have made changes to their policies since last year, new concerns could crop up in the coming weeks."

Ellison Sworn In With Jefferson's Quran. USA Today (1/5, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "On the same day Nancy Pelosi became the first female speaker of the House, freshman Rep. Keith Ellison got almost as much attention." Ellison, "the first Muslim elected to Congress, used a Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson rather than a Bible as he re-enacted his swearing-in with Pelosi." USA Today adds, "The scene created a human traffic jam near the House floor. About 30 members of Ellison's extended family posed before about two dozen TV cameras, including one from the Arab network Al-Arabiya."

The AP (1/5, Frommer) reports "the Quran was acquired in 1815 as part of a more than 6,400-volume collection that Jefferson sold for $24,000 to replace the congressional library that had been burned by British troops the year before, in the War of 1812." McClatchy (1/5) and the Washington Times (1/6, DeBose, 88K) run similar reports.

DOJ_NMG_0112890

Bodman Fires Nuclear Weapons Chief Over Security Failures. The New York Times (1/5, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "The Energy Secretary fired the head of the department's nuclear weapons program on Thursday, citing a series of security failures at national laboratories, including the discovery of a computer device containing thousands of classified documents in the home of a former worker during a drug raid by the police. The official who was dismissed, Linton F. Brooks, had been administrator of the National Nuclear Security Agency since May 2003. The Times adds, "The agency was established in 2000 because of chronic security problems in the weapons program. The problems continued during Mr. Brooks's service. On Wednesday, the latest in a string of reports by [DOE's] inspector general criticizing the agency, dated Nov. 27, 2006, was released." Secretary Bodman "said in a statement on Thursday that lax security 'can have serious implications for the security of the United States.' Under Mr. Brooks, the agency "has done its best to address these concerns,' Mr. Bodman said. But he added, 'I do not believe that progress in correcting these issues has been adequate.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 2, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "On another matter, Sharyl's been leading the way for months in exposing security breaches at the nation's nuclear weapons facilities, things like missing or mishandled classified documents. Well today, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman fired the man in charge, Linton Brooks. Bodman said Brooks had not corrected the security problems and it's time for new leadership at the National Nuclear Security Administration."

The Washington Post (1/5, A7, Mufson, 690K) says, "The dismissal comes after embarrassing security lapses, including the Oct. 17 discovery of drug paraphernalia and computer flash drives containing highly classified information in the trailer home of a contractor." While "Bodman refused to elaborate on his statement, the removal of Brooks also comes as Democrats, determined to hold oversight hearings on the nuclear laboratories' security problems, take control of Congress."

The Los Angeles Times (2/5, Vartabedian, 850K) reports Bodman "issued an unusual public statement Thursday saying he had asked for the resignation." As problems mounted, members of Congress "began to question the agency's performance, particularly multibillion-dollar cost overruns and technical setbacks on new weapons research facilities." The "tough handling of Brooks appeared intended to make a strong statement, particularly coming on the first day of Democratic control of House and Senate committees that have oversight of the nuclear weapons complex."

The AP (1/5, Hebert) adds, "Widely respected for his knowledge of nuclear weapons and nonproliferation issues, Brooks nevertheless has been a target of some members of Congress."

New Year Sparks Wave Of Federal Worker Retirements. The Washington Post's (1/5, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The start of the new year is when the village elders say their farewells across the government. Agencies lose valued, experienced hands; the retirees take on new pursuits." The Post adds, "Many federal employees retire around the turn of the year because provisions in federal retirement and leave laws make it advantageous," since "most senior employees are covered by the older of two retirement systems that permits them to receive a pension payment in February if they leave the federal payroll in early January. Many also retire at this time of the year because it seems the best time to make a break and step aside." Since most "agencies slow down for the holidays," that "seems to make it easier to say goodbyes and find the time to sort through files and pack boxes."

Democrats Urged To Make Tough Decisions To Restore Fiscal "Sanity." In his Washington Post column (1/5, A17), David Ignatius says, "A good way for the Democrats to start the new congressional season is to examine just how it happened that the federal government moved from budget surplus to deficit during the Bush presidency. If Democrats can be clear about what went wrong, then maybe (maybe) they can begin to fix it." An "honest budget discussion should start with an admission that the projected surpluses of the post-Clinton years were largely illusory -- in the sense that they were predicated on overly upbeat assumptions about the economy." But the Bush Administration "and the GOP Congress made a bad situation much worse -- by enacting tax and spending programs that shredded any semblance of fiscal responsibility." The Democrats "face the essential political decision as they take their seats: Do they want to make people happy by postponing tough decisions or do they want to get serious about restoring fiscal sanity? Are they the party of good times or good governance?"

NYTimes Says Congress Should Raise Federal Judges' Pay. The New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. is embracing with gusto a cause championed by his predecessor, William Rehnquist: the need for a substantial pay raise for federal judges. Justice Roberts devoted his second annual year-end report to this issue, and it should be required reading in Congress." Roberts is "right to note the link between maintaining an adequate standard of judicial compensation and preserving the quality and independence of the judiciary, and to prod Congress on this issue." The nation "would be well-served by a comprehensive bipartisan package that grants federal judges a sizable raise, ends the linkage between judicial and Congressional salaries, and requires judges to forgo privately financed junkets that cast an ethical cloud on the courts."

DOJ_NMG_0112891

WSJournal Says Pelosi "Paygo" Is Tax Trap. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Congressional Democrats are dashing out of the gates to establish their fiscal conservative credentials. And as early as today House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will push through so-called 'pay-as-you-go' budget rules for Congress. Keep an eye on your wallet." "Paygo," "as Washington insiders call it, sounds like a fiscally prudent budget practice: If government spends more on program A, it has to spend less money on program B, and thus budget deficits will be restrained. We're all for that. But when Republicans proposed exactly that budget rule in recent years, House Democrats voted it down." Under Pelosi's "paygo plan, new entitlement programs and all new tax cuts would have to be offset by either cutbacks in other entitlement programs or tax increases. This version of paygo is a budget trapdoor, designed not to control expenditures but to make it easier to raise taxes while blocking future tax cuts."

OTHER NEWS:

Oil Prices Fall To Lowest Level Since 2005. USA Today (1/5, 1B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "Crude oil prices fell Thursday to the lowest level since mid-2005, pressured by warm weather, faltering demand and government data showing inventories at healthy levels. ... Crude oil for February delivery closed at $55.59 a barrel in New York trading, a 4.7% drop. That followed a 4.5% decline on Wednesday." USA Today adds, "Whether the lower prices will have staying power, helping consumers, is unclear. NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 7, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The big turnaround in stocks had something to do with the price of oil which has been plummeting in the first trading days of this New Year."

Fall In Commodity Prices Depresses Some Stocks. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A3, Bahree, Glader, Davis, 2.04M) reports, "Energy and copper prices continued their tumble yesterday, punishing shares of companies from oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp. to mining magnate Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc." The Journal adds, "There is no one factor behind the sharp declines in some key commodities. Warm winter weather has depressed oil prices, more than offsetting recent production cutbacks by OPEC." Whether "commodity prices continue to slide long term will depend in no small part on the world economy." If it "shows resilience, commodity prices are likely to rebound."

Friedman Calls On Bush To Complete Ford's Vision For Energy Independence. In his New York Times (1/5, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman suggests passage of a "Gerald Ford Energy Independence Act." The "greatest thing George Bush could do — for President Ford's legacy and his own — would be to dedicate his coming State of the Union address to completing the energy independence agenda that Mr. Ford initiated 32 years ago in the wake of the 1973 Arab oil embargo and energy shock." Completing Ford's vision "means asking Americans to do some hard things: accepting a gasoline or carbon tax; inducing Detroit to make more fuel-efficient cars, trucks and plug-in hybrids; setting a national requirement for utilities to provide 20 percent of their electricity from renewable wind, solar, hydro or nuclear power by 2015; and, finally, making large-scale investments in mass transit." Friedman adds, "It is stunning that since 9/11 the Bush team has never mounted a campaign to get Americans to conserve energy."

Proliferation Of Ethanol Plants Raises Concerns About Corn Supply For Food. The New York Times (1/5, Barrionuevo, 1.16M) reports, "Renewing concerns about whether there will be enough corn to support the demand for both fuel and food, a new study has found that ethanol plants could use as much as half of America's corn crop next year." The Times adds, "Dozens of new ethanol plants are being built by farmers and investors in a furious gold rush, spurred by a call last year from the Bush administration and politicians from farm states to produce more renewable fuels to curb America's reliance on oil. But the new study by the Earth Policy Institute, an environmental group, found that the number of ethanol plants coming on line has been underreported by more than 25 percent by both the Agriculture Department and the Renewable Fuels Association, the ethanol industry's main lobbying group."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Clayton, 59K) adds, "Ethanol production could pull so much corn out of the food supply by 2008 that US corn exports could plummet." And the "food-fuel competition could push corn prices so high that some ethanol producers in the fledgling industry, which many deem vital to US energy security, would merely break even - or, if corn gets pricey enough, actually lose money."

Service Sector Report Suggests US Economy Is Slowing. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, Derby, Bater, 2.04M) reports the "latest readings on the service sector and labor market suggested that the U.S. economy softened a bit in December." The Institute for Supply Management said "its nonmanufacturing index, which surveys mostly service-related companies, slipped to 57.1 last month from 58.9 in November but was unchanged from the October reading." Economists had "looked for December's performance to be slightly stronger. The service sector is the single largest source of U.S. economic output." Despite a "gradual cooling, survey respondents remained upbeat about the service sector: 'Members' comments in December are generally positive concerning current business conditions,' said Anthony Nieves, who compiles the report."

DOJ_NMG_0112892

Retailers Still Predict 5% Increase In Holiday Sales. USA Today (1/5, 5B, O'Donnell, 2.27M) reports, "Despite a somewhat gloomy picture, the National Retail Federation continues to predict that holiday season sales will be up 5% for 2006, thanks in large part to a strong November. The federation will release its final numbers next Friday." Experts also "caution that because gift cards are counted toward sales when they are redeemed, January could help retailers make up for lost sales earlier in the holiday season."

The CBS Evening News (1/4, story 4, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With temperatures above normal, people are not buying new coats. In fact, coat sales this season are predicted to be down 12%. That's about the last thing retailers want to hear coming off a bad December." CBS (Mason) added, "Retailers need" a good January "after a disappointing December. The Gap had a horrible holiday season. Sales plunged 8%." The Gap "wasn't alone, Ann Taylor sales fell more than 5%. Even mammoth Wal-Mart which accounts for 10% of retail traffic was up less than 1% for the holiday, its worst sales growth in a decade. But luxury retailers wrapped up a different package."

Holiday Retail Sales Less Indicative Of Economy's Health. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, Covert, 2.04M) reports, "Holiday retail sales, once considered a barometer of the health of the economy, are no longer a crystal ball." The same-store sales figures "dozens of retailers reported yesterday don't reflect two big shifts in the way consumers shop these days," because gift cards "aren't logged as sales until they are redeemed" and online sales "aren't included in the widely watched numbers." Overall, retailers "reported a 3.1% increase in December in sales at stores open at least a year, according to an index of 55 chains compiled by the International Council of Shopping Centers. That fell short of the 3.5% gain recorded a year earlier as well as the 3.6% increase in same-store sales the chains logged for the year as a whole." But "redemptions of gift cards could give retailers a lift in January, when roughly half of gift cards are typically used, often to buy full-price merchandise." The National Retail Federation "estimates that gift-card sales this holiday season totaled nearly $25 billion, up 34% from a year earlier and accounting for nearly a fifth of holiday gift spending."

Stocks Post Gains After Investor Jitters Sent Markets Down. NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 6, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to Wall Street here in New York where the stock market had another wild ride today. It plunged at the open and finished up at the end. The Dow gained just over six points [to close at 12,480.69]. NASDAQ was up more than 30 points [to close at 2,453.43] on the day."

USA Today/AP (1/5, 6B, Bruno) reports Wall Street "struggled but ultimately closed higher Thursday as a bounce in technology stocks and sharply lower oil prices helped investors brush off concerns about sluggish consumer spending." Retailers' "lackluster holiday sales reports initially sent major stock indexes significantly lower. Stocks climbed back after a drop in crude oil prices to below $56 a barrel raised hopes that cheaper gasoline might be on the way." In addition to the Dow and Nasdaq, "the Standard & Poor's 500 index edged up 1.74 points to 1418.34."

30-Year Rates Hold Steady. The AP (1/5, Singer) reports, "Mortgage giant Freddie Mac reported Thursday that 30-year, fixed-rate mortgages averaged 6.18 percent this week, the same as last week." Analysts "said the markets in recent days have gotten some confusing messages about how serious the current economic slowdown will be. 'Currently, the market is waiting for a clearer signal on the direction in which the economy is headed,' said Frank Nothaft, Freddie Mac's chief economist." The Freddie Mac survey "showed that other types of mortgage rates were mixed this week. Rates on 15-year, fixed-rate mortgages, a popular choice for refinancing, edged up slightly to 5.94 percent, compared to 5.93 percent last week."

Pending Real Estate Sales Index Drops. Bloomberg (1/5, Torres) reports that pending sales of existing homes "fell 0.5 percent, a third consecutive decline, to 107 from 107.5 in October, the National Association of Realtors said today in Washington." NAR's chief economist, David Lereah, said, "The index is pointing toward fairly stable home sales in the near future. ... This is another indication that home sales likely bottomed out in September." Economists "expected the index to rise 0.7 percent in November, according to the median of 17 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey, after a decline of 1.7 percent the month before. Estimates ranged from a drop of 1 percent to an increase of 2.1 percent."

Kansas High Court Mulls Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors. USA Today (1/5, 3A, Biskupic) reports, "A case before the Kansas Supreme Court has become a key test of the rights of sperm donors who want to be involved with their offspring over the objection of the children's mothers." USA continues, "The dispute, which has drawn national attention, involves a single woman, identified in court papers only as S.H., who gave birth to twins in May 2005 after being inseminated with the sperm of a friend, identified as D.H. … After the mother made it clear that she did not intend to share parenting, D.H. sued to establish paternity. He lost in a trial court because of a Kansas law that says the donor of sperm provided for artificial insemination is not the legal father of the child unless the donor and mother agree to it in writing." USA adds, "The major question in the case is whether requiring such written agreements in cases involving sperm donors known to the mother, not anonymous donors from sperm banks, violates the donor's constitutional rights as a parent. Like Kansas, many states have legal hurdles for donors seeking parental status. … The case arises at a time of increasing advances in reproductive technology. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the numbers of women being impregnated with eggs fertilized outside the womb is significantly on the rise. There are no reliable statistics on methods of conception with donated sperm."

DOJ_NMG_0112893

First African-American Sworn In As Massachusetts Governor. The AP (1/5, Johnson) reports, "Deval Laurdine Patrick was sworn in Thursday as the 71st governor of Massachusetts, the culmination of a longshot political campaign that also saw him become the state's first black chief executive and only the second elected in the nation." NBC Nightly News (1/4, story 4, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) noted Patrick is "only the second black elected governor in history," and that in his swearing-in ceremony, "he laid his hand on the bible that was originally given to President John Quincy Adams by the slaves of the slave ship 'Amistad.'"

The New York Times (1/5, Belluck, 1.16M) says Patrick "takes over from Mitt Romney, a Republican, who is planning to run for the presidency, and already Mr. Patrick has revealed many positions that oppose Mr. Romney's. The former governor did not attend the inauguration. Mr. Patrick has said that he will restore $383.6 million in budget cuts made by Mr. Romney to social services and other programs, that he will reverse the former governor's agreement authorizing the state police to arrest illegal immigrants, and that a Romney-endorsed effort to remove some Massachusetts Turnpike tolls is unrealistic." Patrick also "said he might revoke some of the 200 11th-hour appointments Mr. Romney made to boards and commissions." Patrick also has expressed his opposition to "a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage."

Romney Could Emerge As Nominee "If McCain Self-Destructs." The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Feldmann, 59K) reports that "despite prospects that don't look particularly strong on paper, analysts say" that ex-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) could win the GOP presidential nomination in '08. Although most polls in key early nominating contests show Romney trailing Arizona Sen. John McCain (R), ex-New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) and ex-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R), "the Republican field is fluid. Religious conservatives…remain skeptical of Senator McCain. And his advocacy for a stepped-up US presence in Iraq has thrown his political future squarely in line with a war that few believe is going well." Giuliani "remains untested on the national political stage and holds liberal positions on social issues that put him at odds with many GOP primary voters (as well as a colorful personal life)." And Gingrich's "short tenure as speaker and his three marriages could cause him to wilt under the klieg lights." Though Romney's evolving stances on several key social issues, along with his Mormon faith, could pose hurdles for him, "political analysts can see a clear path by which Romney becomes the GOP nominee, almost by default. Republicans 'want to win in November [2008],' says Ed Sarpolus, an independent pollster in Michigan who dismisses Gingrich's and Giuliani's chances. 'If McCain self-destructs because of Iraq, even in New Hampshire they'll hold their nose and vote for Mitt Romney.'"

McCain Profanely Questioned Usefulness Of Border Wall. The Washington Times (1/4, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The February issue of Vanity Fair features a profile of Sen. John McCain, in which the Arizona Republican used profanity to call into question the usefulness of a border fence in preventing illegal immigration." Vanity Fair "quotes Mr. McCain -- a leading contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- violating the Third Commandment when asked, during an October appearance before a group of businessmen in Milwaukee about immigration." McCain said, "In the short term, it probably galvanizes our base. In the long term, if you alienate the Hispanics, you'll pay a heavy price. By the way, I think the fence is least effective. But I'll build the [profanity] fence if they want it."

McCain Quizzed On Stolen Giuliani Campaign Playbook. On MSNBC (1/4), Brian Williams said to Sen. John McCain, "This missing briefcase from the Giuliani start-up presidential campaign -- Senator, can you look me in the eye, via the camera, and say that you had no prior knowledge this was missing until you read about it in the papers and that you've since not learned that, say, anyone connected to you has anything to do with it?" McCain: "I haven't learned anything about it, Brian. I know nothing about it." On MSNBC's Imus In The Morning (1/4), Don Imus also raised the question, asking McCain, "Did you steal Giuliani's playbook?" McCain: "No." Imus: "Yes you did." McCain: "No, I did not. I certainly was not anywhere in the area."

Edwards Shuns Bill Clinton's Approach To Run To Left Of Clinton. Perry Bacon Jr. writes in TIME's website (1/15) that when ex-North Carolina Sen. John

DOJ_NMG_0112894

Edwards (D) ran for president in 2004, he "spoke eloquently of the 'Two Americas.'" But "Edwards backed ideas that originated in the centrist group that created much of Bill Clinton's agenda, the Democratic Leadership Council. Not this time." In announcing his bid, Edwards "boldly declared that reducing the deficit, a hallmark of the Clinton Administration, was less important to him than spending government money on" such things as "creating a universal health-care system and stopping global warming. His call to end poverty in the U.S. over the next 30 years by spending more than $15 billion each year" is "the kind of Big Government liberalism Clinton shunned." Bacon notes, however, that if New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) enters the race, she could pick "up much of the money and endorsements from the party establishment. The remaining energy, activism and cash that any rival would need to challenge her are on the left, not the center." Which is "why Edwards has spent the past two years actively courting the liberal netroots…and wooing top union bosses." Bacon says that Sen. Clinton and potential presidential hopeful, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "act like front runners: cautiously," which "leaves room to emerge as the candidate who connects with Democratic voters by saying bold things that appeal to liberals, as when Edwards wrote 'I was wrong' in voting for the Iraq war in an Op-Ed in the Washington Post in the fall of 2005."

Michelman To Back Edwards. The Wall Street Journal (1/5, A7, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column Sen. John Edwards is "reaches for feminists' backing while Clinton and Obama ponder options." Abortion-rights activist Kate Michelman is "expected to endorse the former North Carolina senator, who seeks fast new year's start." Aides "expect Clinton to signal her candidacy this month," but "some Democratic operatives question dearth of black campaign professionals on her team as Obama becomes top potential rival."

Bill Clinton Defers Questions On Wife's Ambitions. The AP (1/5, Jalonick) reports, "The Clinton who turned heads in the Senate Thursday was not Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, notwithstanding all the speculation about her running for president." Former President Clinton "cheerfully called out, 'Hi, everybody!' as he strolled through the Senate Press Gallery past correspondents for The Associated Press, The Washington Post and the Wall Street Journal." Clinton was "headed for the men's room - followed by his Secret Service agents and a cadre of reporters. The questions were obvious: 'Do you want to live in the White House again?" Clinton said, "I would like not to talk about it today." Asked if Mrs. Clinton was "going to run for president," the President said, "Ask her. … All I know is, this is a happy day. It's a great day for the largest number of women we've ever had in the Congress, a lot of new people coming in, I think it will be good. I'll be surprised if we don't see a lot of interesting, bipartisan things happening over the next six months."

Two Republicans Team Up In Effort To Oust GOP Texas House Speaker. The Washington Times (1/5, Aynesworth, 88K) reports, "Two conservative Republicans from the Dallas area joined forces yesterday in a move to oust" Texas House Speaker Tom Craddick (R). However, Craddick "said he still had enough votes to win re-election to the post on Tuesday. Rep. Brian McCall of Plano stunned his supporters yesterday by endorsing fellow Republican Rep. Jim Pitts of Waxahachie at a press conference in Austin. In their brief appearance, the two challengers vowed Mr. Pitts would win the speakership, but they refused to list their backers," saying "they did not want to expose the supporters to intense pressure before the vote. 'But I guarantee you,' Mr. Pitts said, 'the race is over.'" McCall, "backed by many Democrats, was publicly criticized for having so many opposition-party supporters, which some Craddick allies cited as a strong reason to re-elect the speaker. The Democrats trail the Republicans by an 80-69 margin in the Texas House."

WPost Backs Kaine's Transportation Proposal. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/5, A16, 690K) says Republicans in the Virginia House of Delegates, "many of whom have signed no-new-taxes pledges," have no "serious, long-term plan to pay for the billions of dollars in transportation improvements needed around the state. By contrast, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) proposed a package yesterday that meets the state's transportation problem head-on. It would, for starters, broaden the powers of localities to reject development proposals and slow growth if local roads are too crowded. And it would yield $5.25 billion in new revenue over the next six years -- the first fresh funding for the state's beleaguered roads in a generation."

Rice Announces $16 Million In Aid For Somalia. The AP (1/5) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Thursday the US "will provide $16 million in aid to Somalia and said the installation of a new government there gives Somalis a chance to move beyond two decades of chaos." Rice said the US is making $11.5 million in food aid available for the country, $1.5 million in nonfood assistance and $3.5 million to help refugees. In a statement, Rice said creation of a UN-backed government represents a "historic opportunity" for Somalis to end their recent spate of "warlordism, extreme violence and humanitarian suffering." She has also "dispatched her top aide for African affairs, Jendayi Frazer, to the region for discussions on promoting a peacekeeping force for Somalia and to urge a political dialogue leading to national reconciliation." Frazer held talks with Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni and Ethiopian president Meles Zenawi, and "will meet with diplomats from Europe, Africa and international organizations to coordinate future steps in Somalia," State Dept. spokesman Sean McCormack said.

DOJ_NMG_0112895

The Washington Post/AP (1/5, A10) also notes the announcement briefly in an article about Somali and Ethiopian troops battling "600 Islamic militiamen Thursday" in the southern region of the country.

US Military Continues To Support Battle Against Islamic Militants. The Financial Times (1/5, Fidler, Wallis) reports a US-led naval task force off the Somali coast "has been boarding ships in recent days as part of efforts to prevent Islamist militants fleeing the country." The task force is "taking part in a broader US military effort to stop Islamist fighters in Somalia moving into neighbouring countries following a rout by Ethiopian forces." Kenya has officially closed its border with Somalia on in an effort to stem the transit of militants, officials said. Secretary Rice "hailed the military victory as a 'historic opportunity' for the war-ravaged country." Meanwhile, Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni said Thursday at a joint news conference in Addis Ababa with Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi that Uganda "is ready to provide peacekeepers for the force." Assistant Secretary Frazer "said Mr Museveni had promised to provide between 1,000 and 2,000 soldiers," and said she "hoped a peacekeeping force could be ready by the end of the month."

The Washington Times (1/5, A1, Pflanz, 88K) reports on its front page that as the US continues diplomatic and military efforts in Somalia, "a reported audio tape message by al Qaeda's No. 2 leader surfaced today, urging Somali Islamists to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla campaign of suicide and other forms of attacks against Ethiopian forces in Somalia."

The New York Times (1/5, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports that "just days after Ethiopian-led troops helped rout once powerful Islamist forces in Somalia and install a new government in the capital, security seemed to be unraveling across the country" as violence "is surging on two fronts: antigovernment attacks and increased banditry, both of which were virtually unheard of during the Islamists' short-lived reign." Similarly, the Washington Post (1/5, A10, McCrummen, 690K) reports that "since the Islamic movement was swept from power last week, men draped with AK-47s have appeared once again along the sandy lanes" in Mogadishu, "and with them a feeling of menace."

WPost Says Crisis Gives US Chance To Battle Terrorists In Africa. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/5, A16, 690K) says, "An unexpected turn of events in Somalia has given the Bush administration a rare opportunity to help stabilize a failed state that has been a harbor and breeding ground for al-Qaeda." Although, "frequently slow or stumbling in its response to developments in Somalia, the administration appears to recognize the chance for an advance in the global war with al-Qaeda: Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi E. Frazer…was in Ethiopia yesterday and is expected to chair an international contact group meeting today in Nairobi. … But the Bush administration, which by yesterday had not made any specific commitment to the mission, needs to be ready to quickly provide funding and logistical backing for an African force. If NATO airlift and supply assets can be mobilized, they should be. It may be that the prospect of stabilizing Somalia and eliminating it as a harbor for al-Qaeda will prove to be a mirage, but the administration must seize on the possibility that it is real."

Pentagon Expanding Role In Africa. The Christian Science Monitor (1/5, Whittle, 59K) reports Africa "has generally taken a backseat in Pentagon planning - but US officials say that is about to change," noting that "one of Donald Rumsfeld's last acts before Robert Gates replaced him last month as Defense secretary was to urge President Bush to let the Pentagon create a new Africa Command to pay more attention to the troubled continent." Mr. Bush is "said to have agreed to the idea and is expected announce it early this year." The creation of the new command will "be more than an exercise in shuffling bureaucratic boxes, experts say. The US government's motives include countering Al Qaeda's known presence in Africa, safeguarding future oil supplies, and competing with China, which has been courting African governments in its own quest for petroleum, they suggest."

No Breakthrough Reported At Mubarak-Olmert Talks. The AP (1/5, Nasrawi, Weizman) reports a summit between Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Thursday "fell short of its goal of igniting a new round of Mideast peace efforts, highlighting the significant disagreements between Israel and its Arab neighbors." Speaking at a news conference after the meeting, Mubarak "pushed Israel to hold talks with Syria and pursue peace with the Palestinians, despite the rise of the Islamic militant group Hamas." For his part, Olmert "thanked Mubarak for his efforts" to secure the release of a captured Israeli soldier, and said Israel was "ready to meet with Abbas. However, he rejected having any dealings with Hamas."

Under the headline "Israeli Raid Overshadows Olmert's Talks With Mubarak," the New York Times (1/5, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) says the meeting "was overshadowed by an Israeli raid in the West Bank in which four Palestinians were killed and 20 wounded." Mubarak was "clearly embarrassed by the timing of the raid, hours before the meeting," and "called it a hindrance to peace efforts." The Washington Post (1/5, A11, Wilson, 690K) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas issued a statement hours after the attack, saying it showed that "Israeli calls for peace and security are fake" and that "continued aggression will only lead to the destruction of all efforts aimed at realizing peace."

DOJ_NMG_0112896

Fighting Between Palestinian Factions Continues In Gaza. The AP (1/5, Laub) reports factional fighting among Palestinian groups Thursday "surged, leaving at least six dead and prompting a meeting early Friday between" Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh. ABC World News (1/4, story 6, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) said Thursday's violence in Gaza represented "an escalation between the rival Palestinian factions."

Treasury Department Increases Pressure On Syria. The AP (1/5, Aversa) reports the US Treasury Department, "intensifying pressure on Damascus, moved Thursday to financially clamp down on three Syrian institutions suspected of helping spread weapons of mass destruction." The department's action "means that any bank accounts or financial assets belonging to the three entities found in the United States would be frozen. Americans also are prohibited from doing business with them." The three entities targeted are the Higher Institute of Applied Science and Technology, the Electronics Institute and the National Standards and Calibration Laboratory.

Bush, Merkel Promise Cooperation On Global Warming. The AP (1/5, Feller) reports, "President Bush and German Chancellor Angela Merkel pledged closer cooperation on combating global warming and in trying to prod a Middle East peace on Thursday, brushing aside lingering differences between the two countries." Bush said "that he was open to new ideas to confront climate change, although he stopped short of some of the tight environmental standards favored by Germany and other European nations. 'We talked about climate change, and I assured the chancellor I'm committed to promoting new technologies that will promote energy efficiency and do a better job protecting the environment,' Bush said. 'I believe there is a chance now to put behind us the old stale debates of the past.'" Merkel said, "I was delighted to hear that there is a readiness there."

Bush Makes Light Of Massage "Gaffe." The AP (1/5) reports President Bush "has adopted a hands-off policy with German Chancellor Angela Merkel." Meeting with reporters, Bush joked, "No back rubs" as he posed for pictures with Merkel at the White House, "making light of his own gaffe" at a summit of G-8 when "he gave an impromptu rub of Merkel's neck and shoulders."

Richardson To Lead Diplomatic Mission To Sudan. The AP (1/5) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said Thursday he is "heading to Sudan on a diplomatic trip that would add to his extensive international experience as he prepares to announce whether he will run for president." Richardson will "try to meet with Sudanese officials and persuade them to accept a peacekeeping force in the war-torn Darfur region," according to a statement from his office. He is to arrive Sunday after traveling overnight and plans to travel to Darfur.

Spanish Police Discover Bomb In Basque Region. The Washington Post/AP (1/5, A14, Roman) reports Spanish police found "a large explosive device in the Basque region Thursday, five days after a car bombing in Madrid that was blamed on the separatist group ETA shattered a nine-month cease-fire." Meanwhile, Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero "said Saturday's attack made him more determined to end ETA's nearly four-decade-long campaign of violence," but he announced "no new strategy or even a hint of his next move."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Reaches Out To Skeptical Democrats."
"Thinking Outside The Box."
"Gov. Tops Party Cast With A Real Character."
"U.S.-Iraqi Forces Launch Assault On Sunni Haven."
"Naming New Generals A Key Step In Shift On Iraq."
"Tijuana Police Abandon Posts."

USA Today:
"Football-Crazy Ohio State Does All Sports In Big Way."
"Bush To Shuffle His War Advisers."
"The Party's Over."
"Adults Penalized For Teen Drinking."

New York Times:
"Jubilant Democrats Assume Control On Capitol Hill."
"Speculation Surrounds Choice By Spy Chief To Take Step Back."
"Bush To Name A New General To Oversee Iraq."
"Along A Newark Street, Signs Of Urban Renewal."
"A Terror Detainee Longs For Court."
"Remain silent? Some in custody Spell It All Out."

Washington Post:
"Democrats Take Control on Hill."
"Bush Making Changes in His Iraq Team."
"Fenty Details Proposal To Take Over Schools."
"A Revitalized Chesapeake May Be Decades Away."
"Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up for Battle."
"Kaine Again Floats Tax Hike for Traffic Ills."
"Sedative Withdrawal Made Rehnquist Delusional in '81."

DOJ_NMG_0112897

Washington Times:
"Joyful Democrats Salute Speaker Pelosi."
"Medical Teams Saving More Troops."
"Fenty Plan To Control Schools Irks Bobb."
"US Ships Hunt For al Qaeda Off Somalia."
"Street Cars Return To D.C."

Detroit Free Press:
"Inside Cheli's Bloody Horror."
"El Nino Tames Winter."
"First Female Gets The Gavel."
"Hot Event Could Suggest GM Stands For Glamorous Models."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Historic Power Shift And Swiftly To Action."
"CEO's Get Big Bucks If They Fail."
"Fulton Jail Falls Short In Support To Federal Judge."
"Prostitution Bust Made Behind Sugarloaf Gates."

Houston Chronicle:
"Democrats AIM To Cut Breaks For Oil Industry."
"She Was Driven To Protect Them."
"Pitts Offering A Relaxing Change."
"Second Hip Surgery For Elder Bush A Success."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New Democratic Congress; New Democratic Congress-Analysis; Diplomatic Team Changes; North Korean Nuclear Testing; Fatah Hamas Conflict; New Democratic Member's Interview; Searching Mail; Diet Pills; Space Junk; Freedom Riders.
CBS: New Democratic Congress; New Administration Changes; Strange Weather; Retail Sales; Space Junk; Diet Pills; Stroke Recovery; Long Shot Congresswoman; Susan B. Anthony Remembered.
NBC: New Democratic Congress; New House Speaker; New Democratic Congress-Analysis; New Massachusetts Governor; New Personal Moves; Stock Market; Oil Prices; Searching Mail; Diet Pills; Care Seat Safety; Subway Superman.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: UT-Snow And Ice; CO-Stranded Cattle; LA-Tornado; Upper Midwest And East US-Mild Temperatures, North Korea-Possible Upcoming Nuclear Test; Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak Accuses US Of Obstructing Peace Between Israel And Syria; US To Provide Aid To Security Forces Loyal To Abbas In Palestine; Diet Pill Makers Fined.
CBS: Iraq-Casey Reassigned; Bush-Troop Levels In Iraq; Bush-Saddam Execution; New Congress-First Day; LA-Tornado; GA-Search For Missing Woman Whose Family Was Murdered; Harvard-Soap And Water As Effective As Hand Sanitizers.
NPR: Bush Expected To Name Zalmay Khalilzad As US Ambassador To The UN And Announce Negroponte's Resignation; Harriet Miers Resigns; Head Of National Nuclear Security Administration Asked To Step Down; New Congress-First Day; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Wall Street; Holiday Sales Figures; CO-Russian Rocket.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: 9 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for legislative business.

Other: PELOSI SWEARING IN WEEK _ Schedule for House Speaker- designate Nancy Pelosi. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Open House reception. Room 345, Cannon.

LAW SCHOOLS-CONFERENCE _ Immigration debate, surveillance and security issues are among topics at the Association of American Law Schools Annual Meeting. Over 3,500 law faculty expected to attend. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Section on Constitutional Law presents ``The Bush Presidency and the Constitution." Location: Marriott Wardman Park.

IRAQ STRATEGY _ 11 a.m. - 1:30 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a discussion, ``Iraq: A Turing Point, with reports from Iraq from Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn. recently returned from a fact-finding mission to Iraq. Both held extensive discussions with U.S. forces and Iraqi government officials. Also, AEI resident scholar Frederick W. Kagan and former acting Army chief of staff General Jack Keane will release the updated and final version of phase one of ``Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq. Highlights: 11 a.m. Panel I: Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq. Panelists: Frederick W. Kagan, AEI; and General Jack Keane, U.S. Army (retired). 12:30 p.m. Panel II: Reports from Iraq. Panelists: Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn. Location: AEI's Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

OPEN HOUSE _ 9 a.m. Faith and anti-abortion leaders hold a news conference before attending Speaker Pelosi's Open House. Location: Independence Ave. and 1st St. SE.

PENATGON-IRAQ SECURITY _ 9:15 a.m. UK Army Maj. Gen. Simon Mayall, deputy commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, will brief live from Iraq to provide an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

DOJ_NMG_0112898

IRAN _ 10 a.m. The Iran Policy Committee holds a news conference to discuss new intelligence and to review Iraqi policy options. Location: National Press Club.

IRAQ _ 10 a.m. Rep. Heather Wilson speaks on Iraq policy at a ``Newsmaker'' forum. Location: National Press Club.

SPELINGS-NCLB _ 10 a.m. US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings will commemorate the fifth anniversary of the signing of the No Child Left Behind Act by President Bush with a speech to national education leaders. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, 1615 H St. NW.

VOTING MACHINES _ 10 a.m. People for the American Way, NAACP, Common Cause, others hold a forum on voting machines and voter verification with Kindra Muntz, of the Sarasota Alliance for Fair Elections, Lawrence Norden, of the Brennan Center for Justice, others. Location: NEA Auditorium, 1201 16th St., NW.

GUTIERREZ-OUTLOOK _ 11:45 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez discusses economic initiatives and the outlook for 2007 at a US Chamber of Commerce event. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

IRAQ-MCCAIN-LIEBERMAN _ 12 p.m. MoveOn members hold a rally to oppose pro-war Iraq speeches by Sens. John McCain and Joseph Lieberman. Location: Outside American Enterprise Institute offices, 1150 17th St. NW.

GLOBAL WARMING-FORUM _ 12:30 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Center for American Progress presentation titled ``Global Warming: The Solution and the Politics.'' With Joseph Romm, author of ``Hell and High Water,'' former EPA chief Carol Browner and Ana Unruh Cohen, Center for American Progress. Location: 1333 H St. NW.

DEMORACTS-110TH CONGRESS _ 2:30 p.m. Following the Democratic Issues Conference, the new Senate Leadership will discuss their plans for the 110th Congress. Joined by members of the Democratic Caucus, the leaders will lay out their vision of the Senate working together in a bipartisan manner to deliver results for the American people. Partcipants: Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid; Assistant Senate Majority Leader Dick Durbin; Democratic Conference Vice Chairman Charles Schumer; Democratic Conference Secretary Patty Murray; and members of the Senate Democratic Caucus. Location: Great Hall, Thomas Jefferson Building of the Library of Congress.

HOYT _ 4 p.m. Swearing in ceremony for Treasury Department General Counsel Robert Hoyt. Location: Cash Room, main Treasury.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 08, 2007 8:43 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, January 08, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070108.pdf; agnb070108.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Some Conservatives Blast Anti-Terror Laws' Effect On Asylum Seekers 3
Two Charged With Plotting Attacks On Americans In Jordan ...3
Editorials Critical Of Bush's Letter-Opening Statement 3

Homeland Response:

Miscommunication Leads To Terror Scare At Port Of Miami ..4
Measure Would Require All Cargo On Passenger Planes To Be Screened 4
McConnell Expected To Improve Relations Between Pentagon and DNI 4
Democrats May Seek Access To White House Records On Katrina 5

War News:

Bush Plan To Include "Surge," Aid, "Benchmarks" For Iraqi Leaders 5
Pelosi Suggests Democrats Could Withhold Funding For Troop "Surge." 8
Bush Seen As "Determined To Defy" Opposition To Sending More Troops 10
Lawmakers Break Largely Along Party Lines On "Surge." 11
Fallon Seen As "Experienced" Officer And Diplomat 13
US, Iraqi Forces Launch "Thundering" Assault On Insurgents 13
Five More US Soldiers Killed In Iraq 13
Nearly 23,000 Iraqis Said To Be Killed In 2006 13
Increased Violence Slows Supply Lines In Iraq 14
Two More Saddam Co-Defendants Await Execution 14
UK's Brown Suggests Iraq Policy Shift 14
US Agencies Lack Adequate Number Of Arabic Speakers 14
Iraqi Soccer Suffers From War Too 14
Newborn Babies, Women Killed In Taliban Attack 15
LATimes Weighs In On Watada Trial 15

Corporate Scandals:

Jobs May Still Face DOJ Scrutiny In Apple Options Probe 15
FCC Expected To Issue New Rules On Phone Records Protection 16
Goal Of CEO Pay Critics Said To Be "Social Responsibility." 16

Criminal Law:

States Tap Texas' Execution Expertise 17
Bush May Address Homicide Wave In State Of The Union 17
Judge To Consider Access To Jeffs Evidence At Hearing Today 17
WSJournal Criticizes Fitzgerald For Not Releasing Reporters' Affidavits 17
Judge Recommends Tightening Defendant Indigency Mechanisms 18

Civil Law:

Plame Denied Permission To Write About Her CIA Role 18

Civil Rights:

Smaller Version Of Taser Goes On Sale For Private Use 18
NYTimes Urges Congress To "Fix" Electronic Voting Machines 19

Antitrust:

DOJ Antitrust Division Defends Performance 19
US Conducting Security Review Of European Telecom Venture 19

Environment

Democrats Target Minerals Management Service Over Oil And Gas Royalties 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

San Francisco Area Has Highest Percentage Of Regular Drug Users 20
Three "Operation Highstep" Suspects Face Charges In Chicago 20

"Operation Director's Cut" Leads To 20-Year Sentence For Financial Services Executive 20
Lawyers, Others In Rhode Island Face Charges In Drug-Deal Scheme 21
Audit Finds Problems With DEA Accounting Of Seized Funds 21
Mexican Drug Cartels Strengthen Presence In Peru 21

Immigration:

US Halts Deportation Proceedings Against Brazilian Couple 21
Hoyer Suggests Bush Will Cooperate With Democrats' On Immigration Reform 22

Tax:

BB&T Plans Appeal Of Tax Refund Ruling 22
CBO Study Finds The Very Wealthy Benefited The Most From Bush Tax Cuts 23

Congress-Administration:

Many Republicans Expected To Back Minimum Wage Increase 24
On Fifth Anniversary, NCLB Seen As Changing Schools 24
Education Department Seeks Change In ABA's Diversity Standard For Law Schools 25
Domenici Optimistic That Democrats Will Pass His Mental Health Bill 25
Chao's Third Public Affairs Chief Resigns After Three Months 25
Roberts' "Constitutional Crisis" Claim Criticized 25
After Cost Overruns, Delays, Capitol Visitor Center Nears Completion 25
Federal Pay Raise Doesn't Keep Pace With Private Sector ... 26
Gerson Describes Bush's "Voracious" Reading Habits 26
WPost Urges Congress To Nix Agricultural Subsidies 26

Other News:

Positive Employment Data Worries US Equities Markets 26
OPEC Production Cuts Likely To Buoy Oil Prices 27
Researchers Extract Stem Cells From Amniotic Fluid 27
Analysts Predict Population Shifts Will Continue To Benefit The GOP 27
Biden Says He Will Form Presidential Exploratory Committee This Month 28
Patrick Pledges To Support Kerry In 2008 28
Edwards May Be Engaging In "Choreographed Candor." 28
McCain Portrayed As Out Of Step With Conservatives On Key Issues 28
Many States Plan Expansion Of Health Care Coverage 29
Schwarzenegger To Propose Welfare "Rollback." 29
Georgia Legislator Seeks To Strip McKinney's Name From Highway 30
Former President Bush Discharged After Hip Replacement .. 30
WPost Backs Effort To Allow Virginia Governors Two Terms 30
Israel Denies Planning Attack On Iran 30
Abbas To Seek Early Elections Despite Hamas Objections .. 30
US Sends Military Advisers, Weapons To Boost Somalis 31
Richardson Optimistic For Breakthrough On Darfur 31
US, EU Revive Hopes For Trade Deal 32
EC's Barroso To Challenge Bush On Climate Change 32
China Profits From Carbon Credit Market 32
China Tightens Censorship Over Press 32
New Year's Bombings Reflect Difficulties Facing New Thai Government 33
Zoellick Urges Bush, Congress To Create AAFTA 33
O'Grady Says Coca-Growing Movement Bolstering Morales' Popularity 33

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 33

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 34

DOJ_NMG_0112902

TERRORISM NEWS:

Some Conservatives Blast Anti-Terror Laws' Effect On Asylum Seekers. The Washington Post (1/8, A3, Fears, 690K) reports, "Conservatives who supported President Bush's reelection have joined liberal groups in expressing outrage over his administration's broad use of anti-terrorism laws to reject asylum for thousands of people seeking refuge from religious, ethnic and political persecution. The critics say the administration's interpretation of provisions mandating denial of asylum to individuals who give 'material support' to terrorist groups is so broad that foreigners who fought alongside US forces in wars such as Vietnam can be denied asylum on the grounds that they provided aid to terrorists. … 'This is so indefensible,' said Michael Horowitz, a fellow at the conservative Hudson Institute and a former lawyer in the Reagan administration. 'It is causing heroes who fought for the United States to be afraid of being deported.'" Barrett Duke, vice president of public policy for the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, called the laws "outrageous." Gary L. Bauer, "president of American Values, a conservative public policy group, said the anti-terrorism thrust of laws such as the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act is supported by most conservatives, 'but the enforcement of it has lapsed into ludicrousy. The concept of material support is being distorted, and even the definition of the term 'terrorism' is being turned on its ear.'"

Two Charged With Plotting Attacks On Americans In Jordan. The AP (1/8) reports, "Two men were charged Sunday with plotting attacks against Americans living in Jordan. Prosecutors indicted Mohammed Shehada, 25, a Jordanian, and Sameeh al-Hotari, 25, who was born in Kuwait, for conspiracy to carry out terrorist attacks and possession of an automatic weapon, a Kalashnikov."

Editorials Critical Of Bush's Letter-Opening Statement. Under the headline "First wiretapping, now letter-opening?" the Los Angeles Times (1/8, 850K) editorializes, "The Bush administration seems determined to raise the specter of surveillance over every means of communication within the United States. Not content to monitor selected phone calls and e-mails in secret, it recently hinted that letters and packages may be opened without a search warrant too." The Times adds that spokesman Tony Snow attempted to "allay fears last week about mail snooping," stating that Bush's statement on the subject was "merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president." However, "it's hard not to be suspicious of the president's position on mail privacy, given the administration's record on the issue of domestic surveillance. … The administration may indeed be up to nothing new when it comes to mail — and that's not the least bit comforting."

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/8) editorializes, "In yet another power grab that whittles away our rights without a plausible justification, President Bush has given the government expanded authority to read our mail." The Chronicle continues, "This White House has long signaled that it will do what it wants in the name of national security, laws be damned. It has reserved the government's right to detain and even torture suspects without due process, and has asserted for itself wide latitude to electronically eavesdrop on Americans without obtaining search warrants. … So perhaps it should surprise no one that Bush would add a 'signing statement' to a postal-reform bill passed by Congress that suggests the new law allows the opening of mail that would be 'otherwise sealed against inspection' for broadly defined security purposes." The Chronicle adds, "Once again, the White House attempted to downplay the significance of a signing statement, insisting the president was not trying to exert any new authority. Instead, the Bush spinners said the purpose of the signing statement was to reiterate current law, which clearly does allow postal authorities to open a package suspected of containing a ticking time bomb -- the example of choice for those trying to pooh-pooh the concerns. Also, before the administration tries to trot out a red herring about wanting to intercept 'letters from al Qaeda' without delay, it has every opportunity to do so under current law -- and could then apply for a warrant after the fact. … 'Just trust us,' seems to be the operative phrase of this administration. … However, history has shown the potential for government abuses in the absence of strong mail-privacy laws. Bush continues to roll back the clock -- and the Constitution -- with his signing statements."

DOJ_NMG_0112903

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Miscommunication Leads To Terror Scare At Port Of Miami. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (1/8, Ovalle, Weaver, Nahed, Barry, 286K) reports, "What started as a potential terrorist plot at Miami-Dade's seaport Sunday morning quickly flubbed into a sobering reminder of the post 9/11 state of fear. Initially, the story line sounded startling: Officers stopped a Middle Eastern man driving an 18-wheel rig with mysterious cargo. Two men, the reports went, were discovered hiding in the trailer portion. … The truth, however, emerged far less threatening -- the men were not terrorists and were only hauling electrical auto parts. Ultimately, the scare was blamed on miscommunication and unfounded reports." The Herald notes, "FBI agents questioned the men. County and federal authorities used a gamma ray ID device to examine the blue 40-foot container, which had 22 pallets inside. … By 5:15 p.m., authorities stood in front of local and national reporters to stress that despite the false alarm, security procedures unfolded perfectly."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/8, Blum, 237K) reports that "agents with the Federal Bureau of Investigation spent hours interviewing the men -- two brothers and a friend, according to FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela. The names of the men, who reside legally in Dearborn, Mich., were not released. Orihuela insisted the heightened security alert was not a case of racial profiling. 'It would have been the same response regardless,' she said. After lengthy questioning, the agents concluded the men were harmless and that the day's sinister-seeming events resulted from a simple misunderstanding between the truck driver and the port security officer regarding the number of passengers in the truck." The AP (1/8, Kennedy) reported the incident in a widely-distributed story, noting that the FBI and ICE were involved in the investigation; meanwhile, CNN, MSNBC and Fox News followed the story throughout their broadcasts yesterday as it unfolded.

Measure Would Require All Cargo On Passenger Planes To Be Screened. USA Today (1/8, Frank, 2.27M) reports a measure in the Democratic homeland security bill "that is likely to pass in the House" Tuesday "would require all cargo on passenger planes to be inspected for bombs." However, "Airlines and cargo companies say inspections would take so long that passenger planes could not carry goods that require fast delivery," which may prompt airlines to "cancel certain passenger routes," according to David Castelveter, spokesman for the Air Transport Association, which represents major US airlines. Rep. Ed Markey, who has pushed for cargo inspection, "dismissed gloomy scenarios and noted that under the legislation, passenger airlines would not have to inspect all cargo until September 2009."

NYTimes Says Air, Sea Cargo Inspection Rules Should Have Been "No-Brainers." The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) editorializes that in a move to address "some perilously neglected needs of homeland security," House Democrats are "determined to mandate inspection of all incoming sea cargo by 2012. This is an overdue protection that Republicans bottled up in the last Congress." The new port security measures, in addition to the screening of all cargo on passenger planes, were recommended by the 9/11 commission and "should long ago have been antiterrorism no-brainers for the nation. The complaints of business lobbyists about undue burdens on commerce pale when compared with the havoc that would be created in the American economy if terrorists mounted another major attack." Adding that the House legislation "sidesteps some of the 9/11 commission's most important findings about the dysfunctional intelligence apparatus," the Times states that the "measure amounts to a worthy step forward, but one that does not go far enough."

McConnell Expected To Improve Relations Between Pentagon and DNI. Newsweek (1/15, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "Intelligence insiders expect recent personnel shifts to strengthen the authority of the national intelligence director." DNI nominee Mike McConnell, "a retired Navy three-star admiral whose career path is similar to that of new CIA Director Michael Hayden, a four-star Air Force general." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "is expected to replace Defense Intelligence Under Secretary Stephen Cambone with another military man, retired Air Force three-star Gen. James Clapper." Newsweek adds that the DNI office "A big criticism was that, in the face of alleged obstruction by former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the intel czar's office had too little control over Pentagon intel agencies like the giant NSA. Assuming Clapper does become Pentagon intel chief, however, relations between Defense agencies and the intel czar's office may improve considerably: four intelligence officials, who asked for anonymity discussing intel issues, say that Clapper once angered Rumsfeld by telling Congress he would be comfortable if his NGA operation was moved out of Pentagon control and under direct control of the intel czar."

DOJ_NMG_0112904

Democrats May Seek Access To White House Records On Katrina. Newsweek (1/15, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "One early indication of how aggressively Capitol Hill Democrats will investigate the Bush administration -- and how strongly the White House will resist -- will be how vigorously the new congressional majority pursues Katrina inquiries. Under GOP leadership, both House and Senate committees sought copies of Katrina records, but the White House declined to turn over messages between the president and his top advisers. According to a GOP investigator involved with the probe…Bush aides indicated that if Congress pressed harder, the White House was likely to claim such material was covered by executive privilege. But now that the Democrats have subpoena power, an effort to force the White House to turn over the messages is a 'possibility,' says a House Democratic source." Former FEMA administrator Michael Brown "told NEWSWEEK that in a still-secret videoconference shortly after Katrina hit New Orleans, he warned presidential aides that 90 percent of the city was being 'displaced,' but was greeted with 'deafening silence.'"

Invigorated Blue Dogs Plan To Challenge Liberals. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Schulte, 2.03M) reports, "Veteran liberals such as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, hold the party's reins, but their power is likely to be tested by a group far removed from the party establishment-conservative Democrats who are flexing newfound muscle. Eighteen of 41 incoming House freshmen joined the New Democrat Coalition and/or the Blue Dog Coalition, caucuses of pro-business and fiscally conservative Democrats, respectively. … Pro-technology and free trade, the New Democrats boast a few more members, but the budget-minded Blue Dogs may have more bite. Now 44 members strong, this conservative caucus looks to be a cohesive voting bloc on fiscal issues. It also claims some freshman stars, like former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler of North Carolina and former sheriff Brad Ellsworth of Indiana, both of whom won in GOP strongholds. … Showdowns are possible over some key Democratic initiatives, such as halving interest rates on student loans and reforming the alternative minimum tax."

Democrats Said To Have Brief Window Of Opportunity To Cement Majorities. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "Elected with a mandate to clean up Washington by a deeply disgruntled public, Democrats have a mighty task ahead and a plan to move quickly in the first few weeks. But their efforts are fraught with any number of challenges: holding the progressive and centrist wings of the party together, turning legislation into law with the slimmest of Senate majorities, and working with a president who has seen little resistance from Capitol Hill during his six years in office. How Democrats fare in the next few months -- before the presidential election begins to overwhelm Washington -- will help determine whether the party maintains control in 2008 and beyond. … First up, Democrats plan to pass their 100-hour agenda through the House before the president's State of the Union address on January 23." U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (1/15) writes, "the now minority congressional Republicans are feeling liberated. The burden of trying to run a fractious Congress is gone. Now they get to become professional critics. No longer do they have to sweat to deliver a 'majority of the majority' to the White House for every big vote-including Iraq. They can be the opposition voice, the backbenchers, the unruly minority."

Survey Finds Much Of Ninth Ward Does Not Have To Be Rebuilt From Scratch. The Washington Post (1/8, A5, Burdeau, 690K) reports a survey by urban planners and students at Cornell, Columbia University and the University of Illinois has found that the neighborhoods in New Orleans' Ninth Ward "can be brought back largely as they existed before Hurricane Katrina flooded them. … The only section that must be demolished before being rebuilt lies directly next to the levee breach on the Industrial Canal, an area that covers less than a square mile in the Lower Ninth Ward, the planners said." Andrew Rumbach, a Cornell planner, said the research data shows that the area "can be rebuilt, and rebuilt in a cost-effective way. What is lacking are the resources."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Plan To Include "Surge," Aid, "Benchmarks" For Iraqi Leaders. More details are becoming known about President Bush's new Iraq strategy. The New York Times (1/8, A1, Gordon, Zeleny,

DOJ_NMG_0112905

1.16M) reports this morning Bush's "new Iraq policy will establish a series of goals that the Iraqi government will be expected to meet to try to ease sectarian tensions and stabilize the country politically and economically, senior administration officials said Sunday. Among these 'benchmarks' are steps that would draw more Sunnis into the political process, finalize a long-delayed measure on the distribution of oil revenue and ease the government's policy toward former Baath Party members, the officials said." The Times adds, "After meeting with the president and his national security team on Friday at the White House, senators from both parties said they told Mr. Bush they would have trouble supporting an American troop increase unless the plan included specific goals for the Iraqi government. Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, said one of his Senate colleagues asked why the effort to add to American forces in Iraq would be more likely to succeed than previous troop increases. Mr. Sununu said the president and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, responded that Mr. Bush's plan would 'include more specific goals, different rules of engagement and different expectations for cooperation with the Iraqi government.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/7, lead story, 3:10, Corke, 9.87M) said, "Administration officials tell us when the President does speak about his plan, he will offer a balanced approach, one that clearly defines the future role for American forces in Iraq," and USA Today (1/8, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "Bush is reviewing a plan that would send up to 20,000 more US troops to Iraq, a decision that would trigger heavy opposition from Democratic congressional leaders." The White House "plans a presidential address no sooner than Wednesday to discuss the proposal, which includes new programs for jobs, reconstruction and political assistance in Iraq, according to two administration officials who have been briefed on it." The "officials, who spoke on the condition they not be identified because the president has not made final decisions, said increases would come in phases that could add up to 20,000 troops during the next several months." The plan also "includes up to $1 billion in economic assistance, such as job creation and reconstruction projects, the officials said. It also calls for political assistance, including help for human rights groups and political organizations, in an effort to promote peaceful reconciliation among warring Shiite and Sunni factions."

Last night, ABC and NBC (CBS was preempted) ran analysis pieces that cast doubt on the usefulness of a troop "surge." ABC World News (1/7, story 2, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) reported, "We had lunch with General Odierno. He's the top US military commander in Baghdad. He reckoned that US troops could come into Baghdad and in three or four months, restore relative peace and security and then start withdrawing and let the Iraqis take over. However, in the past when they've done that, that has never worked. And it's very unclear what has changed now that would make it work." And NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 2, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) said "there are questions about whether…Bush's new plan will be embraced by the Iraqis who have a new plan of their own to secure Baghdad." NBC (Maceda) added, "Only months ago Iraqis welcomed another bold plan, Operation Together Forward. Despite the effort of 17,000 troops inside Baghdad it failed to stem the violence." In a similar report, the Christian Science Monitor (1/8, LaFranchi, 59K) reports "critics say" the "surge" option "would simply repeat past tactics that have not delivered," while "advocates of a big surge say it could be worse than nothing, only exposing more US troops to danger without providing the larger numbers they say are needed to get the job done of securing the civilian population."

Odierno Makes Case For New Strategy. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Moore, 850K) reports Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, "the newly installed day-to-day commander of military operations in Iraq, said that success here would depend on a multi-pronged strategy including economic aid and political negotiations in addition to increased military actions targeting Shiite and Sunni Arab militants." Odierno, "who left his job as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's military advisor to become the operations chief for Iraq," said "more soldiers would speed the training of the Iraqi force and help quell sectarian fighting in the capital. He said bringing peace to Baghdad could be accomplished either with additional American troops or expanded recruiting and training of Iraqi troops or a combination of the two." USA Today (1/8, 5A, Jervis, 2.27M) notes Odierno "called for a 'balanced approach' targeting extremists of both sects. The new strategy would consist of clearing neighborhoods of insurgents and patrolling those areas heavily; creating more jobs; launching provincial elections; and outlawing militias, he said."

The New York Times (1/8, Burns, 1.16M) reports, "Meeting American reporters over lunch at a villa in the grounds of one of Mr. Hussein's former palaces…Odierno was careful not to divulge details of Mr. Bush's new war plan, which the president is expected to make public in coming days, perhaps on Wednesday." But "much of the Bush plan has been leaked."

DOJ_NMG_0112906

Odierno's comments were noted by the two network newscasts that aired last night. ABC World News (1/7, story 2, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) said, "We had lunch with General Odierno. He's the top US military commander in Baghdad. He reckoned that US troops could come into Baghdad and in three or four months, restore relative peace and security and then start withdrawing and let the Iraqis take over." NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 2, 2:20, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "Speaking of Baghdad today, Lieutenant General Raymond Odierno, the number two commander in Iraq, explained why" past plans to address the violence failed: "It failed because we couldn't hold what we had cleared, and you have to go after both Sunnis and Shiites." The Washington Post (1/8, A12, Partlow, 690K) and McClatchy (1/8, Youssef) also report on Odierno's comments.

Scowcroft Offers Conditional Support For Targeted Surge. Former National Security Advisor Brent Scowcroft was asked on ABC's This Week (1/7, Stephanopoulos) if he would "advise sending more troops to Iraq right now," Scowcroft responded, "I believe, if there is a specific mission that they can accomplish and for a specific period, then it's worthwhile. … The mission would have to be some particular thing in Baghdad, for example. There's ethnic cleansing going on in Baghdad. If that can be stopped by a specific number of troops in a specific period of time, that would be demonstrable improvement. But just the increase -- general increase of troops spread out through all the missions that they have, I think would be -- would not be effective."

State Department Concerned By Bush Plan. The Financial Times (1/8, Dinmore) reports, "At the heart of…Bush's new way forward'…is the plan already under way to expand the US civilian presence across Iraq and complete the world's largest embassy in Baghdad. Construction of what critics call 'Fortress Baghdad' has led to arguments inside the State Department amid fears that the overwhelming diplomatic presence will perpetuate a sense of US occupation and become a focus of local anger." US diplomats "say that just as the armed forces are being stretched to breaking point, the US foreign service is suffering from low morale and operations in the rest of the world are being damaged by the diversion of resources to Iraq." Meanwhile, "the State Department has told the Financial Times that the US civilian presence in Iraq has 'grown considerably beyond the numbers projected for the new embassy compound.'"

Al-Rubaie Says Iraqis Have Plan To Crack Down On All Militias. CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie. Asked when the Iraqi military would "crack down on the various militias, especially the Mehdi Army of Muqtada al-Sadr," al-Rubaie said, "We have a full comprehensive plan for all militias, not only Mahdi militias, but all other militias we have a full comprehensive plan, and we have already started implementing this plan. But we are going to speed up this process in the year 2007."

More Commentary On Bush's Plan. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M) editorializes, "Even with Democrats running Congress, Mr. Bush has a political window to pursue a more robust security strategy. The paradox is that the fastest way home from Iraq is a bolder commitment now. ... If anything, in Iraq it now appears [Bush] has been too deferential. He was telling the truth when he said his generals, and former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, told him they had enough troops to do the job." The Journal adds, "We hope Mr. Bush also refrains from using the words 'surge' or 'temporary' to describe his plans this week. A better message is that he will do whatever it takes to reinforce the forces of moderation and democracy in Iraq to prevent a defeat that would empower American enemies in Iraq and in the war on terror. ... The tragedy nearly four years after the fall of Saddam is that such a strategy has never been tried."

The Weekly Standard's William Kristol, appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume), said, "Bush has chosen to change strategy in Iraq in a way that I think makes sense. The new rationale for the new strategy has been laid out in great strength by retired Army Chief of Staff Jack Keane, and Fred Kagan, and now I think David Petraeus." Asked if 20,000 troops is likely to be enough to make a difference, Kristol replied, "The Keane and Kagan plan calls for four or five brigades in Baghdad and one or two Marine regiments in Anbar, which will be a little more than 20,000. They may phase them in. So it might start with 20,000. But look, Dave Petraeus is going to take over. And he's committed. He's taking over with a mission: win the war. And if he comes back to the president a month from now, when he's in command on the ground and says, 'let's accelerate the surge'…which I think would be a good idea, frankly, frontload the surge -- it could be 30,000 or 35,000 troops."

DOJ_NMG_0112907

In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/8, A17, 2.04M) Bing West, former assistant secretary of defense, and Eliot Cohen, professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, write, "The apparent problem is uncontrolled sectarian violence in Baghdad and the apparent solution is to send more American soldiers to restore order. The actual problem is a dysfunctional, sectarian Iraqi political system. Here at home, the imminent debate between the Congress and the administration about the number of American forces is a diversion. … The much-debated 'surge' would only modify our current strategy,"

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/8, A15, 690K) Gen. Wesley Clark, former NATO Supreme Commander, writes, "The odds are that this week President Bush will announce a 'surge' of up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops into Iraq. Will this deliver a 'win'? Probably not. But it will distract us from facing the deep-seated regional issues that must be resolved. … What the surge would do is put more American troops in harm's way, further undercut the morale of U.S. forces and risk further alienating elements of the Iraqi populace."

The Washington Post's Jackson Diehl (1/8, A15) writes, "The new plan for Iraq that President Bush will announce this week will suffer from the same fallacy that has infected each of his previous war strategies. … That is, the notion that American action can produce decisive results in Iraq in six to 12 months." Diehl adds, "the question the country faces is not what can be done on Washington's time, in six or 12 months. It's how the U.S. mission can be configured to adapt to the clock that's running in Iraq."

The New York Times' Paul Krugman (1/8) writes, "The only real question about the planned 'surge' in Iraq — which is better described as a Vietnam-style escalation — is whether its proponents are cynical or delusional."

Boston Globe (1/8, 413K) columnist James Carroll writes, "With his lies at the beginning of this war, and his fantasy now that an honorable outcome remains possible, the president is a taunting killer, caught in the act. ... Stop this man."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/8, 385K) editorializes, "New nameplates on desks need to be accompanied by new and better plans for stabilizing and exiting Iraq, for carrying out diplomacy around the world, and for more fully coordinating U.S. intelligence gathering. ... Bush's own statements and leaks about this week's announcement suggest that he still hasn't gripped the reality that the earlier U.S. goal - to turn Iraq into a stable democracy - is now unachievable. ... Simply looking into Iraqi President Nouri al-Maliki's eyes to see whether he is sincere about disbanding Shiite death squads won't work either. Bush ought to listen to the Baker-Hamilton commission's suggestions to beef up the training of Iraqi security forces, and hold talks with regional neighbors, including Iran and Syria, who can influence the outcome in Iraq."

"Soft Partition" Of Iraq Suggested. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (1/8, 88K), Johns Hopkins visiting scholar Edward Joseph and Brookings fellow Michael O'Hanlon suggest, "Many have already concluded our backup plan for Iraq should be packing up and going home -- or, at most, redeploying to Iraq's borders to protect displaced civilians and deter its neighbors from entering into the civil war. But there is at least one promising Plan B that, while hardly ideal, would be far better for America, Iraq, and the broader region than complete defeat, all-out civil war, and the possibility of broader regional conflict. It would build on Sen. Joe Biden and former Assistant Secretary Leslie Gelb's idea of a soft partitioning of Iraq -- moving away from centralization toward a loose federation (akin to Bosnia) of three largely autonomous regions in which present and future oil revenues would be shared equitably. But it would go beyond Biden/Gelb to confront directly the sectarian strife now raging in and around Baghdad. Rather than striving for a 'neutral Baghdad' as Mr. Biden and Mr. Gelb propose, the Iraqi government would assist threatened minorities relocate to where they feel safer -- helping them find new jobs and housing in the process. This is in effect the Bosnia model for Iraq."

Pelosi Suggests Democrats Could Withhold Funding For Troop "Surge." As President Bush prepares to announce his new strategy for Iraq, ABC World News (1/7, lead story, 3:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported "the new Speaker of the House, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, flexed some new political muscle. Speaker Pelosi raised the possibility that the Democrats could withhold money for the expected centerpiece of the President's plan, sending more troops to Iraq." ABC (Morrell) added, "With Democrats now in control of Congress, and of funding the war in Iraq, they have the power to thwart the President's new strategy. And today, for the first time, the new Speaker of the House warned Congress may not foot the bill, if the President, as expected this week, orders thousands more troops to Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0112908

Pelosi, on CBS's Face the Nation (1/07, Schieffer) said, "If the President chooses to escalate the war, in his budget request we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now. … But if the President wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it. And this is new for him because up until now the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions. … It's not an open-ended commitment anymore." Pelosi added, "There is complete chaos now. … Right now, the war in Iraq is harming our military readiness." The AP (1/8, Yen) reports that "asked about Pelosi's remarks, White House spokesman Alex Conant said Bush welcomed any ideas on Iraq that 'lead to success.'" He added, "We're glad the speaker wants us to succeed in Iraq."

The Washington Times (1/8, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and House Appropriations Committee chairman, "echoed his party leader's warnings and some of her wording, saying, 'There are certainly going to be no blank checks' from his panel." Added Obey, "I think we're going to scrub his request and, at the same time, use it as a chance to really discuss whether or not the policy behind that request makes any sense."

The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Pasternak, 850K) notes "the Democratic leaders also acknowledged that they had a limited ability to prevent the White House from adding forces. Any effort to block funding would expose them to charges of not supporting the troops. And since Congress authorized the use of force in Iraq, placing restraints on that approval could be unconstitutional." Pelosi "emphasized that Congress would not cut off funding for US forces now in Iraq, and said that Democrats supported the president's proposal to increase the overall size of the Army and the Marine Corps." But the Washington Times/UPI (1/8, Waterman) reports "Democrats who want to block any proposed escalation in US troop levels in Iraq have the constitutional authority and the legal power to do so, scholars says. 'It's a fundamental constitutional principle that Congress can initiate and regulate war,' said Neil Kinkopf, a law professor at Georgia State University in Atlanta." Kinkopf, "a former Clinton administration Justice Department official who worked in the Office of Legal Counsel, presented a paper for the liberal American Constitution Society last week arguing that Congress has the power to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq -- a move many expect him to announce this week."

NBC Nightly News (1/7, lead story, 3:10, Corke, 9.87M) noted that in appearances yesterday, Democrats "sharpened their criticism" of Bush's expected Iraq plans. One reason for that, says today's Boston Globe (1/8, Klein, 413K), is that "antiwar activists in the Democratic Party are stepping up demands that their party's leaders cut off funding for the war -- a dramatic step that would force the president to quickly end American involvement in the war. … The push by liberals underscores a split within the Democratic Party that winning the majority in Congress hasn't healed. Democrats are caught between a desire to support US troops and appear strong on national security and a sometimes competing push to end an increasingly unpopular war."

CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who said, "Given a choice between using the money to bring the troops home or using the money to continue the war, I think the American people want a process to begin that will bring our troops home. … What we need to do is, as we announce that we're going to withdraw, we also enable a political process to be started that begins the transition to an international security force."

Democrats To Hold Iraq Hearings This Week. The Washington Post (1/8, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Democratic leaders who had hoped to emphasize their domestic agenda in the opening weeks of Congress have concluded that Iraq will share top billing, and they plan on aggressively confronting administration officials this week in a series of hearings. Pushed by House members who want a quick, tough response to the Iraq strategy President Bush is expected to announce this week," Pelosi "has backed off from her initial assertion that nothing should detract attention from the legislation she hopes to pass in the first 100 hours of House debate." The Post adds, "Late last week, she summoned the chairmen of the Armed Services, Foreign Affairs, intelligence, Homeland Security, and Oversight and Government Reform committees to plot a series of hearings. On Thursday, Democrats will call Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to appear before the House Foreign Affairs Committee to defend the war-strategy shift Bush will outline in a nationally televised speech. A House Armed Services Committee hearing with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, planned for Jan. 19 was abruptly moved to this Thursday after consultations with Pelosi."

DOJ_NMG_0112909

The Christian Science Monitor (1/8, Chaddock, 59K) says that "oversight hearings convening across Capitol Hill, beginning this week, mark an escalation in congressional opposition to the war, including among members of the president's own party." The Monitor adds, "Leading off this month's blitz of Iraq hearings, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to convene a closed intelligence briefing Tuesday afternoon. In all, it plans a dozen hearings on the war this month."

Waxman Characterizes Iraq Spending Audits As "Very, Very Frightening." Rep. Henry Waxman, on ABC's This Week (1/7, Stephanopoulos), said that his "top priority" as chairman of the House Government Reform Committee "is to make sure that taxpayers' funds are no being wasted, that there's no fraud and abuse. These are the taxpayers' dollars, and what we've seen so far in Iraq, according to the government's own auditors, is billions of dollars that have gone to waste and corruption and graft. We're going to look into that more carefully. Only a small part of the money spent in Iraq has been audited, but what we've seen is very, very frightening."

Bush Seen As "Determined To Defy" Opposition To Sending More Troops. Newsweek (1/15, Darman, Wolffe, Thomas, 3.12M), in an article on the Iraq stances of GOP Sens. John McCain and Chuck Hagel, reports that President Bush "seems determined to defy his detractors, not to mention popular opinion. This week Bush is expected to announce a 'New Way Forward' on Iraq that will call for more troops to try to bring order and political stability to Baghdad. … To Bush's many critics, like Hagel, the new Iraq strategy adds up to a waste of more American lives. To Bush's smaller and dwindling band of supporters, like McCain, failure in Iraq is unthinkable. And if duty requires more sacrifice, then so be it. A senior Bush aide, who declined to be named discussing internal White House strategy, tells NEWSWEEK that the president's way-forward plan will be a middle-road approach that falls somewhere between McCain's and Hagel's positions. He will call for a staggered troop increase based on benchmarks for the Iraqis' performance."

Newsweek (1/15, Johnson, 3.12M) reports Bush's speech "laying out his new strategy for Iraq will be scrutinized for its specifics. … But at least as critical to success may be whether Bush is convincing. A draft report recently produced by the Baghdad embassy's director of strategic communications Ginger Cruz and obtained by NEWSWEEK makes the stakes clear: 'Without popular support from US population, there is the risk that troops will be pulled back ... Thus there is a vital need to save popular support via message.' Under the heading DOMESTIC MESSAGES, Cruz goes on to recommend 16 themes to reinforce with the American public, several of which Bush is likely to hit: 'vitally important we succeed'; 'actively working on new approaches'; 'there are no quick or easy answers.'"

Insiders "Suspect" Rove Crafted Bush's Response To ISG. U.S. News and World Report's "White House Week" feature (1/15, Walsh, Bedard, Mulrine) reports White House adviser Karl Rove "is showing no signs of leaving, as some had predicted. Indeed…Rove is as aggressive as ever in making policy arguments-his main theme being that Republicans lost the congressional elections because they didn't sufficiently live up to their core conservative ideals. And his influence is still pervasive, sources say. For instance, GOP insiders suspect that Rove had a big hand in distancing Bush from the Iraq Study Group because he believed the bipartisan panel was too critical of current Iraq policy. Rove, aides say, believes that victory is still achievable and that Bush should pursue it as vigorously as he can."

Democrats Not Expected To Block Iraq War Funding Requests. Newsweek's Howard Fineman (1/15) writes Sen. Barack Obama "says that sending more troops would be 'a mistake that compounds the president's original mistake.' But don't expect Obama -- or most other Dems -- to try to block George W. Bush when he asks Congress in the coming weeks for another billion-dollar bundle for the war. The party won't deny the funds, and may not even try to attach conditions to them. Obama made that clear last week when I saw him in his office. … Party leaders (especially Nancy Pelosi) fear being branded as 'weak on defense' if they kicked off in Congress with antiwar maneuvers." U.S. News and World Report's "White House Week" feature (1/15, Walsh, Bedard, Mulrine) reports President Bush's "strategists say he has a lot more latitude in setting a new policy than his antiwar critics realize -- at least for the next few months. 'The Democrats are going to be in a real bind,' says a Republican insider with close ties to the White House. 'The president will come out with a strong plan to get order in Baghdad, and if the Democrats do anything to undermine or block it, it will look to Americans as though they wouldn't give his plan a chance.' The strategist predicts that 'their tendency will be to give the president a free hand and blame him if doesn't work.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112910

U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Kingsbury, 2.03M) reports House Democrats "have promised hearings into how the war in Iraq has been handled, with scrutiny in a range of committees expected to turn on contractor oversight, force readiness, and the president's forthcoming plan in Iraq. Over on the Senate side, expect three hearings on Iraq this month alone. And Congress will almost certainly consider expanding the size of the Army and Marine Corps, a measure that is expected to receive broad support on both sides of the aisle." Sen. Patrick Leahy "wants to crack down on war profiteering, and he's promising to implement the Iraq Study Group recommendations to develop the devastated country's judicial system and train its police force." U.S. News and World Report's Brian Duffy (1/15) reports, "Democrats promise vigorous oversight, and given their all-but-total abdication on the issue heretofore and the administration's abject mismanagement of postwar operations there, that's as it should be. Obsession with toll-taking alone, however, would be a mistake."

Provincial Shiites Rely On Mahdi Army To Provide Security. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "Shiite militias have been called into Baqubah at the behest of beleaguered Shiites, often arriving from strongholds such as Baghdad's Sadr City to provide protection against a Sunni insurgency that has driven thousands of Shiite families from their homes. 'The Shiites get pushed around by Sunnis, and JAM shows up,' says the officer. JAM, or Jaish al-Mahdi, is also known as the Mahdi Army militia, which is loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr,

Will Says Saddam's Execution Exposed Iraq's "Barbaric Sectarianism." In his column for Newsweek (1/15, 3.12M) George Will writes, "The hanging of Saddam Hussein…may have been a tipping point. The video, which The Economist said resembled 'the sordid snuff videos circulated on the internet by al-Qaeda,' may have been, in the scheme of things, just a straw. But coming when it did, it was, for many Americans, perhaps the last straw. In it, they recognized how far into the abyss Iraqi political culture has fallen. The hanging was conducted in the presence of taunting adherents of Moqtada al-Sadr, the loutish cleric whose militia, the Mahdi Army, is a prime example of why post-Saddam Iraq is a thugocracy. The hanging was an episode of bloodthirsty primitivism in the service of barbaric sectarianism. Which is to say, the hanging was an accurate expression of Iraq's civic culture."

Meanwhile, U.S. News and World Report's Fouad Ajami (1/15) writes, "There was mayhem at the gallows, and there was justice at the gallows. … It was said in the Sunni strongholds of Iraq, and in the Arab capitals, that it had been bad form that the dictator had been dispatched at dawn, on the first day of Id al-Adha" but "those protests came from people who had never shed a tear for Saddam's victims. Their loyalties are atavistic: They are motivated by a dread of the Shiites, and by a reflexive, unthinking anti-Americanism."

Lawmakers Break Largely Along Party Lines On "Surge."

NBC Nightly News (1/7, lead story, 3:10, Corke, 9.87M) reported the expected "surge" proposal "sparked heated debate among lawmakers on Capitol Hill" on the Sunday morning political talk shows. Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden was shown saying, "Think about this: Nobody, nobody, has recommended what the President is about to do." Republicans "say more troops are needed." GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "The biggest mistake we could make is to repeat the mistakes of the past and not have enough people on the ground to make a difference."

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/7, Russert) for his response to Bush's anticipated "surge" proposal, Biden said, "There's not much I can do about it. Not much anybody can do about it. He's commander in chief. If he surges another 20, 30, or whatever number he's going to, into Baghdad, it'll be a tragic mistake, in my view, but, as a practical matter, there's no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop.' … I've drafted a resolution of disapproval that is just hortatory, it's – to send to the Senate to try to convince the president that there are significant numbers and members of the United States Senate who think this proposal is a mistake, and hopefully force him to reconsider it."

Graham, on NBC's Meet the Press (1/7, Russert), predicted that "there'll be a lot of support by Republican members. … Even though it may not be politically popular for the moment, I think it is in our best interests long term." Graham added, "The reason Senator McCain and Lindsey Graham and a few others are supporting this when 14 percent of the public supports us, and 80-something percent is against us, is we're thinking about the consequences of a failed state in Iraq. That's more important than 2008. We cannot let this country go into the abyss. Now is the last chance and the only chance we have left to get this right. …

DOJ_NMG_0112911

The biggest mistake we could make as a nation is to listen to Pelosi and Reid doctrine of withdrawing without wondering what happens when we leave."

South Carolina's The State (1/8, Rosen) notes Graham's comments this morning, adding the senator "has broken with Bush on key national security issues in the last two years, most prominently over how the United States should interrogate and prosecute accused terrorist detainees." Now "his support for Bush's anticipated plan to send more troops to Iraq places him at odds with other prominent GOP senators. Sen. Richard Lugar, an Indiana Republican who was replaced by Biden as head of the foreign relations panel, has declined to endorse a troop increase; GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, also eyeing a White House run, called the increase 'folly' and 'Alice in Wonderland' last week."

With the exception of GOP Sen. Trent Lott, who on CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) would not commit to backing Bush's expected "surge" plans, lawmakers broke along party lines on the Sunday talk showed. Said Lott, "I want to see what the [President's] plan is. I think it makes sense to wait. I think a lot of people are anticipating everything the President may propose. They may be surprised."

As the Washington Post (1/8, A4, Tyson, 690K) notes "Republican lawmakers…voiced general support for the Bush plan as outlined, although they acknowledged it will be controversial and unpopular." For example, asked on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume) if he believes his Republican Senate colleagues will "go along" with Bush's plan, Sen. Mitch McConnell predicted, "There will be some who will and some who won't. … At the end of the day, though, I don't think Congress will cut off money for the troops. Congress is incapable of micromanaging the tactics in the war. And even though this will be a controversial step, I think the president will be able to carry it out, and I hope he'll be successful. … I don't think the President should be criticized for, A, recognizing that things were not going well and, B, making substantial changes in order to achieve the goal."

CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Minority Whip Roy Blunt, who said, "I think it's a huge mistake…to begin to jump to the commander in chief's job as a member of Congress. And I think my friends Nancy [Pelosi] and Harry [Reid] are making that mistake by thinking they can strategize what's the best thing to happen. What's more important is the mission. And that's what I'm interested in hearing the president talk about is the mission."

CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Sen. Barbara Boxer, who said, "The Congress ought to have a chance to look at this. And frankly, I'd like to have a vote on this, you know, whether we want to escalate the number of troops in there. My own view is, that's the wrong way to go."

Rep. Steny Hoyer, on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume), noted that Democrats "see this simply as an escalation and not a change. Essentially, we've gone up and down on troop levels before. We did so just recently. And when we sent troops into Baghdad, we sort of had community-by-community success but a general escalation, both in violence, sectarian confrontation, and loss of life. So we don't see this as a new policy, and I think it's going to be greeted with great skepticism."

Rep. Charles Rangel, on ABC's This Week (1/7, Stephanopoulos), commented, "I think the public is way ahead of the Congress in saying enough is enough. And the whole idea that we're supposed to tell our children to put themselves in harm's way in order to support a surge, which generals say have nothing to do with the military victory, is going to undercut the President even further."

McCain, Hagel Offer Sharply Different Assessments Of "Surge" Proposal. Newsweek (1/15, Darman, Wolffe, Thomas, 3.12M), in an article titled, "McCain vs. Hagel: Two Views on the War," notes, "War itself is a foreign concept to many solons of Capitol Hill; a small number—perhaps as few as 25 out of 535—have come under fire in combat." Sens. John McCain and Chuck Hagel "are obvious and visible exceptions. … Both men have seen the face of war up close. But on the question of the Iraq war, they are almost mirror opposites." Hagel "is almost angrily dismissive of the idea of sending an additional 10,000 to 20,000 troops to Iraq. … 'will guarantee that there's going to be a lot more American casualties. And there's going to be a lot more animosity by the Iraqis.'" McCain, "by contrast, was almost dispassionate when he told a NEWSWEEK reporter that he wishes to expand the war in Iraq. His attitude was coolly self-assured. 'All of us establish records,' he says about his repeated calls for more troops in Iraq. 'If I was wrong in the beginning, my credibility might be somewhat less now.' McCain suggests that the Bush administration…should have listened to him all along. 'I hate to sound so 'I told you so,' but I've been saying we've got to have a larger Army and Marine Corps for a long, long time.'" Newsweek adds, McCain "can sound a little matter-of-fact about sending young people off to combat."

DOJ_NMG_0112912

Hagel Said To Have Appeal To Conservative Primary Voters. Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (1/15) writes, "The most stunning thing about the Republican campaign so far is the vacuum on the right. While McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney (a moderate Republican until five minutes ago) battle over the centrists in the party, the conservative base that actually determines the nomination remains forlorn. … Pooh-bahs in both parties have convinced the candidates that they have to raise $100 million this year to be competitive. This is nonsense in the Internet age, peddled by consultants who need that booty for their own pockets." Sen. Chuck Hagel "might not run" but "if he does…would be formidable."

Fallon Seen As "Experienced" Officer And Diplomat. The New York Times (1/8, Shanker, 1.16M) reports in a positive article, "A range of military officers at the Pentagon noted that if Adm. William J. Fallon was confirmed by the Senate to the Central Command position, he would be not only the first naval officer to command the region, but also a four-star officer moving between regional combatant commands. Often, such posts are given as promotions to three-star officers." "Senior" sources "said Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates's recommendation of Admiral Fallon, currently in command of all American forces in the Pacific, reflected a wish for seasoned eyes on Afghanistan and Iraq as well as a new focus on regional initiatives to reassure allies and deter adversaries, in particular Iran." Fallon has been both "diplomatic" and "tough" in his Pacific duties: "he volunteered" to apologize to Japan in 2001 after a US submarine accidentally sank a Japanese ship; on the other hand, in the Philippines, "he took the unusual and punitive move of canceling a large annual field exercise with the Philippines over a local judge's failure to honor the bilateral treaty governing protections for American military personnel." The Times predicts that he "can be expected to pay great attention to the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan, but to leave day-to-day operations to the senior commanders on the ground in Baghdad and Kabul, similar to his current relationship as Pacific regional commander to the four-star Army officer in charge of forces just in South Korea."

US, Iraqi Forces Launch "Thundering" Assault On Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Bombers, fighter jets and attack helicopters unleashed a thundering attack today as U.S. and Iraqi soldiers closed in on a web of sunken irrigation canals east of Baghdad, where they believed Sunni Arab insurgents were massing. The pre-dawn strikes shook the ground and sent orange fireballs and thick smoke into the sky. ... About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops are participating in the assault, which includes attack helicopters, tanks and Humvees. Over the past four days, columns of soldiers have pushed through hamlets populated by wheat farmers and sheep herders in a methodical sweep to clear an area full of spider holes, secret tunnels and weapons caches. ... The region is a stronghold of the powerful Al Daini tribe, which includes many disaffected former officers from Saddam Hussein's army."

Five More US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. The AP (1/8, Frayer, Mattar) reports, "The U.S. military said three airmen were killed in Baghdad Sunday by a car bomb, a soldier was killed by small arms fire in Baghdad a day earlier, and another soldier died in combat in western Anbar province on Friday. A British soldier also died in a traffic accident. ... A new battle for Iraq's capital was under way with Iraqi forces mired in gunfights with insurgents and U.S. helicopters hovering over an area where some 30 people died in fighting the previous night."

Nearly 23,000 Iraqis Said To Be Killed In 2006. The Washington Post (1/8, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "More than 17,000 Iraqi civilians and police officers died violently in the latter half of 2006, according to Iraqi Health Ministry statistics, a sharp increase that coincided with rising sectarian strife since the February bombing of a landmark Shiite shrine. In the first six months of last year, 5,640 Iraqi civilians and police officers were killed, but that number more than tripled to 17,310 in the latter half of the year, according to data provided by a Health Ministry official with direct knowledge of the statistics. ... Last year's spike in casualties occurred despite an ambitious U.S. military operation in the capital, Together Forward ... Iraq's death toll from violence is controversial because it provides a vivid report card on the difficulty of U.S. and Iraqi efforts to bring order to the country. Neither the U.S. government nor the military provides death totals for Iraqis." Although Health Ministry statistics are considered more reliable, "because they are based solely on death certificates ... The ministry is under the control of the Shiite religious party of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is behind much of the sectarian killing."

DOJ_NMG_0112913

Increased Violence Slows Supply Lines In Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (1/8, Barrett, 59K) reports from the Kuwaiti-Iraqi border, "More than 200 18-wheelers wait to cross into Iraq. Braving Sunni insurgents, Shiite militias, and criminal gangs, these trucks are vital links in the supply chain that keeps some 130,000 US military personnel in Iraq afloat. ... A stark reminder of the perilousness of the 400-mile journey from here to a US logistics hub in Iraq came last week in a videotape of five kidnapped security contractors." Violence has increased on the route; "It's worse than before ... [the trucks] come under fire more frequently," said an anonymous Pakistani businessman. The Monitor adds, "And with the possibility of increasing US forces by some 20,000 combat troops seeming more likely, the supply route from Kuwait will be ever more vital." British professor Paul Rodgers "says that a more substantial US combat presence in Iraq could cause insurgents to avoid direct confrontation and intensify attacks on supply lines."

Two More Saddam Co-Defendants Await Execution. The AP (1/8, Frayer, Mattar) reports, "Two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants were taken from their cells and told they were going to be hanged on the same day the former dictator was executed, their lawyer said Sunday. But the two condemned men still await death as Iraqi officials decide how to avoid the kind of outcry that followed Saddam's hanging on Dec. 30." The two are "Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief Barzan Ibrahim and the former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar." A defense attorney for them said of the delay, "Their execution should be commuted under such circumstances because of the psychological pain they endured as they waited to hang." Human Rights Watch "said the speedy trial and subsequent execution of Saddam and those planned for Ibrahim and al-Bandar illustrated the Iraqi government's disregard for human rights."

Professor Decries Saddam's Hanging. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M), medical professor Abraham Verghese writes, "Saddam's hanging disturbs us because it was perverse, vengeful, furtive, hasty, carried out under cover of darkness and in front of a hoarse, excitable male audience who acted as if they were at a carnival, or, to be more precise, as if they were at a lynching. ... With the video I felt just as I did as a child witnessing an actual hanging: That the condemned man gets perverse revenge because there is a shame that accompanies such a spectacle; it spreads and stains all who are there, all who drive by, all who watch it on television, or who, like me, download it with a click of the mouse; the killer being executed has suddenly become noble, and turned us into killers."

UK's Brown Suggests Iraq Policy Shift. The AP (1/8, Stringer) reports, "Treasury chief Gordon Brown, expected to succeed Tony Blair as prime minister by September, suggested Sunday that he will pursue an Iraq policy that is more independent of Washington than the current government. Brown ... promised to be 'very frank' with President Bush. He also said that Britain is likely to scale down its commitment of troops to Iraq over the next year — even as the White House is considering dispatching thousands more, at least temporarily." Brown's comments on BBC radio "seemed intended to distinguish himself from Blair, who has been criticized in Britain for his strong support for Bush and the war, both unpopular here."

US Agencies Lack Adequate Number Of Arabic Speakers. ABC World News (1/7, story 10, 3:00, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "As the nation debates what to do next in Iraq, tonight, we spotlight one enormous and often overlooked obstacle, a drastic shortage of Americans who speak Arabic. The recent report from the Iraq Study Group found that of the 1,000 Americans at the US Embassy in Baghdad, only 6 are fluent in Arabic. Many critics ask, 'If we can't speak the language in Iraq, how can we improve things?'" ABC noted that "although more and more Americans are studying Arabic at home and abroad…only 10% of US colleges offer Arabic courses. Soldiers heading to Iraq try to learn a few phrases. But critics say the lack of Americans fluent in Arabic is making the US problems in Iraq immeasurably worse." Meanwhile, critics say "that the government needs to make a massive investment in training Arabic speakers, as it did during the cold war training Russian speakers."

Iraqi Soccer Suffers From War Too. The New York Times (1/8, Semple, 1.16M) reports, "Soccer has become an escape from the uncertainty and violence of life, a source of camaraderie and even a binding force of nationalism in a country riven by sectarianism. ... Despite the national team's successes abroad, the sport at home has been fraught with the same uncertainties as the rest of Iraqi life. The professional league halted at the 2003 invasion; play was not resumed until late 2004. Though the stadiums remain remarkably free of violence, fear of attacks has cut into attendance. Ticket revenues and government support have declined, and the stadiums and practice facilities are in poor shape. The best players have fled abroad, seeking safer conditions and more lucrative contracts. ... In recent months, athletes and sports officials have been shot and kidnapped."

DOJ_NMG_0112914

Newborn Babies, Women Killed In Taliban Attack. The New York Times (1/8, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "The Taliban appeared to be resuming their campaign of violence after a week of quiet over the Islamic festival of Id al-Adha. Two newborn babies, their mother and a grandmother were killed in a roadside bombing in eastern Afghanistan as they were returning home from the hospital on Sunday, said the provincial police chief of Khost, Muhammad Ayub, who called the attack 'inhuman.' ... More than 600 civilians have been killed in the past three years, including those killed as a result of operations by NATO, American and Afghan troops as well as attacks by the Taliban and Al Qaeda, the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission reported Sunday. The commission appealed for the military to take more care to avoid civilian casualties and called for compensation to be given to the victims' families."

LATimes Weighs In On Watada Trial. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, 850K) editorializes about the Watada court-martial, "Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada may or may not have a good claim for conscientious objector status. ... But Army lawyers are overreaching when they try to prosecute their case by drafting reporters. ... The Army has his statements, but it subpoenaed reporters to authenticate that he, in fact, said what is in print and on tape. ... No prosecutor should be able to conscript any reporter into being a deputy by compelling testimony about a statement made by a source -- or go fishing for information beyond what a reporter presents in a story --unless it's absolutely vital to protect US citizens from crime or attack."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jobs May Still Face DOJ Scrutiny In Apple Options Probe. Bloomberg (1/8, Gullo, Guglielmo) reports, "Apple Computer Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs, exonerated by the company's board last month in a stock-options scandal, may still face scrutiny from U.S. investigators." Bloomberg continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice may question Jobs as they probe whether current and former Apple executives, directors and others committed fraud by backdating some stock-option awards to inflate their value, said criminal defense attorneys who formerly worked at those agencies." Bloomberg adds, "Apple said Dec. 29 that 6,428 stock options issued between 1997 and 2002 were backdated. That included one grant to Jobs marked as approved at a special board meeting that never occurred. Jobs recommended some favorable dates on options other than his own. Apple, which found 'no misconduct' by Jobs, didn't say which options the CEO backdated or why it faked a board meeting. … 'The SEC and the Justice Department are not bound by the company's conclusions,' said San Francisco-based attorney Jahan Raissi, a former senior counsel in the SEC's enforcement division. 'They have far more powerful tools to force people to talk to get information.'" Bloomberg notes, "Cupertino, California-based Apple, maker of the iPod music player and Macintosh computer, is among the largest of the more than 195 companies embroiled so far in a stock-options scandal that broke last year. … Prosecutors will want to know what Jobs, 51, was told in meetings and in telephone calls and if any advice was given to him by outside attorneys, said Robert Mintz, a white-collar criminal defense attorney in Newark, New Jersey, and former assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey. … A person familiar with the matter said Oct. 5 that federal prosecutors in San Francisco are investigating Apple's backdating of stock options. … The computer maker's revelation that Jobs chose some of the dates for options grants will prompt investigators to explore his role, said William Portanova, a white collar criminal defense attorney in Sacramento, California, and former U.S. prosecutor in California."

Apple Probe Investigator May Have Had Conflicts. USA Today (1/8, 2B, Farrell) reports, "One of the directors in charge of Apple's internal investigation into backdated stock options ran a computer reseller that accounted for about $600 million worth of Apple sales from 2000 to 2003. … That financial relationship, even though it no longer exists, should have disqualified director Jerome York from the assignment, say two corporate governance experts." USA continues, "York, an Apple director for the past 10 years who chairs the board's audit and finance committee, was one of three board members on a committee that oversaw last year's probe into the company's improperly awarded options grants. … In January 2000, York led an investor group that paid more than $700 million to buy Micro Warehouse, a distributor of Macintosh computers and related products. York became chairman and CEO." USA adds, "Over the next three years, according to Apple's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Apple drew about 3% of its annual net sales from Micro Warehouse. York sold the company's assets to CDW in September 2003 for $22 million. … In addition to the history of his business relationship with Apple, York faced another conflict in overseeing the special probe: He sat on Apple's compensation committee during part of the time when Apple now says options were backdated. Apple said York recused himself from that part of the probe. … As head of the compensation committee, York had approved some of the grants that were investigated."

DOJ_NMG_0112915

Apple Attorney Who Backdated Options Was Quietly Fired. The California Recorder (1/8, Scheck) reports, "Steve Jobs is an ideas guy. He wears jeans, grows beards and orates to cheering throngs at events like this week's MacWorld conference. … Jobs' biographers say evidence indicates that he's a pescetarian. He went to India. He takes only $1 a year in salary. And he leaves it up to other people to award him hugely valuable piles of stock in Apple Computer, where he's the CEO." The Recorder continues, "People like Wendy Howell, the former in-house Apple lawyer responsible for option paperwork, probably won't be attending Jobs' eagerly awaited MacWorld speech Tuesday. Late last year, she became the lone person to lose her job as a result of the company's well-publicized options problems. … Howell's name hasn't been publicly mentioned in the Apple options mess, and her firing wasn't disclosed by the company in its series of public disclosures of options problems. … But she was the person who filled out the paperwork on a 2001 option award to Jobs that has grown infamous since just after Christmas, when Apple acknowledged that the value of the grant was artificially pumped up via a set of fabricated meeting minutes." The Recorder notes, "Howell's role was detailed by various people familiar with the situation, all of whom refused to be named because of the federal government's ongoing criminal and regulatory probes of Apple. … As the person who wrote out those 'minutes,' Howell has become a central figure in the Apple probe -- both as a potential defendant in a fraud case and as someone who could tell the government who at the company knew about backdating and its financial and legal implications."

FCC Expected To Issue New Rules On Phone Records Protection. USA Today (1/8, 1B, Davidson) reports, "Four months after Hewlett-Packard's spying scandal, the Federal Communications Commission is expected within weeks to set new rules protecting personal phone records from unauthorized disclosure." USA continues, "The move follows last summer's revelations that investigators for Hewlett-Packard used deception to obtain the phone records of board members and reporters in an effort to identify the sources of news leaks about company matters." USA adds, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin is recommending the FCC order land-line and wireless phone carriers to require that customers use a password to immediately obtain their calling records from a representative by phone, FCC officials say. … Customers also could obtain their records without a password by asking phone companies to send the information to their home addresses, or having a phone company representative call them back at their home or cellphone number of record." USA notes, "A majority of the FCC's five commissioners support the proposal, though some details could be modified before the new rules are approved in the next few weeks, agency officials say."

Goal Of CEO Pay Critics Said To Be "Social Responsibility." In a USA Today op-ed (1/8, 19A), Yaron Brook, executive director of the Ayn Rand Institute, says, "Critics of CEO pay are lampooning the $210 million Robert Nardelli received after a disappointing six-year tenure at Home Depot." But by "what right does the government, or anyone else, claim the power to dictate what owners of Home Depot or any other private company can pay someone to run their company? It's their company. If through error or irrationality they overpay (or underpay, and so fail to attract good managers), as Home Depot may have done, the loss is theirs." Critics "of CEO pay agitate for ever more control over corporate governance. They are not concerned with corporate wealth creation, but with 'corporate social responsibility' — the idea that executives and shareholders should be forced to sacrifice money-making for the sake of sundry 'stakeholders.'"

Herbert Says Wealth Distribution Inequities "Pervasive." In his New York Times (1/8, 1.16M), Bob Herbert says, "Data recently compiled by the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston offers a startling look at just how out of whack executive compensation has become." According to "the center's director, Andrew Sum, the top five Wall Street firms (Bear Stearns, Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, Merrill Lynch and Morgan Stanley) were expected to award an estimated $36 billion to $44 billion worth of bonuses to their 173,000 employees, an average of between $208,000 and $254,000, 'with the bulk of the gains accruing to the top 1,000 or so highest-paid managers.'" The "pervasive unfairness in the way the great wealth of the United States is distributed should be seen for what it is, an insidious disease eating away at the structure of the society and undermining its future."

DOJ_NMG_0112916

CRIMINAL LAW:

States Tap Texas' Execution Expertise. USA Today (1/8, 16A, Johnson, Willing, 2.27M) reports that when New Mexico executed convicted murderer Terry Clark on November 6, 2001, the "executioner who carried out the death sentence was an unidentified contractor who learned how to administer a deadly chemical cocktail as a member of the lethal injection team in Texas, which operates the nation's busiest death house." The "outsourced execution, and others like it, has drawn attention to Texas' growing reputation as the nation's source for behind-the-scenes guidance and experience in carrying out lethal injections at a time when that method of execution is increasingly under fire. As lawsuits from California to Florida have challenged the constitutionality of lethal injections, more than a dozen states and the federal government have sought Texas' advice in carrying out such executions."

Bush May Address Homicide Wave In State Of The Union. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Sullivan, 2.03M) reports 2006 "is expected to snap a long stretch of relatively good news on the homicide front nationwide, moving questions about the causes of crime increases off the back burner they have occupied for more than a decade. … The numbers are causing more than a little alarm and getting more than a little attention-from the nation's police chiefs, from Congress, from the Justice Department, perhaps even from the president in his State of the Union speech later this month. Slowly but surely, violent crime is returning to the national agenda. Nationwide murder totals for 2006 will not be available until the fall, when the FBI releases its annual Uniform Crime Report. But an analysis by U.S. News shows a substantive, if uneven, increase in homicide in the nation's 20 largest cities. The 19 cities for which data were available had 4,152 homicides in 2006, compared with 3,919 the previous year-a 6 percent increase."

Judge To Consider Access To Jeffs Evidence At Hearing Today. The AP (1/8, Dobner) reports, "When a Cadillac Escalade ferrying polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs was pulled over in Nevada in August, authorities found $54,000 cash, 15 cell phones, portable radios, wigs and four laptops. The documents stored on those computers was to be the subject of a legal tug-of-war Monday as Jeffs' attorneys try to convince a judge that the laptops contain privileged communication between the spiritual leader and his followers." The AP notes, "Attorneys for the United Effort Plan Trust, which holds $110 million in church property, and Shem Fischer, a former follower who sued Jeffs after being fired," are seeking "access to papers, letters and electronic documents being held by the FBI. In court documents, Jeffs' Las Vegas attorney Richard Wright contends the information on the laptops is 'sacred and confidential' because it includes matters of church doctrine and private communications between Jeffs and his followers."

The Deseret Morning News (1/8, Winslow) reports, "The 'mother lode' of evidence the FBI seized…will be fought over in a federal courtroom," and "the feds don't seem willing to give it up. 'We will just continue with our same interest in the case,' said Melodie Rydalch, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney for Utah, which is handling the case. 'That is protecting the evidence that can be used in a criminal case.' … FBI agents have told the Deseret Morning News the seized evidence includes ledgers containing names of people who helped keep Jeffs on the run. The FLDS leader was put on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested in a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August 2006."

WSJournal Criticizes Fitzgerald For Not Releasing Reporters' Affidavits. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M) says in an editorial that special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "has some other unfinished legal business that the public has a right to know about -- namely, the affidavits he filed with the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals to justify his motion to compel two reporters to testify about their conversations with Mr. Libby, and his willingness to throw one of them in jail for 85 days until she did so. Those documents remain under seal, which is why Dow Jones and the Associated Press filed a motion with the D.C. Circuit late last month requesting their release." Finding the "leaker was Mr. Fitzgerald's main charge from the Justice Department, so why did he keep pursuing reporters with such hyper-zeal for another two years?"

DOJ_NMG_0112917

Judge Recommends Tightening Defendant Indigency Mechanisms. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/8), Morris B. Hoffman, a a Colorado state trial judge and a fellow at the Gruter Institute for Law and Behavioral Research, writes, "Sixteen years as a state trial judge have left me with a deep respect for the professionalism and competence of the public defenders who handle felony cases for indigent criminal defendants in my courtroom. … So when two economists from Emory University, Paul Rubin and Joanna Shepherd, agreed last year to collaborate with me on an econometric study of how effective public defenders really are, I had to guard against confirmation bias. I was positive that public defenders would prove more effective than their private counterparts. Mr. Rubin and Ms. Shepherd, with their occupational faith in markets, were equally positive of just the opposite. In the end, the economists were right, though with an interesting twist." Hoffman continues, "We looked at all 5,224 felony criminal cases filed in Denver in 2002. … The results were surprising. The average sentence for clients of public defenders was almost three years longer than the average for clients of private lawyers. … But our most notable finding was hidden in one of the variables we had controlled — the seriousness of the case. We had assumed that public defenders on average handled more serious cases than private lawyers, if for no other reason than that such cases carry higher bonds, and defendants who can't make those bonds are often rendered indigent by their pretrial incarceration. The length of their clients' sentences would of course be distorted by the fact that they handle more serious cases with longer potential sentences. … But when we removed the control for the seriousness of the crime, public defenders performed relatively worse, not better (five years more incarceration versus three years more)." Hoffman adds, "It turns out that the explanation, at least in part, is one that should put a smile on the face of all free-marketers and rational choice theorists: criminal defendants, just like any other consumers of services, appear to be making choices based on their rational assessments of costs and benefits. But, you might ask, do criminal defendants ever really have a choice between public defenders and private counsel? It appears many do. … Our data suggested that, contrary to the law's rather binary notion of indigency, a large chunk of felony criminal defendants are what we have called 'marginally indigent.' They could, if they had to, tap hidden resources, or the resources of family and friends, to retain private lawyers. But what drives that decision? Just what you'd expect from any rational consumer of criminal defense services: a combination of the seriousness of the offense and the likelihood of conviction." Hoffman concludes, "If self-selection by guilty, marginally indigent defendants is driving a big part of this effectiveness difference, the remedy may simply be to tighten the mechanisms we use to determine indigency. This solution would not only reduce the outcome differences between public defenders and private defense lawyers, but it would also give taxpayers more bang for their public defender buck."

CIVIL LAW:

Plame Denied Permission To Write About Her CIA Role. Newsweek (1/15, Isikoff, 3.12M) reports, "A CIA panel has told former officer Valerie Plame she can't write about her undercover work for the agency, a position that may threaten a lucrative book project with her publisher. … In what could be a precursor to a separate legal battle, Plame recently hired a lawyer to challenge the CIA Publications Review Board, which must clear writings by former employees. The panel refused Plame permission to even mention that she worked for the CIA because she served as a 'nonofficial cover' officer (or NOC) posing as a private businesswoman, according to an adviser to Plame."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Smaller Version Of Taser Goes On Sale For Private Use. USA Today (1/8, 1D, Davis) reports, "Taser International today unveils a new model of its controversial stun gun designed for widespread use by regular folks. It's more affordable and small enough to be stashed in a purse or backpack." USA continues, "Critics and supporters have a lot to say about the sleek device unveiled at the 2007 International Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas. The size of a TV remote control, the Taser C2 goes on sale in April for about $300 and comes in the metallic pink, electric blue and titanium silver of popular cellphones. … Opponents say Tasers can be used for torture; supporters say the devices are safe when used appropriately." USA adds, "Taser has sold about 120,000 civilian versions since 1994, a model that is larger than the latest incarnation and shaped like a gun. Since 1991, Taser has sold more than 200,000 devices to law enforcement. Both shoot barbs that pierce the skin and deliver an incapacitating jolt of electricity. Current civilian models cost about $1,000. … Taser says the C2, less powerful than the police version, is designed to stun for 30 seconds, providing enough time for the shooter to flee from danger. … The Taser C2 has some police worried. 'There are concerns in law enforcement about the public having access to these types of weapons,' says Wendy Balazik, spokeswoman for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. 'Those concerns include: Who is buying them? How are they going to be used? What are they going to be used for?'"

DOJ_NMG_0112918

NYTimes Urges Congress To "Fix" Electronic Voting Machines. The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "There is by now no doubt that there are serious problems with electronic voting machines: they fail to record votes, and even flip votes from one candidate to another. Election officials like to defend the machines by noting that they have been certified by independent testing labs. But the certification process has long been deeply flawed, and last week there was even more disturbing news — that the leading testing lab has been unable to meet the federal government's standards." Since last summer, "Ciber Inc., the largest tester of voting machine software, has been unable to meet federal quality standards that will take effect later this year." The Election Assistance Commission, "the agency that evaluates the labs, did not reveal that Ciber fell short, and is still not saying what is wrong." Congress should "pass legislation fixing the system. The vendors should continue to pay the costs, but the government should choose and pay the labs. That would make the labs responsive to the correct customer — the public."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Antitrust Division Defends Performance. The Legal Times (1/8, McLure) reports, "For more than two years, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division has been trying to shake the perception that it's been snakebitten. … It's a perception that Thomas Barnett, the head of the Antitrust Division, isn't happy about. 'I don't agree with it,' Barnett says, before ticking off what he views as the division's major merger challenges over the past year: a pretrial settlement with a dairy company protecting competition in milk sales to a number of schools in Kentucky and Tennessee, a consent decree with Mittal Steel Co. requiring it to sell a Canadian tin plant as part of its purchase of Arcelor S.A., and another consent decree requiring the sale of six generating plants as part of a merger between two power companies — a deal later blocked by New Jersey state officials. … Those actions, of course, are hardly of the magnitude of Oracle-PeopleSoft, the challenge to which Barnett helped oversee as a deputy to then-antitrust chief R. Hewitt Pate. And Barnett, who was confirmed as the division's assistant attorney general in February, is sensitive to criticism that his division hasn't been vigorously protecting consumers or playing an active role in public policy." The Times notes, "Late last month the Justice Department issued a release touting the Antitrust Division's achievements during his first year on the job. (Before his confirmation, Barnett served as the division's acting chief for several months.) The release highlights the division's continued crackdown on international price-fixing cartels (which netted nearly $500 million in criminal fines in 2006), its streamlining of the merger review process, and the division's recent spurt of activity before the Supreme Court (the high court has granted cert in seven antitrust cases over the past two terms, an unusually high number) as evidence that its lawyers have been anything but inactive. … Despite those activities, it's the division's merger-enforcement activity — or relative lack thereof — that is most notable to many antitrust lawyers in private practice. Behind the cautious approach, say these practitioners, is more than just conservative economic thinking about the role of government in the marketplace, but a fear of bringing another big case to trial and losing."

US Conducting Security Review Of European Telecom Venture. The Financial Times (1/8, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The US government conducted a national security review of the proposed $21bn (€16.1bn) joint venture agreement between Nokia and Siemens, and forced the European telecoms equipment makers to sign a 'mitigation agreement' that imposed restrictions on the new company." The Times continues, "While the US has hitherto shown keen interest in foreign takeovers of US telecoms carriers, the decision to probe the joint venture indicates a new trend. … Agencies involved in the national security review process – especially the departments of defence, homeland security and justice – are intensifying their scrutiny of companies that make components for mobile and fixed-line networks globally." The Times adds, "People familiar with the classified national security review by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US – Cfius – the inter-agency panel that investigates foreign takeovers of US assets for possible security threats, said the panel had imposed security requirements on the venture. These include procedures that dictate whether foreigners can work on US equipment and software. … But the government's interest in the industry – reinforced by the tough measures it imposed on Alcatel's merger with Lucent – raises questions about whether the inter-agency panel is going beyond its mandate of identifying and preventing risky foreign takeovers. … The mitigation agreement, or conditions to which a company agrees to gain regulatory clearance, could set a precedent in an industry that is bracing for consolidation globally."

DOJ_NMG_0112919

ENVIRONMENT

Democrats Target Minerals Management Service Over Oil And Gas Royalties. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A6, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "With Democrats controlling Congress, the oil industry is in for a rough ride," as is the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which "Democrats and some Republicans" complain as mishandled the program for collection of royalties for oil and gas drilling on federal lands. The "issue will hit the spotlight Jan. 18, when the House takes up energy legislation targeting oil-industry subsidies. One goal: untangling a legal mess that could allow companies to escape paying at least $10 billion in future royalties for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. As part of the debate, congressional critics are sure to ramp up their complaints about the service, which has said that it failed to include a clause requiring the royalties into leases issued in 1998 and 1999." The "department is scrambling to try to assuage critics. C. Stephen Allred, an assistant secretary at the Interior Department who oversees the service, announced Dec. 14 that five oil companies...had agreed to amend their leases to begin paying royalties on oil and gas produced since Oct. 1, 2006, but not before. Dozens of other companies haven't agreed to change the leases."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

San Francisco Area Has Highest Percentage Of Regular Drug Users. USA Today (1/8, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports the San Francisco metropolitan area "has a higher percentage of people who are regular drug users than any other major metropolitan area in the USA, a study from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration found." Nearly "13% of San Francisco residents reported using some type of illicit drug, such as marijuana, cocaine or heroin, in the previous month, according to data from the National Surveys on Drug Use and Health 2002-05. The national average is 8.1%." USA lists "other areas with drug-abuse rates higher than the national average" such as "Seattle, 9.6%; Detroit, 9.5%; Philadelphia, 9.1%; and Boston, 8.5%. Cities with the lowest drug use: Houston, 6.2%; and Washington, Dallas and Riverside/San Bernardino, Calif., all at 6.5%."

Three "Operation Highstep" Suspects Face Charges In Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Coen) reported three men "extradited from Colombia have appeared in federal court in a drug- smuggling case, marking what is thought to be the first time defendants have been sent from that country to face charges in Chicago in at least a decade. They were among eight people indicted here in 2005 in connection with Operation Highstep, which cracked down on a nationwide ring of smugglers bringing heroin and cocaine into the U.S. hidden in furniture, the frames of paintings and the soles of shoes." The DEA "said the case was a unique effort. 'The extradition of these defendants is an example of a successful law enforcement partnership,' said Gary G. Olenkiewicz, special agent in charge of DEA's Chicago Field Division."

"Operation Director's Cut" Leads To 20-Year Sentence For Financial Services Executive. The Washington Times (1/6, Seper) reported a two-year investigation "involving an international Ecstasy and weapons-trafficking organization with Hollywood connections has netted its first prison sentence: a 20-year term for an executive of a Swiss-based financial, business and consulting service. Alexandre De Basseville, 36, of Switzerland and Los Angeles, an executive board member of ADB Swiss S.A., which owns the Los Angeles-based Limelight Films Inc., was sentenced…by U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee. … De Basseville and his co-defendant, Bruno Cavelier d'Esclavelles, 45, of Los Angeles, were arrested as part of the Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA) 'Operation Director's Cut' after a two-year undercover investigation into international money laundering." Rusty Payne "said authorities also arrested Fabian Pruvot, 37, Andre Prikazhikov, 31, and Brian Delansky, 33, all of Los Angeles."

DOJ_NMG_0112920

Lawyers, Others In Rhode Island Face Charges In Drug-Deal Scheme. The AP (1/6) reported two lawyers, "including the brother of the mayor of corruption-plagued Providence, offered to set up a drug deal so clients could get a lighter sentence by alerting authorities, according to an indictment unsealed Friday. The Boston-based federal grand jury named John M. Cicilline, 49, brother of Mayor David Cicilline, and Joseph Bevilacqua Jr., 57, a disbarred lawyer who worked with John Cicilline. Also charged with conspiracy were paralegals and interpreters Lisa Torres, 39, and Juan Giraldo, 41. John Cicilline and Torres were also charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal investigators." According to the indictment, "Bevilacqua told Mendonca that if he was willing to pay several hundred thousand dollars, Bevilacqua could arrange for someone to tell federal authorities about drug shipments _ but that Mendonca and his wife would get credit for the information. Defendants who cooperate with federal prosecutors are eligible for reduced prison sentences."

Audit Finds Problems With DEA Accounting Of Seized Funds. The Washington Times (1/8, Seper, 88K) reports, "About $616 million seized by the US Drug Enforcement Administration during investigations is 'at risk' because the agency has failed to 'consistently implement and document controls' over the cash, according to a government audit." The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General "said the accounting failures discovered by its auditors 'can lead to discrepancies in the amount of cash seized and counted, accusations of theft and misappropriation of seized cash.'"

Mexican Drug Cartels Strengthen Presence In Peru. In Lima, the Dallas Morning News (1/7, Corchado) reported that authorities say Mexican drug cartels, "once regarded mainly as couriers for South American cocaine producers, have spread their powerful tentacles deep into this Andean nation, sowing violence and nourishing the re-emergence of Shining Path guerrillas. … The Mexicans ship cocaine loads by boat to the Mexican coast, then up to the border with California or Texas, with its coveted Interstate 35 northbound corridor, Peruvian officials and experts said. South Texas remains the leading entry area for cocaine smuggled into the U.S., according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration."

IMMIGRATION:

US Halts Deportation Proceedings Against Brazilian Couple. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A6, Jordan) reports, "The U.S. government has terminated deportation proceedings against a Brazilian couple and their disabled son who were the subjects of a page-one profile in The Wall Street Journal last month, giving the family another shot at winning the right to live here permanently." The Journal continues, "The case of Zandro Souza and his family raised questions about whether the U.S. should grant permanent legal residency to immigrants who might one day prove to be a financial burden. Mr. Souza, who rose in six years from dishwasher to chef at upscale eateries, was pursuing legal residency in the U.S. for his family and had the sponsorship of an employer. … The family's four-year application process hit a snag during an interview with an immigration official who requested proof that Mr. Souza's son, Igor, who is blind and developmentally delayed, wouldn't become a 'public charge' if his parents died." The Journal adds, "After questioning the family about its future means of support, the agency issued a green-card denial that cited another reason for the family's rejection: namely, that it entered the U.S. on tourist visas with the intent of staying for good, a violation of federal law. In a letter dated Dec. 28, the day after the article appeared, the government withdrew its request for Mr. Souza and his family to appear for a deportation hearing. The memorandum addressed to Mr. Souza states that the government's notice to appear in court was 'improvidently issued' and should be dismissed without prejudice. Thursday, an immigration judge in Boston granted the government's motion to terminate the case. … Shawn Saucier, a spokesman for the federal immigration agency, said there is no guarantee the family would be granted green cards. He said the Souzas and their attorney would be summoned for another interview within a month."

DOJ_NMG_0112921

Hoyer Suggests Bush Will Cooperate With Democrats' On Immigration Reform. Appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume) House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer noted that when he and Speaker Pelosi met with President Bush "one of the things that we brought up -- we didn't discuss substance -- was the immigration bill. And he smiled and he said, 'You know, I think I'm going to have a lot easier time dealing with you on immigration than I had dealing with the House Republican leadership on immigration.' I think that's the case." Also on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume) Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said, "I've been challenging the new Democratic majority not just to do the easy things in the beginning of this session. … And I think there are two things that are very significant that would make a difference for the country. Let's fix the immigration problem, and let's save Social Security. We can do that before this Congress is out." McConnell added, "Divided government is the only way where you can kind of share the blame for doing big things that will sometimes become controversial."

The Washington Times (1/8, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Leaders of both parties say Democrats in Congress are likely to win bipartisan support for many of their signature issues, including passage of an immigration reform package that critics have derided as amnesty." Hoyer "agreed that the House Democrats could work with President Bush on an immigration bill compromise."

Labor's Opposition Could Stall Immigration Overhaul Deal. McClatchy (1/8, Montgomery) reports President Bush's "hopes of securing a comprehensive immigration overhaul have brightened considerably in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, but resistance from organized labor - one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies - could complicate those efforts." The AFL-CIO, "which represents 53 unions with more than 9 million members, is ratcheting up opposition to a temporary guest worker program, a key element of Bush's immigration plan. At the same time, two powerful unions in a breakaway labor coalition, Change to Win, have tended to support the provision." The labor divisions "take on heightened significance as Democrats assume control of the 110th Congress and begin shaping the legislative agenda." AFL-CIO officials say the guest worker program "is designed to give business a steady source of cheap labor and would take jobs from U.S. citizens."

Christian Conservatives Propose Compromise. The Washington Times (1/8, Hurt, 88K) reports a "number of leading Christian conservative groups have formed a coalition on immigration and illegal aliens that will push religiously grounded positions that both sides of the current immigration debate will both love and hate." In letters "sent today and obtained by The Washington Times, Families First on Immigration urges President Bush and leaders of the new Democratic Congress to adopt a grand compromise on the divisive issue that includes strong border security, an amnesty for illegals already here who are relatives of citizens and an end to birthright citizenship." Gary Bauer, "Deal Hudson of the Morley Institute for Church & Culture and David Keene of the American Conservative Union are among those who have joined forces to chart a new path on immigration reform, an issue that conservative Christians have generally avoided."

Growing Number Of Respondents In Immigration Courts Lack Attorneys. The Washington Post (1/8, A1, Brulliard, 690K) reports in a 1500 word story on the dearth of counsel available to respondents in Federal immigration courts, where there are "judges and prosecutors, evidence and witnesses. The consequences can be great: Banishment, separation from family, perhaps persecution at home. But unlike in criminal courts, the government does not provide free lawyers for the poor. And in what court officials deem a great concern, a growing number of people in immigration court have no legal counsel: Of more than 314,000 people whose cases ran their course in fiscal 2005, two-thirds went through on their own, or pro se."

TAX:

BB&T Plans Appeal Of Tax Refund Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, C6, Wells) reports, "BB&T Corp. said it intends to appeal a federal judge's rejection of a refund claim in a tax-shelter dispute with the Internal Revenue Service." The Journal continues, "A U.S. District Court judge for the Middle District of North Carolina ruled for the Justice Department in a case involving BB&T's claim of a $3.3 million tax refund related to a 1997 lease transaction. … The IRS had rejected the refund claim, and BB&T went to court to settle the dispute." The Journal adds, "BB&T spokesman Bob Denham said the Winston-Salem, N.C., bank is still reviewing the judge's opinion. 'We disagree, and we plan to appeal,' he said." The Journal notes, "The leasing transaction involved a controversial "lease in, lease out" arrangement. In 2004, Congress outlawed similar leasing arrangements under which companies bought assets and then leased them back to their prior owners. Such arrangements can produce big tax benefits because depreciation can be claimed on the assets. The IRS in 2005 said it would begin to pursue leasing transactions in court. … Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's tax division, hailed the court decision, saying it shows that 'to have a tax deduction for lease or interest expense, you must actually incur them.' She said the court found in the BB&T case that the lease-in, lease-out tax shelter didn't involve a genuine lease or genuine indebtedness."

DOJ_NMG_0112922

CBO Study Finds The Very Wealthy Benefited The Most From Bush Tax Cuts. The New York Times (1/8, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "Families earning more than $1 million a year saw their federal tax rates drop more sharply than any group in the country as a result of President Bush's tax cuts," according to a CBO study. The CBO also reports that tax rates for "middle-income earners edged up in 2004…while rates for people at the very top continued to decline." According to the Times, the CBO study "reinforced the sense that while Mr. Bush's tax cuts reduced rates for people at every income level, they offered the biggest benefits by far to people at the very top — especially the top 1 percent of income earners. Though tax cuts for the rich were bigger than those for other groups, the wealthiest families paid a bigger share of total taxes." The Times adds that the study "offers ammunition to supporters and opponents of Mr. Bush's tax cuts."

Pelosi Suggests Repealing Tax Cuts To Pay For Education, Health Initiatives. The AP (1/8, Heilprin) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi says Democrats "are not ruling out raising taxes for the wealthiest people to help pay for tax cuts for middle-income families. … She spoke of pursuing an estimated $300 billion that people owe in back taxes, eliminating deficit spending and reducing wasteful federal spending. 'As we review what we get from ... collecting our taxes and reducing waste, fraud and abuse, investing in education and in initiatives which will bring money into the Treasury, it may be that (repealing) tax cuts for those making over a certain amount of money, $500,000 a year, might be more important to the American people than ignoring the educational and health needs of America's children,'" Pelosi said on CBS's Face the Nation. Pelosi, on CBS's Face the Nation (1/07, Schieffer) said, "What we're saying is Democrats propose tax cuts for middle-income families. And we want to have pay-go, no new deficit spending. We're not going to start with repealing tax cuts, but they certainly are not off the table for people making over half a million dollars a year."

Rangel Rejects Speculation That He Plans To Repeal Bush Tax Cuts. The New York Times (1/8, Toner, 1.16M) profiles Rep. Charles Rangel, Chairman of the House Ways and means Committee. The Times notes Rangel "is trying hard to be restrained, about [President] Bush, his administration and his tax cuts. When asked about Mr. Bush's renewed insistence last week that Congress extend those tax provisions, Mr. Rangel paused and said, with almost visible effort, 'Part of what I think is my responsibility is not to be critical of the president.' He brushes off speculation about his party's plans for the Bush tax cuts, many of which have been criticized by Democrats for years as a giveaway to the richest Americans; it is simply premature, he argues, since their expiration date is three years off. Stan Collender, a longtime budget analyst, says it makes no political sense for Congress to 'deal with tax cuts before you have to, certainly not before the 2008 election.'

Novak Describes Conservative Unease Over Paulson, Payroll Taxes. In his column for the Washington Post (1/8, A15, 690K) Robert Novak writes congressional Republicans "ask this question: Will the current President Bush embrace a tax increase that would produce potential economic disaster and guaranteed political catastrophe?" According to Novak, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "has engaged in secret bipartisan talks discussing an increase in the $97,500 limit on personal income subject to the Social Security payroll tax. That would cause a jump in the top marginal tax rate." Paulson "certainly has given the impression in those discussions that he is amenable to raising the payroll tax, but a senior White House aide cautions that this decision has not yet been made." Novak concludes, "The economic woe that would result from higher payroll taxes would be matched by the political damage to the president. … That political calamity can be averted if Bush takes a payroll tax increase off the negotiating table."

Bipartisan Proposal To Eliminate The AMT Panned. The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (1/8, A15) calls the proposal by Sens. Max Baucus and Chuck Grassley to repeal the alternative minimum tax "a prescription so fiscally crazy that not even the Bush administration supports it. … The senators don't want to reform the AMT or link its repeal to wider tax changes; they just want to abolish it. This would destroy the chance to say to voters: Look, we're not going to extend all the tax cuts we gave you in 2001 and 2003, and while we're at it we're going to reduce the mortgage-interest deduction and other egregious loopholes so that we can collect more revenue without discouraging work by raising your tax rates. But wait, don't get too mad; at least we're going to kill the AMT for you."

DOJ_NMG_0112923

Bush Said To Have Given Up On Future Tax Cuts. U.S. News and World Report's "White House Week" feature (1/15, Walsh, Bedard, Mulrine) reports Democrats "saw chicanery," but Republicans "smelled political reality in President Bush's announcement last week that he will seek a balanced budget in five years and an end to pork-barrel politics. Bush, after all, had taken a budget of surplus and turned it into one of deficit, but now he seemed to be adopting the new Democratic majority's fiscal pledges. Insiders at the White House spun it a different way: They said the president had hoped to push for deeper tax cuts in the next and future budgets, but the election of Democratic majorities in the House and Senate killed those plans. Now, they said, the president will submit a budget for fiscal 2008 that will leave little room for new Democratic add-ons without deeply cutting into defense spending or raising taxes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Many Republicans Expected To Back Minimum Wage Increase. ABC World News (1/7, story 4, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Another issue, perhaps the issue that Democrats and Republicans are most likely to find common ground, is increasing the minimum wage." ABC added, "The Democratic Congress wants to increase it to $7.25, over two years. … Today, just 500,000 workers make the current, Federal minimum wage. But more than 6.5 million earn less than the $7.25 that Congress is proposing and would therefore, get a raise." ABC notes, "Although Republicans in Congress have defeated every proposed increase in the last decade, President Bush has signaled he will sign this one into law." President Bush: "I support the proposed $2.10 increase in the minimum wage over a two-year period."

Democrats Will Begin "100 Hours" Program Tomorrow. ABC World News (1/7, story 3, :20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Back to Washington. On Tuesday, Democrats in Congress, plan to kick off a legislative blitz, which they're calling the first 100 hours. This is an ambitious agenda, which includes enacting the recommendations of the 911 Commission, promoting stem cell research, and negotiating lower prescription drug prices."

On Fifth Anniversary, NCLB Seen As Changing Schools. USA Today (1/8, Toppo, 2.27M) reports on the effect of the No Child Left Behind Act on schools after five years, calling it "a cornerstone of Bush's domestic agenda and one of his few truly bipartisan successes." It is also described as "a vast -- and contentious -- book of federal mandates" that "faces a tough future as Congress prepares to reauthorize it." While it is "too early to tell" whether it is "improving education nationwide," the act "has had a major influence on the daily experience of school for millions of kids, by "driving teachers crazy," "narrowing" the curriculum, focusing attention on poor and minority students, adding tutors and "changing how reading is taught."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/8, Paulson, 59K) reports that NCLB has "changed the conversation about education in America, and has focused attention on poor-achieving groups of students who had been overlooked." While noting some proposed changes, it concludes that, "while the conversation is heated, the likelihood that NLCB will be reauthorized this year may be small."

Researcher Suggests Public Schools Could Shift $77 Billion Per Year To Improve Schools. The Washington Post (1/8, Mathews, 690K) reports on an Education Sector finding that "U.S. public schools could have as much as $77 billion more a year to improve teaching if they reduced spending on seniority pay increases, teacher's aides, class size limits and other measures often found in teacher union contracts." These expenses are described as having "a weak or inconsistent relationship with student learning." In response, "teachers union officials sharply disputed the report's findings."

Big-City Mayors Seek To Control Schools. The AP (1/8, Zuckerbrod) reports on the growing movement in large cities for mayoral control of schools noting the current effort by Washington, D.C. Mayor Adrian Fenty and successful mayoral takeovers of the schools in New York, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Harrisburg, Pennsylvania as well as attempts in Los Angeles, Albuquerque, New Mexico, and Seattle. The Mayors "say they are better equipped to take on the infighting, inertia and high turnover rates associated with school boards and the superintendents who report to them."

DOJ_NMG_0112924

Brown University's Ken Wong "analyzed test scores in about a dozen cities with mayors in charge of schools from 1999 to 2003. The results showed modest but statistically significant progress in reading and math for elementary and middle-school students."

Education Department Seeks Change In ABA's Diversity Standard For Law Schools. The Washington Post (1/8, Strauss, 690K) reports U.S. Department of Education general counsel Kent Talbert, "is challenging the American Bar Association's new standard on diversity in enrollment and hiring, which calls for the law schools it accredits to take 'concrete action' to attract more minority students, faculty and staff." ABA officials said that "the department is misinterpreting the standard and pushing an anti-affirmative action agenda." The National Advisory Committee on Institutional Quality and Integrity which is "voted to extend the ABA's role for 18 months rather than the usual five years and required the association to improve the way it carries out the task of accrediting law schools. But the committee dropped the staff recommendation to include any action on the diversity standards." Talbert said that the department "would appeal the decision to leave the standard alone."

Domenici Optimistic That Democrats Will Pass His Mental Health Bill. USA Today (1/8, Elias, 2.27M) reports, "Bills that could expand access to mental health care for Americans stand a better chance of passing with the new leadership that has taken over Congress, key lobbyists and congressional supporters of the legislation say. Their top priority is a bill requiring insurers to offer comparable benefits for treating mental disorders and physical illnesses, known as 'parity.'" Sen. Pete Domenici "introduced three earlier parity bills. 'Now our prospects are the best that they've ever been,' says Matt Letourneau, spokesman for the senator. Although parity has bipartisan support, past legislation stalled in committee because House leadership didn't favor it, says Laurel Stine of the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group."

Chao's Third Public Affairs Chief Resigns After Three Months. Al Kamen, in his column in today's Washington Post (1/8, A13, 690K), reports Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao "is looking for a new public-affairs chief. The incumbent, Randy Clerihue, announced in a Dec. 21 internal e-mail that he was leaving after barely three months in the job. This could set the world indoor record for brevity for a Senate-confirmed position. … His replacement would be Chao's fourth public-affairs chief, not counting an acting chief in the early part of the administration. In the past 18 months or so, public-affairs departures include two deputy assistant secretaries and four press secretaries."

Roberts' "Constitutional Crisis" Claim Criticized. The Washington Post (1/8, A13, Barnes, 690K) reports, "Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. usually knows just the right thing to say, his star turn during his 2005 Senate confirmation hearings being Exhibit A." But "maybe not so with the blandly titled '2006 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary,' issued, as he noted, on the typically slow news day of Jan. 1. He should rest assured that it has been noticed -- and roundly razzed by some in the legal punditry." Roberts "devoted his entire address to the call for a pay raise for federal judges." While "there are plenty of people who agree with Roberts that judicial salaries should rise to attract and retain the brightest in the legal field," Roberts' "description of the issue as a 'constitutional crisis' was too much for some."

After Cost Overruns, Delays, Capitol Visitor Center Nears Completion. USA Today (1/8, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "Two years after its scheduled opening date, and more than double its original price tag, the Capitol Visitor Center inches its way toward completion." It will "take at least six additional months to test more than 5,000 security alarms, sprinklers and other safety devices before the public can enter." When the doors "finally will open to the public is a major point of contention surrounding the project, which was originally scheduled to be finished in 2005." Architect of the Capitol Alan Hantman "predicts a ribbon-cutting this fall, but auditors at the Government Accountability Office say the date will slip. 'We think it's going to be early 2008,' says Terrell Dorn of the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress." USA adds the "other sore point is cost. Government auditors estimate it will be close to $600 million. The original, 1999 price tag: $265 million." Still, even "some of those who have complained the loudest about the project's rising cost and lengthening delays admit to being wowed by the almost-finished result."

DOJ_NMG_0112925

Federal Pay Raise Doesn't Keep Pace With Private Sector. The Washington Post's (1/8, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The annual base pay raise for most federal employees kicks in, increasing the median white-collar government salary in the region to $86,791." The Post adds that while that figure is "not shabby," this "year's increase -- 2.64 percent in the Washington-Baltimore region -- is one of the smallest annual raises in recent years, and the raise doesn't go far in an area where the cost of living runs about 30 percent higher than the rest of the nation." The Post adds, "Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, called the 2007 raise 'very disappointing,'" and she added, "'This time of year especially, as employees are considering career options and deciding whether they want to stay for the long term or the short term, they build that pay raise into their decision-making,' Kelley said. She fears 'more and more will decide that they are going to look elsewhere.'"

Gerson Describes Bush's "Voracious" Reading Habits. The Washington Times (1/8, McCaslin, 88K) reports, "'Anti-elitist' -- That was Michael Gerson, former chief speechwriter to President Bush from 2001 to 2006, discussing the president's 'voracious' reading habits and related perceptions during a guest appearance on C-SPAN's 'Q&A' with Brian Lamb last night. '[A] couple of months ago it was leaked out by somebody that he was reading Albert Camus' 'The Stranger.' Does that track for what you know of George Bush?' asked Mr. Lamb. 'Sure,' Mr. Gerson replied. 'The president is a voracious reader and recommended to me a variety of books when I was at the White House, and gave them to me. He recommended to me ... 'A Godly Hero,' the biography of William Jennings Bryan, a book he'd read. 'Recommended to me ... the book on Martin Luther King and Lyndon Johnson, the relationship between the two men. And he recommended to me the pope's [Benedict XVI] book on relativism.'"

WPost Urges Congress To Nix Agricultural Subsidies. The Washington Post (1/8, A14, 690K) says in an editorial that the "law that authorizes a range of unnecessary and ill-targeted agriculture programs is set to expire in September. So expect fronts for agribusiness, rural banks and farm insurers (and the members of Congress who accept their campaign contributions) to try and sell the same line again this year: Extend the programs or nail the coffin shut on America's heartland. It's about time to nail the coffin on that tired line instead." Federal agricultural payments "are in fact fueling a rapid consolidation of American farms into enormous agribusinesses." Decisions about "who should be farming what and where should be left to the marketplace; the government should not distort the market to push smaller competitors out, especially at the price of $15 billion in annual subsidies."

OTHER NEWS:

Positive Employment Data Worries US Equities Markets. USA Today (1/8, 6B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "Federal Reserve interest rate cuts are looking less likely after U.S. businesses created a stronger-than-expected 167,000 jobs in December and workers' wages rose at a rapid pace. … The good news on jobs was an unwelcome development for some stock traders, who had been betting that the Fed would soon begin trimming interest rates in response to slower economic growth. The Dow Jones industrial average fell more than 82 points to 12,398 in Friday trading.

Weak Dollar Said To Benefit US By Closing Current Accounts Deficit. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A2, Whitehouse, 2.04M) reports, "Last year, the U.S. dollar did what economists had long predicted it would have to do: It fell in value against other currencies. And many believe that if Americans know what is good for them, they should be hoping for more of the same this year. … A weaker dollar would help narrow the [current account] deficit by making U.S. exports more attractive to foreign buyers while making it costlier for Americans to buy products from abroad." According to the Journal, "A tougher question is how far and how fast the dollar needs to fall. Some economists fear a sudden plunge will roil international markets and trigger a U.S. recession. Others believe a slower and more manageable adjustment is under way. They guess it could take a decline of 8% to 25% over as many as 10 years to get the U.S. current-account deficit down to a more sustainable level of 3% of gross domestic product."

US Investors Said To Have Basis For Optimism About 2007. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Lim, 2.03M), as part of its cover package on the economy and investing in the new year, reports, "as 2007 kicks off, economists and market watchers are about as optimistic as they've been in recent memory. Eight out of 10 money managers polled by the Russell Investment Group predict that stocks will post their fifth consecutive positive year. One in three thinks the equity markets will return around 10 percent or more in 2007." U.S. News and World Report (1/15. Pethokoukis, 2.03M) reports, "The worst might also be over in housing. Existing-home sales have risen in back-to-back months, and the damage seems to be relatively contained." The U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Pethokoukis, 2.03M) reports, "according to recent calculations by the Financial Times, the euro…is set to overtake the greenback as the world's most popular currency. But not so fast, Old Europe. What's gotten lost in all the euro hype is that the FT's financial figuring applies to notes in circulation: cold, hard cash. When it comes to currency-denominated assets, the dollar is still king. The United States runs the largest stock and bond markets in the world, and 66 percent of global foreign currency reserves are denominated in dollars-some $2.1 trillion-compared with only 25 percent in euros, according to the International Monetary Fund."

DOJ_NMG_0112926

OPEC Production Cuts Likely To Buoy Oil Prices. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, Pin, 2.04M) reports, "The price of oil may have started 2007 by losing around 8% of its value, but the likelihood of a swift supply response from producers and a series of other factors are likely to underpin the price in the longer term. Though supply will remain steady until [OPEC] cuts output in a few weeks, analysts said expectations of sustained demand and a long list of geopolitical uncertainties will contribute to a firm oil price." The Journal adds, "Crude-oil contracts for February delivery ended a two-day plunge in the U.S. Friday, rising 72 cents, or 1.3%, to $56.31 a barrel -- still off 7.8% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange. The bearish tone has been set in recent days amid an unseasonably balmy winter in key heating regions such as the U.S. and Japan, and at a time when oil-product inventories in these major markets are relatively ample."

Researchers Extract Stem Cells From Amniotic Fluid. ABC World News (1/7, story 9, :35, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Researchers at Harvard and Wake Forest reported today their lab tests showed that amniotic fluid from pregnant women contains stem cells with tremendous medical potential. These cells can be gathered without hurting the mother or the fetus, and would prove much less controversial than research done with embryos."

The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Kaplan, 850K) notes "the finding points to a promising avenue of research that sidesteps the hurdles facing embryonic stem cell research, which has been stymied by moral objections to the destruction of embryos that occurs when the cells are harvested." The study also "suggests another advantage: Unlike embryonic cells, which can form tumors when implanted in lab animals, amniotic fluid stem cells do not appear to do so."

USA Today (1/8, Weise, 2.27M) reports, "Though much research into the safety and effectiveness of these potential embryonic stem cell substitutes still needs to be done, the huge advantage would be that they can be easily harvested from both amniotic fluid as well as placental tissue after a baby is born." The Washington Post (1/8, A1, Weiss, 690K) and Washington Times/AP (1/8, Elias), among other newspapers, also report on the stem cell discovery this morning.

NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 5, 3:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) also noted the "breakthrough." NBC's chief medical editor Dr. Nancy Snyderman said, "It will be interesting to see how the politics kick up. There is a lot of tissue. Fetuses are not going to be harmed at all. Because it is there and scientists will be able to offer it to everyone, this may not be much of a political debate at all."

Analysts Predict Population Shifts Will Continue To Benefit The GOP. The Washington Times (1/8, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Ongoing population shifts from the North to the Sun Belt states will benefit Republicans more than Democrats in future House races and could enlarge the Republican Party's electoral count in presidential elections, political analysts say. … Projections of the number of Americans moving from the Democrat-dominated Northeast to the more Republican-friendly Southern and Western states 'show that seven congressional seats in 13 states have already changed at this point in the decade,' according to an analysis by Election Data Services, a firm that studies how population shifts affect redistricting changes under congressional reapportionment. It forecasts a loss of House seats in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Missouri, Iowa and Louisiana, gains of one seat each in Florida, Georgia, Arizona, Nevada and Utah, and a gain of two seats in Texas. Another analysis shows an even larger 'probable' shift of House seats from the North to the Sun Belt, according to Polidata, a Virginia-based demographic and political research firm. Under these 'probable changes,' 13 seats could shift among 19 states, with eight gainers and 11 losers. 'All the gainers are in the South and West and all the losers are in the East and Midwest except Louisiana,' the Polidata study said. Leading the 'biggest gainers' would be Texas, with four additional seats."

DOJ_NMG_0112927

Biden Says He Will Form Presidential Exploratory Committee This Month. ABC World News (1/7, story 5, :20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The field of Democratic presidential candidates got even more crowded today when Delaware Senator Joe Biden threw his hat into the ring. He has long been clear he was planning to run." NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 6, :20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported Biden "told NBC's Tim Russert on 'Meet the Press' today that he will create an exploratory committee later this month." USA Today/AP (1/8, 10A) reports Sen. Joseph Biden" said Sunday that he is seeking the Democratic nomination for president and thinks he can hold his own against potential high-profile rivals such as fellow Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama." The AP (1/8) reports Biden, "who long has made clear his intentions to seek the White House in the wide-open race, has about $3.5 million in his campaign account. He has campaigned extensively in early voting states such as New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada." Bloomberg (1/8, Sobczyk) notes Biden was "first elected to the Senate in 1972" and became chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week. The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) notes that Biden "also sought the presidential nomination in 1988. But he dropped out of the race after admitting that he had used speeches by other politicians without attribution, and after reports that he had plagiarized while in law school."

Patrick Pledges To Support Kerry In 2008. The Boston Globe/AP (1/8, Johnson) reports that although Sen. Barack Obama "visited Massachusetts three times last year to campaign for" Gov. Deval Patrick" and former president Bill Clinton "appointed Patrick to the top Justice Department civil rights post during the 1990s," Patrick "says he would have to support" Sen. John Kerry if he runs for president again. Patrick is quoted as saying, "I will tell you that if my home senator runs, I've got to be with him. I love the other candidates, but we will see. I don't know that he has made a decision yet."

Edwards May Be Engaging In "Choreographed Candor." In his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (1/8, C1, 690K), Howard Kurtz writes, "John Edwards is ridiculing his political consultants. 'You know, they gave me a really great memo,' he says, waving the document, which advises him to highlight the importance of public education when addressing teachers. 'I pay a lot of money for people who have the expertise to tell me this.' An unscripted moment caught on a cellphone camera? Not exactly. The video of the presidential candidate chatting on his plane is on Edwards's Web site." Edwards "seems unusually frank about the absurdities of political life -- or is this just carefully choreographed candor, packaged for the YouTube age?" Referring to the 2008 campaign, Joe Trippi, "who masterminded Howard Dean's Internet-driven bid in 2003 and 2004," said, "You're going to see reality, and you're going to see savvy manipulation under the guise of something that's authentic and real."

McCain Portrayed As Out Of Step With Conservatives On Key Issues. In a very long -- more than 10,000-word -- profile of Sen. John McCain appearing in Vanity Fair (2/07) Todd Purdum portrays McCain as conflicted over many key social issues , including gay marriage and immigration. Purdum notes "one minute he's toeing the conservative line (on gay marriage, say, or immigration) and the next he's telling someone what he really thinks." Purdum recounts an appearance on MSNBC's Hardball where McCain commented "I think that gay marriage should be allowed. … I don't have any problem with that," but then retracted his statement minutes later after conferring with his advisers. Purdum also describes a McCain appearance in Milwaukee this fall when he was "asked how debate over the immigration bill was playing politically." McCain is quoted as saying, "In the short term, it probably galvanizes our base. In the long term, if you alienate the Hispanics, you'll pay a heavy price." Then he "added, unable to help himself, 'By the way, I think the fence is least effective. But I'll build the goddamned fence if they want it.'" The piece also compares McCain's current campaign strategy with his failed 2000 bid and goes into great detail concerning McCain's numerous health problems.

McCain Campaign Hobbled By His Support For More Troops In Iraq. he Los Angeles Times (1/8, Wallsten, 850K) reports McCain "is putting those military bona fides on the line — aggressively backing an unpopular plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq at a time that other presidential hopefuls are steering clear of the war or calling for troop reductions. … Besides Bush, no politician has more to lose than McCain, the presumed GOP front-runner in 2008 and the plan's biggest backer in Congress. Now that Bush is pursuing the McCain approach, the senator could soon find himself defending the policy to a war-weary public in Iowa, New Hampshire and other key election states where surveys show voters are fed up with rising U.S. casualties. McCain readily admits that the new strategy is likely to result in even more violence." The Times goes on to report that McCain aides "say they have devised no particular strategy for shielding their boss from the political fallout if a troop buildup does not work. In a sense, they said, the senator's stance might serve to remind voters of the kind of straight talk that boosted McCain's popularity in 2000, when he defeated Bush in the New Hampshire primary. 'It doesn't mean that lots of us who work for him and respect him so much don't worry about things like this,' said McCain's longtime chief of staff, Mark Salter. 'I'm sure we do. But there's no game plan for it. There's been no fretting and no meetings.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112928

Many States Plan Expansion Of Health Care Coverage. USA Today (1/8, 1A, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports, "States are planning large expansions in health care coverage this year in an aggressive and potentially expensive attempt to reduce the ranks of the 42.4 million Americans who are uninsured. The states are acting at a time when Congress…has put health care lower on its agenda. Governors and state legislators in both parties and most states have made expanded medical coverage a priority for legislatures. Popular proposals include guaranteeing medical coverage to all children; subsidizing medical insurance at small businesses; and providing tax incentives for businesses and individuals to make coverage more affordable. A few states are considering universal health coverage for all residents. Others are focusing on price competition and preventive care."

NYTimes, LATimes Praise Schwarzenegger's Universal Child Health Care Initiative. The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Guaranteed health care for children is the new political apple pie. No one can say he is against it, and it's a sure applause line for politicians who want to show concern for reducing the number of uninsured in America. But special recognition is due California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, who is reportedly ready to begin his new term with an actual proposal that his state insure all children. And by all, he means undocumented immigrants, too. The proposal seems a challenge to fellow Republicans, and even to much of the state's Democratic leadership. Predictably, anti-immigrant groups said that including all children would cost billions more than the $400 million experts estimate. In truth, the idea is economical and, if anything, quite modest."

The Los Angeles Times (1/8, 850K) editorializes, "The governor's inaugural address Friday was one of the best in state history, infused with California pride and optimism, and was the most eloquent speech of his career. … Today he is to deliver an address on healthcare, unveiling a proposal to extend medical care and insurance coverage to many, perhaps most, of the state's 6.5 million uninsured. It's the kind of speech that can't rest on lofty calls to work together. It must delve into the details of a thorny and politically divisive issue."

Schwarzenegger To Propose Welfare "Rollback." The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Halper, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "will propose a major rollback of the state's welfare system this week, including a cutoff of aid to tens of thousands of children whose parents do not meet minimum work requirements or are in the country illegally, administration officials said Sunday." The "proposed $465-million reduction in California's welfare budget came two days after the governor promised that his second term would feature 'post-partisan' cooperation." The move "was met immediately with resistance from Democrats, who expressed bewilderment that the governor would attempt to cut welfare aid to children in the same week his administration is expected to move forward with a plan to expand health insurance to many of the same children."

Schwarzenegger Wants California To Play Prominent Role In 2008 Primaries. Newsweek (1/15, Breslau, 3.12M) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "plans on influencing the 2008 election. Schwarzenegger says he'd like to move the California primary from June…to a much earlier date, in February. … The governor hopes the change will encourage candidates to spend more time talking to voters in the nation's most populous state, instead of 'sucking us dry for money' at fund-raisers." Newsweek notes Schwarzenegger "is coy about expressing his support for any particular candidate. … His top campaign strategist recently went to work for" Sen. John McCain. And he "says he would

DOJ_NMG_0112929

'encourage' New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg…to run too."

Schwarzenegger Said To Be Considering 2010 Senate Run. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (1/15, Bedard) reports, "There's growing buzz in Washington and California that…Schwarzenegger likes this government stuff so much that he's got his eye on the Senate. Specifically, the seat held by Sen. Barbara Boxer, who's up for re-election in 2010."

Georgia Legislator Seeks To Strip McKinney's Name From Highway. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Jarvie, 850K) reports that in Atlanta, "where the average commute lasts 31.2 minutes and drivers have no shortage of bottlenecks and wrecks to grumble about, a Republican state lawmaker is exercised about a different kind of transportation issue: Cynthia McKinney Parkway." Georgia Rep. Len Walker "cannot abide driving along a suburban highway honoring Georgia's former Democratic congresswoman." A "week after McKinney filed her final congressional measure — a resolution to impeach President Bush — Walker pre-filed a bill in the Georgia Legislature to strip McKinney's name from the street and restore the name Memorial Drive." Walker's bill "has slim chance of passing," but "his effort has struck a chord among critics of McKinney, who lost her bid for a seventh term in the summer's Democratic primary after a high-profile altercation with a Capitol Hill police officer."

Former President Bush Discharged After Hip Replacement. The AP (1/8) reports former President George H.W. Bush "has been released from the Mayo Clinic after undergoing successful hip replacement surgery, the clinic said." The "82-year-old former president was discharged from the clinic on Saturday, following the operation on his right hip that was performed Wednesday, the Mayo Clinic said on its Web site."

WPost Backs Effort To Allow Virginia Governors Two Terms. The Washington Post (1/8, A14, 690K) says in an editorial, "For 15 years or so, and in various forms," Del. Harry R. "Bob" Purkey, "a Virginia Beach Republican, has tried to coax the commonwealth into the modern age by doing away with the rule prohibiting sitting governors from running for reelection. He and his allies have come close." Now Purkey "and his fellow Republican legislators are in negotiations with Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), and both sides appear serious about a compromise." This year, "after so many failed attempts, let's hope Mr. Purkey's efforts are not in vain."

Israel Denies Planning Attack On Iran. The Washington Times/AP (1/8, Stringer) reports the Sunday Times of London published an article Sunday claiming "that Israeli pilots were training to strike targets in Iran with low-yield nuclear weapons, but Israel swiftly denied the report and analysts expressed doubts about its reliability." Citing "unidentified Israeli military sources," the newspaper "said the proposals drawn up in Israel involved using so-called 'bunker-buster' nuclear weapons to attack nuclear facilities at three sites south" of Tehran. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office "declined to comment on the report," but foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev denied the report, saying, "If diplomacy succeeds, the problem can be solved peaceably." AFP (1/8) also quotes Regez as saying Israel is "100 percent behind the international community's efforts to bring about an end to Iran's nuclear program. Israel totally supports Resolution 1737 and the international community must be ready to take even tougher measures against Iran."

Abbas To Seek Early Elections Despite Hamas Objections. The New York Times (1/8, A9, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "told Fatah political leaders in Bethlehem on Sunday that he intended to proceed with his demand for early presidential and parliamentary elections, and that he had lost hope in negotiating a unity government with Hamas." Abbas also said Saturday that he was making changes to his security personnel. While he "did not make clear who would hold the top post, the United States has been urging him to appoint Muhammad Dahlan, the former security chief in Gaza, to lead all security forces in the Palestinian Authority." However, the Times says Dahlan is "especially despised by Hamas, and he is not especially popular among many other Palestinians, who believe that he is corrupt and too close to the United States and Israel." Meanwhile, Fatah held "a large rally on Sunday in a Gaza City sports stadium, marking the group's 42nd anniversary with a show of strength and defiance after days of bloody clashes" with Hamas.

Fatah, Hamas Continue To Battle. The AP (1/8, Daraghmeh, Barzak) reports, "Geography is playing a big role in the violent Palestinian power struggle: When Hamas attacks in its stronghold in the Gaza strip, its rival Fatah retaliates in the West Bank, where it holds sway." Fatah "says its dominance of the West Bank holds Hamas in check and could keep the lid on what some fear will turn into a full-scale civil war in Gaza. But to maintain that dominance, Fatah militants in the West Bank have resorted to new tactics -- including kidnapping government officials and shooting Hamas sympathizers at random."

DOJ_NMG_0112930

US Sends Military Advisers, Weapons To Boost Somalis. USA Today (1/8, 10A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports the US has "quietly poured weapons and military advisers into Ethiopia, whose recent invasion of Somalia opened a new front in the Bush administration's war on terrorism." The US and Ethiopian militaries have "a close working relationship," Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter said, including intelligence sharing, arms aid and training that gives the Ethiopians "the capacity to defend their borders and intercept terrorists and weapons of mass destruction."

UN Urged To Extend Presence In Somalia. The Financial Times (1/8, Turner, England, Dinmore) reports, "Western and African powers in Nairobi last week described the defeat of Somalia's Islamic Courts by Ethiopian-backed forces as a 'historic opportunity' to rebuild the shattered horn of Africa country, and put an end to the 'warlordism' that has torn apart efforts at political reconciliation since the 1990s. But a history of botched intervention in the world's most failed of failed states leaves few doubts that fixing Somalia poses a severe challenge to the world's peacekeeping systems, and may yet embroil Ban Ki-moon, the new UN secretary-general, in one of the first major challenges of his tenure." The UN's peacekeeping department is "already overstretched with almost 100,000 troops in 18 operations, and there is little appetite for a UN mission in Somalia after the ill-fated operation of the early 1990s." Therefore, officials and diplomats "have been keen to encourage alternatives to traditional peacekeeping, such as providing international support to regional groups such as the African Union (AU), and are trying to develop an African standby force for such situations."

Somalis Struggle To Establish Control, Provide Security. The New York Times (1/8, A5, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports town elders in Somalia "are struggling with the same questions: how to provide security; what to do with the remaining Islamists; how to determine the proper role for religion, an important theme in Somali society; and how to unify rival clans, rebuild infrastructure and live with the Ethiopians." Meanwhile, the new Somali government "made disarmament its first step but despite meetings, pleas, deadlines and threats, officials have collected few weapons. In Mogadishu, hundreds of people rioted Saturday at the prospect of house-to-house searches," which "led Jendayi E. Frazer, the United States assistant secretary of state for Africa, to cancel a planned trip to Mogadishu on Sunday."

The AP (1/8, Kennedy) reports Frazer has "stressed that the US will provide only a support role," saying, "Some people would like the United States to lead on this issue. I would prefer that we lead from behind, and what I mean by that is pushing the Somali people first, pushing the sub-region next and then mobilizing the resources of the international community."

Expert Urges US To Play Active Role In Somalia. Jonathan Stevenson, a professor of strategic studies at the United States Naval War College, writes in the New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) that "unless America plays a constructive role in Somalia's next stage, the conflict could become a regional war and a new field of jihad." Stevenson says the "temptation in Washington will be to keep its distance and rely on Ethiopia, the European Union and Kenya for as long as possible," however, "neither the American public nor the world believe that the Bush administration's predominantly military approach to counterterrorism is working. Relying primarily on Ethiopian troops to tamp down Somali Islamism would represent a continuation of that flawed model, and of the corresponding risk of fueling the jihad." Instead, he suggests that the US' "full participation in a diplomatic process in the Horn of Africa, on the other hand, would constitute a relatively low-cost way of signaling a new American approach to Islam and a re-engagement in sub-Saharan Africa., which has largely been left out of Washington's post-9/11 calculus."

Richardson Optimistic For Breakthrough On Darfur. The AP (1/8, Pickler) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "got a bleak assessment Sunday of the deteriorating situation in Darfur, but expressed optimism for a breakthrough" with the Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. Richardson "heard disturbing reports of rape, death and corruption from the top US diplomat in Sudan and humanitarian workers, but said he was not deterred from the challenge of trying to help bring peace where years of international efforts have failed." The governor told reporters, "I think we make some measurable progress if we can help the cease fire and the humanitarian situation and possibly start a united political process that helps the UN peacekeeping effort alive." Richardson is scheduled to meet with al-Bashir on Monday in Khartoum, then fly to Darfur on Tuesday to meet with rebel leaders and the commander of overwhelmed African Union forces assigned to patrol the area.

DOJ_NMG_0112931

US, EU Revive Hopes For Trade Deal. On its front page, the Financial Times (1/8, A1, Callan) reports negotiations between the US and the European Union "have revived hopes that a deal can be struck on the stalled Doha round of world trade talks by the end of the month," according to EU and American officials. Top negotiators have told the Financial Times "they hope to achieve a breakthrough in the coming weeks, paving the way for an agreement with Brazil and India at the World Economic Forum in Davos this month." The Times calls the proposed deal "a last-ditch attempt" to revive the talks before President Bush loses his authority to negotiate trade pacts later this year. EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson told the Times that the US and EU are "closer to an agreement than is commonly thought," saying the two sides are "not that far apart to give up on the process."

Mandelson To Push Bush On Trade. In a separate report, the Financial Times (1/8, Callan, Daniel, Parker, Bounds) reports Mandelson Monday will "attempt the improbable feat of persuading George W. Bush to take a political gamble on multilateralism and expend precious political capital on reaching a world trade deal during his final two years in office." Mandelson "believes he has a unique personal relationship with Mr. Bush that will help him convince the president the trade talks have reached an 'endgame' and that he must step in."

German Lawmaker Urges Creation Of Single Trans-Atlantic Market. Matthias Wissmann, a member of the German Bundestag from the Christian Democratic party, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M), "German Chancellor Angela Merkel has made the creation of a single trans-Atlantic market a priority of our country's European Union presidency." The "present situation," he adds, "bodes well for this initiative. The Democratic Party emerged strengthened from the recent elections in the US. Although at first sight this seems like a victory for protectionist tendencies, it was the Democrats who, some years ago, developed the idea of closer economic relations between the US and the EU." Through its "commitment as a founding member of the European Community 50 years ago," Wissmann concludes, "Germany has already played a crucial part in the creation of a successful economic area. There is nothing to prevent us from applying the successful model of the single European market in the trans-Atlantic context."

EC's Barroso To Challenge Bush On Climate Change. The Financial Times (1/8, Parker, Bounds) reports President Bush "on Monday be challenged to join the fight against climate change as Europe embarks on a 'new industrial revolution' aimed at cutting the continent's greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent. José Manuel Barroso, the European Commission president, will use his visit to the White House on Monday to give Mr Bush a preview of a new EU energy policy designed to put the bloc at the forefront of energy efficiency and use of renewables." Barroso "will argue that Europe and America have a joint economic interest in cutting energy use and to reduce their dependence on imported oil and gas." The EC will "propose a big increase in the bloc's use of renewable energy, a rise from under seven per cent of today's energy mix to about 20 per cent by 2020."

China Profits From Carbon Credit Market. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A10, Ball, McKinnon, Oster, 2.04M) reports, "China is turning its environmental problems into a shrewdly managed financial asset, capitalizing on corporate and governmental efforts to curb global warming. How much China's actions will do for the atmosphere remains an open question." One way companies can comply with carbon dioxide emissions caps "is by bankrolling emission-cutting projects in the developing world, where such projects often are cheaper than back home. In return, the Western companies receive 'carbon credits' that essentially allow them to continue to emit greenhouse gases themselves." China, "has become the biggest source of developing-world carbon credits bought by Western investors, benefiting both Chinese corporations and Chinese government tax receipts."

China Tightens Censorship Over Press. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/8, A1, Cody, 690K) reports Chinese President Hu Jintao's "ascension to power more than three years ago generated hopes that information controls would loosen as part of the economic opening he has championed. But they have tightened instead." The Post notes that "several prominent editors have been fired over the past two years -- the most recent one last month -- for straining at censors' guidelines." As an example, the Post details the case of Qin Zhongfei, who "spent a month in jail on criminal charges because of a poem he wrote satirizing local officials accused of corruption."

DOJ_NMG_0112932

New Year's Bombings Reflect Difficulties Facing New Thai Government. The New York Times (1/8, Mydans, 1.16M) reports that a "string of lethal bombs that disrupted New Year's celebrations here has signaled the start of a difficult year for Thailand as entrenched elites struggle for control of the country's future." It is still unclear who set the bombs, "but the message they sent to Thais was that a showdown is likely in the coming months between the ruling military junta and the opponents it unseated in a coup more than three months ago." The Times notes that a "struggle for power that began with street demonstrations more than a year ago appears to be resurfacing after pausing for breath after the nonviolent coup on Sept. 19 ended the five-year tenure of Thaksin Shinawatra as prime minister."

Zoellick Urges Bush, Congress To Create AAFTA. Former deputy secretary of state Robert Zoellick writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/8, A17, 2.04M), "This year President Bush and the Democratic-led Congress should launch a new Association of American Free Trade Agreements (AAFTA)," which "could shape the future of the Western Hemisphere, while offering a new foreign and economic policy design that combines trade, open societies, development and democracy." Zoellick says that although the President and Congress are "understandably absorbed by the dangers of war," the US "cannot afford to ignore the rest of the world." The US trade agenda, he writes, has "turned out to be our strongest lifeline to developing democracies in the Americas," but "is not enough." With the passage of the FTAs with Colombia, Peru and Panama, Zoellick says the President and the Congress "could use the free trade framework to spur an ongoing dynamic for development and democracy."

O'Grady Says Coca-Growing Movement Bolstering Morales' Popularity. Wall Street Journal (1/8, A16, 2.04M) columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes, "Evo Morales is an anti-American extremist who wants to turn Bolivia into another Venezuela," which "naturally alarms Washington, but not enough to halt its war on drugs, which is aiding the president -- and leader of Bolivia's coca-growing peasant movement -- in his bid to become a dictator." Morales, "who badly needs to maintain the appearance of public support so that the international community tolerates his takeover," is "trying to spin the constitutional crisis as a confrontation between races and economic classes. But he has to worry about places like the poor and largely indigenous city of El Alto, just above La Paz, where there is evidence to suggest that many who voted for him are unhappy with his unlawful intervention in the constitutional process and growing impatient with his failure to deliver on economic promises." This, O'Grady writes, "is where US drug policy comes in. Railing against the Yankees who want to destroy peasant income has proven extremely effective in keeping the Morales base -- the country's indigenous coca growers who brought him to power -- energized and his numbers afloat. … If Washington policy makers ever decide to tackle the demand for cocaine and stop blaming supply, Mr. Morales's political career would be in jeopardy.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Gov To Seek Cuts In Aid To Families On Welfare."
"Money Clashes With Mission."
"Health Insurers Deny Policies In Some Jobs."
"China's Medicine Wars."
"Troop Surge In Iraq Would Have McCain In Tow."
"Stem Cells In Amniotic Fluid Show Promise."

USA Today:

"Verizon Wireless Goes Prime Time With TV Simulcasts Via Cell phone."
"States To Expand Health Coverage."
"States To Watch."
"How Bush Education Law Has Changed Our Schools."

New York Times:

"Plan Sets Series Of Goals For Iraq Leaders."
"Private Firms Lure C.E.O.'s With Top Pay."
"Taking Control Of Electric Bill, Hour By Hour."

DOJ_NMG_0112933

"After Many Years, It's Rangel's Turn At The Helm."
"New Warsaw Archbishop Quits Over Communist Collaboration."
"In Obesity Fight, Many Fear A Note From School."

Washington Post:

"War's Toll On Iraqis Put At 22,950 In 2006."
"Amniotic Stem Cells Hold Promise."
"Battling Deportation Often A Solitary Journey."
"Green Line Metro Train Derails, Injuring 20."
"Censorship Persists In China."

Washington Times:

"Immigration Debate Gets Religious."
"Warsaw Bishop Steps Down Over Communist Links."
"20 Hurt In Green Line Derailment."
"Pelosi Threatens To reject Funds For Troop Surge."
"French Frown On Scheme To Export Louvre."
"Library Book Returned After 47 Years, late Fees Included."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution

"Louisville Coach To lead Falcons."
"Focus Is On Top 2 Power Brokers."
"A Suicidal Patient But No Safe Haven."
"Pelosi: No Blank Check For Iraq War."

Houston Chronicle:

"Texas Revenue Forecast To Be Released Today"
"HPD Officers Fatally Shoot Hammer-Wielding Man"
"Passport Rules Change May Mean Dip In Tourism"
"Pelosi: Extra War Funds Request May Be Denied"
"Clara Harris' In-Laws Seeking Damages In Lawsuit"
"Sixth Ward Preservationists Post YouTube Pleas"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: New Iraq Strategy; New Iraq Strategy-Analysis; First 100 Hours; Increasing The Minimum Wage; Sen. Biden's Presidential Bid; Miami Port Incident; Massive Avalanche-Colorado; Auto Show; Stem Cell Research Breakthrough; Speaking Arabic; Cross Country Train Travel.
CBS: Preempted By Basketball.
NBC: New Iraq Strategy; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Massive Avalanche-Colorado; Strange Warm Winter Weather; Stem Cell Research Breakthrough; Sen. Biden's Presidential Bid; Auto Show; Consumer Electronics Show; Miami Port Incident; Football Player's Death; Missing American Sailor; Arch Bishop Resigns; Royal Treatment.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Pelosi-President Bush And Iraq; Iraq-Bus Attacked By Gunmen; Southern U.S.-Extreme Weather; Stem Cell Research-Amniotic Fluid; Chrysler-New Versions Of Minivan; Detroit-North American Auto Show; Las Vegas-Consumer Electronics Show.
CBS: Iraq-Bus Attacked By Gunmen; Pelosi-President Bush And Iraq; Miami-Port Security Scare; Stem Cell Research-Amniotic Fluid; Southern U.S.-Extreme Weather; TN-Two Teenagers Suspected Of Killing State Trooper; College Football National Championship; NFL Playoffs.
NPR: Iraq-Bus Attacked By Gunmen; Pelosi-President Bush And Iraq; Biden-Troop Strength In Iraq; Canadian McKay Visits Afghanistan; Bangladesh-Violent Protests; President Bush Declares State Of Emergency In Nebraska; California Man Fails Round-The-World Boat Trip; Detroit-North American Auto Show.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with European Commission President Jose Barroso, White House.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks at the National Awards for Museum and Library Services, East Room.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 11:30 a.m. Meets for morning business. At noon, considers S.Res.19, to celebrate the life of the late President Gerald Ford, followed by consideration of S.1, the Ethics Reform bill.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets in pro forma session.

Other: HEALTH SPENDING _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. Health Affairs will host members of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services National Health Statistics Group for a media briefing on their article analyzing U.S. health spending in 2005, to be published in the January/February 2007 Health Affairs. Briefers: Aaron Catlin, Cathy Cowan, Stephen Heffler, and Benjamin Washington from the National Health Statistics Group, CMS; Samuel Zuvekas, senior economist, AHRQ. Location: National Press Club, Murrow Room.

INSURERS' PROFITS _ 10 a.m. The Consumer Federation of America (CFA) holds a news conference to release new data they say demonstrates that auto and home insurers dramatically increased profits and surplus in recent years, in part by systematically overcharging for insurance and by shifting costs to consumers and taxpayers.CFA will provide detailed information on the strategies its says insurers have used to inappropriately shift costs and on how state and federal policymakers can prevent these practices. Location: National Press Club, Lisagor Room.

DOJ_NMG_0112934

SPELLINGS-NCLB _ 10 a.m. US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings will commemorate the fifth anniversary of the signing of the No Child Left Behind Act by President Bush with a speech to national education leaders. Location: US Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, 1615 H St. NW.

STATE HIGHWAY SAFETY _ 10 a.m. Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety holds a news conference to unveil its ``2007 Roadmap to State Highway Safety Laws. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

MASSACHUSETTS-EDUCATION _ 10 a.m. - 1:30 p.m. The Center for American Progress sponsor a conference, ``Supporting Student Learning: Massachusetts Style," focusing on expanding learning time. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., will deliver the keynote address. Highlights: Session I: State Leadership in Expanding Learning Time. Participants: Hilary Pennington, Senior Fellow, Center for American Progress and Co-founder and Vice Chair, Jobs for the future; Chris Gabrieli, Co-founder and Chairman, Massachusetts 2020; and David Driscoll, Commissioner, Massachusetts Department of Education. Session II: Local Voices on Implementation. Participants: Paul Toner, Vice President, Massachusetts Teachers Association, former President, Cambridge Teachers Association; Robin Harris, Principal, Fletcher-Maynard Academy; AND Dr. James Caradonio, Superintendent, Worcester Public Schools. Location: Center for American Progress, 1333 H St. NW.

TEAMSTERS-PRIORITIES _ 10:30 a.m. The Teamsters Union will outline its legislative, political and regulatory priorities and goals for 2007, including the Employee Free Choice Act, minimum wage, fair trade, rail security and cross-border trucking, in a news briefing. Location: International Brotherhood of Teamsters, 25 Louisiana Ave. NW.

EDUCATION POLICY _ 11 a.m. The Heritage Foundation hosts a discussion with Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas., and Rep. Jimm DeMint R-S.C. Topic: ``A Better Answer for Education: Reviving State and Local Policymaking Authority." Location: Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

US-JAPAN TRADE _ 12 p.m. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez and Japan's Minister of Economy, Trade and Industry hold a briefing press availability following a meeting on US-Japan trade issues and renewing the joint initiative for ``Enhance Cooperation on IPR" and other global initiatives announced in March, 2006. Location: Diplomatic reception area, 5th floor, Commerce Department, 14th Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

DEMOCRATS-ETHICS REFORM _ 12:30 p.m. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid joins Senators Russ Feingold, Barack Obama, and Amy Klobuchar to discuss Senate Democrats commitment to ethics reform. Location: Senate Radio/TV Gallery.

IRAQ FUTURE _ 1 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies will bring together members of the U.S. House of Representatives Armed Services Committee to discuss their agenda for Iraq in the 110th Congress. Participants: Reps. Ike Skelton, D-Mo.; Jim Saxton, R-N.J.; Jim Marshall, D-Ga.; and ``Mac Thornberry, R-Texas. Location: CSIS, 1800 K St. NW, Conference Level B1.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION _ 1 p.m. - 3 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts an address by professor Gordon H. Hanson on the economic and social factors that influence the flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico to the U.S. and considers evidence on the effectiveness of policies that regulate the cross-border flow of illegal immigrants and their access to U.S. jobs. Migration scholar L. Alan Winters responds as AEI's Steven J. Davis moderates. Location: AEI's Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

MATH-SCIENCE STANDARDS _ 2:30 p.m. The New America Foundation, Fordham Foundation, others, hold a news conference with Sen. Chris Dodd, NAM President John Engler, Alliance for Excellent Education President Robert Wise, others, to announce legislation creating voluntary core standards in math and science. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

JAPAN FINANCIAL _ 3 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) Japan Chair hosts Japans Minister of Finance Koji Omi, who will discuss his views on the Japanese economy, as well as various policy issues in the context of the upcoming Japanese Upper House election. Location: CSIS 1800 K St. NW, Conference Level B-1.

DOJ_NMG_0112935

US-EU TRADE _ 3:30 p.m. US Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab holds a media availability with EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson. Location: Winder Building, 604 17th St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0112936

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Some Conservatives Blast Anti-Terror Laws' Effect On Asylum Seekers ... 3
Two Charged With Plotting Attacks On Americans In Jordan ... 3
Editorials Critical Of Bush's Letter-Opening Statement ... 3

Homeland Response:
Miscommunication Leads To Terror Scare At Port Of Miami ... 3
Measure Would Require All Cargo On Passenger Planes To Be Screened ... 4
McConnell Expected To Improve Relations Between Pentagon and DNI ... 4
Democrats May Seek Access To White House Records On Katrina ... 4

War News:
Bush Plan To Include "Surge," Aid, "Benchmarks" For Iraqi Leaders ... 5
Pelosi Suggests Democrats Could Withhold Funding For Troop "Surge." ... 8
Bush Seen As "Determined To Defy" Opposition To Sending More Troops ... 9
Lawmakers Break Largely Along Party Lines On "Surge." ... 10
Fallon Seen As "Experienced" Officer And Diplomat ... 11
US, Iraqi Forces Launch "Thundering" Assault On Insurgents ... 12
Five More US Soldiers Killed In Iraq ... 12
Nearly 23,000 Iraqis Said To Be Killed In 2006 ... 12
Increased Violence Slows Supply Lines In Iraq ... 12
Two More Saddam Co-Defendants Await Execution ... 12
UK's Brown Suggests Iraq Policy Shift ... 13
US Agencies Lack Adequate Number Of Arabic Speakers ... 13
Iraqi Soccer Suffers From War Too ... 13
Newborn Babies, Women Killed In Taliban Attack ... 13
LATimes Weighs In On Watada Trial ... 13

Corporate Scandals:
Jobs May Still Face DOJ Scrutiny In Apple Options Probe ... 13
FCC Expected To Issue New Rules On Phone Records Protection ... 14
Goal Of CEO Pay Critics Said To Be "Social Responsibility." ... 15

Criminal Law:
States Tap Texas' Execution Expertise ... 15
Bush May Address Homicide Wave In State Of The Union ... 15
Judge To Consider Access To Jeffs Evidence At Hearing Today 15
WSJournal Criticizes Fitzgerald For Not Releasing Reporters' Affidavits ... 16
Judge Recommends Tightening Defendant Indigency Mechanisms ... 16

Civil Law:
Plame Denied Permission To Write About Her CIA Role ... 16

Civil Rights:
Smaller Version Of Taser Goes On Sale For Private Use ... 16
NYTimes Urges Congress To "Fix" Electronic Voting Machines. 17

Antitrust:
DOJ Antitrust Division Defends Performance ... 17
US Conducting Security Review Of European Telecom Venture 17

Environment
Democrats Target Minerals Management Service Over Oil And Gas Royalties ... 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
San Francisco Area Has Highest Percentage Of Regular Drug Users ... 18
Three "Operation Highstep" Suspects Face Charges In Chicago 18
"Operation Director's Cut" Leads To 20-Year Sentence For Financial Services Executive ... 18
Lawyers, Others In Rhode Island Face Charges In Drug-Deal Scheme ... 18
Audit Finds Problems With DEA Accounting Of Seized Funds ... 19
Mexican Drug Cartels Strengthen Presence In Peru ... 19

Immigration:
US Halts Deportation Proceedings Against Brazilian Couple ... 19
Hoyer Suggests Bush Will Cooperate With Democrats' On Immigration Reform ... 19

Tax:
BB&T Plans Appeal Of Tax Refund Ruling ... 20
CBO Study Finds The Very Wealthy Benefited The Most From Bush Tax Cuts ... 20

Congress-Administration:
Many Republicans Expected To Back Minimum Wage Increase 21
On Fifth Anniversary, NCLB Seen As Changing Schools ... 21

Education Department Seeks Change In ABA's Diversity Standard For Law Schools ... 22
Domenici Optimistic That Democrats Will Pass His Mental Health Bill ... 22
Chao's Third Public Affairs Chief Resigns After Three Months ... 22
Roberts' "Constitutional Crisis" Claim Criticized ... 22
After Cost Overruns, Delays, Capitol Visitor Center Nears Completion ... 23
Federal Pay Raise Doesn't Keep Pace With Private Sector ... 23
Gerson Describes Bush's "Voracious" Reading Habits ... 23
WPost Urges Congress To Nix Agricultural Subsidies ... 23

Other News:

Positive Employment Data Worries US Equities Markets ... 23
OPEC Production Cuts Likely To Buoy Oil Prices ... 24
Researchers Extract Stem Cells From Amniotic Fluid ... 24
Analysts Predict Population Shifts Will Continue To Benefit The GOP ... 24
Biden Says He Will Form Presidential Exploratory Committee This Month ... 25
Patrick Pledges To Support Kerry In 2008 ... 25
Edwards May Be Engaging In "Choreographed Candor." ... 25
McCain Portrayed As Out Of Step With Conservatives On Key Issues ... 25
Many States Plan Expansion Of Health Care Coverage ... 26
Schwarzenegger To Propose Welfare "Rollback." ... 26
Georgia Legislator Seeks To Strip McKinney's Name From Highway ... 26
Former President Bush Discharged After Hip Replacement ... 27
WPost Backs Effort To Allow Virginia Governors Two Terms ... 27
Israel Denies Planning Attack On Iran ... 27
Abbas To Seek Early Elections Despite Hamas Objections ... 27
US Sends Military Advisers, Weapons To Boost Somalis ... 27
Richardson Optimistic For Breakthrough On Darfur ... 28
US, EU Revive Hopes For Trade Deal ... 28
EC's Barroso To Challenge Bush On Climate Change ... 29
China Profits From Carbon Credit Market ... 29
China Tightens Censorship Over Press ... 29
New Year's Bombings Reflect Difficulties Facing New Thai Government ... 29
Zoellick Urges Bush, Congress To Create AAFTA ... 29
O'Grady Says Coca-Growing Movement Bolstering Morales' Popularity ... 29

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 30

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 30

DOJ_NMG_0112938

TERRORISM NEWS:

Some Conservatives Blast Anti-Terror Laws' Effect On Asylum Seekers. The Washington Post (1/8, A3, Fears, 690K) reports, "Conservatives who supported President Bush's reelection have joined liberal groups in expressing outrage over his administration's broad use of anti-terrorism laws to reject asylum for thousands of people seeking refuge from religious, ethnic and political persecution. The critics say the administration's interpretation of provisions mandating denial of asylum to individuals who give 'material support' to terrorist groups is so broad that foreigners who fought alongside US forces in wars such as Vietnam can be denied asylum on the grounds that they provided aid to terrorists. … 'This is so indefensible,' said Michael Horowitz, a fellow at the conservative Hudson Institute and a former lawyer in the Reagan administration. 'It is causing heroes who fought for the United States to be afraid of being deported.'" Barrett Duke, vice president of public policy for the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, called the laws "outrageous." Gary L. Bauer, "president of American Values, a conservative public policy group, said the anti-terrorism thrust of laws such as the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act is supported by most conservatives, 'but the enforcement of it has lapsed into ludicrousy. The concept of material support is being distorted, and even the definition of the term 'terrorism' is being turned on its ear.'"

Two Charged With Plotting Attacks On Americans In Jordan. The AP (1/8) reports, "Two men were charged Sunday with plotting attacks against Americans living in Jordan. Prosecutors indicted Mohammed Shehada, 25, a Jordanian, and Sameeh al-Hotari, 25, who was born in Kuwait, for conspiracy to carry out terrorist attacks and possession of an automatic weapon, a Kalashnikov."

Editorials Critical Of Bush's Letter-Opening Statement. Under the headline "First wiretapping, now letter-opening?" the Los Angeles Times (1/8, 850K) editorializes, "The Bush administration seems determined to raise the specter of surveillance over every means of communication within the United States. Not content to monitor selected phone calls and e-mails in secret, it recently hinted that letters and packages may be opened without a search warrant too." The Times adds that spokesman Tony Snow attempted to "allay fears last week about mail snooping," stating that Bush's statement on the subject was "merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president." However, "it's hard not to be suspicious of the president's position on mail privacy, given the administration's record on the issue of domestic surveillance. … The administration may indeed be up to nothing new when it comes to mail — and that's not the least bit comforting."

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/8) editorializes, "In yet another power grab that whittles away our rights without a plausible justification, President Bush has given the government expanded authority to read our mail." The Chronicle continues, "This White House has long signaled that it will do what it wants in the name of national security, laws be damned. It has reserved the government's right to detain and even torture suspects without due process, and has asserted for itself wide latitude to electronically eavesdrop on Americans without obtaining search warrants. … So perhaps it should surprise no one that Bush would add a 'signing statement' to a postal-reform bill passed by Congress that suggests the new law allows the opening of mail that would be 'otherwise sealed against inspection' for broadly defined security purposes." The Chronicle adds, "Once again, the White House attempted to downplay the significance of a signing statement, insisting the president was not trying to exert any new authority. Instead, the Bush spinners said the purpose of the signing statement was to reiterate current law, which clearly does allow postal authorities to open a package suspected of containing a ticking time bomb -- the example of choice for those trying to pooh-pooh the concerns. Also, before the administration tries to trot out a red herring about wanting to intercept 'letters from al Qaeda' without delay, it has every opportunity to do so under current law -- and could then apply for a warrant after the fact. … 'Just trust us,' seems to be the operative phrase of this administration. … However, history has shown the potential for government abuses in the absence of strong mail-privacy laws. Bush continues to roll back the clock -- and the Constitution -- with his signing statements."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Miscommunication Leads To Terror Scare At Port Of Miami. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (1/8, Ovalle, Weaver, Nahed, Barry, 286K) reports, "What started as a potential terrorist plot at Miami-Dade's seaport Sunday morning quickly flubbed into a sobering reminder of the post 9/11 state of fear. Initially, the story line sounded startling: Officers stopped a Middle Eastern man driving an 18-wheel rig with mysterious cargo. Two men, the reports went, were discovered hiding in the trailer portion. … The truth, however, emerged far less threatening -- the men were not terrorists and were only hauling electrical auto parts. Ultimately, the scare was blamed on miscommunication and unfounded reports." The Herald notes, "FBI agents questioned the men. County and federal authorities used a gamma ray ID device to examine the blue 40-foot container, which had 22 pallets inside. … By 5:15 p.m., authorities stood in front of local and national reporters to stress that despite the false alarm, security procedures unfolded perfectly."

DOJ_NMG_0112939

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/8, Blum, 237K) reports that "agents with the Federal Bureau of Investigation spent hours interviewing the men -- two brothers and a friend, according to FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela. The names of the men, who reside legally in Dearborn, Mich., were not released. Orihuela insisted the heightened security alert was not a case of racial profiling. 'It would have been the same response regardless,' she said. After lengthy questioning, the agents concluded the men were harmless and that the day's sinister-seeming events resulted from a simple misunderstanding between the truck driver and the port security officer regarding the number of passengers in the truck." The AP (1/8, Kennedy) reported the incident in a widely-distributed story, noting that the FBI and ICE were involved in the investigation; meanwhile, CNN, MSNBC and Fox News followed the story throughout their broadcasts yesterday as it unfolded.

Measure Would Require All Cargo On Passenger Planes To Be Screened. USA Today (1/8, Frank, 2.27M) reports a measure in the Democratic homeland security bill "that is likely to pass in the House" Tuesday "would require all cargo on passenger planes to be inspected for bombs." However, "Airlines and cargo companies say inspections would take so long that passenger planes could not carry goods that require fast delivery," which may prompt airlines to "cancel certain passenger routes," according to David Castelveter, spokesman for the Air Transport Association, which represents major US airlines. Rep. Ed Markey, who has pushed for cargo inspection, "dismissed gloomy scenarios and noted that under the legislation, passenger airlines would not have to inspect all cargo until September 2009."

NYTimes Says Air, Sea Cargo Inspection Rules Should Have Been "No-Brainers." The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) editorializes that in a move to address "some perilously neglected needs of homeland security," House Democrats are "determined to mandate inspection of all incoming sea cargo by 2012. This is an overdue protection that Republicans bottled up in the last Congress." The new port security measures, in addition to the screening of all cargo on passenger planes, were recommended by the 9/11 commission and "should long ago have been antiterrorism no-brainers for the nation. The complaints of business lobbyists about undue burdens on commerce pale when compared with the havoc that would be created in the American economy if terrorists mounted another major attack." Adding that the House legislation "sidesteps some of the 9/11 commission's most important findings about the dysfunctional intelligence apparatus," the Times states that the "measure amounts to a worthy step forward, but one that does not go far enough."

McConnell Expected To Improve Relations Between Pentagon and DNI. Newsweek (1/15, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "Intelligence insiders expect recent personnel shifts to strengthen the authority of the national intelligence director." DNI nominee Mike McConnell, "a retired Navy three-star admiral whose career path is similar to that of new CIA Director Michael Hayden, a four-star Air Force general." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "is expected to replace Defense Intelligence Under Secretary Stephen Cambone with another military man, retired Air Force three-star Gen. James Clapper." Newsweek adds that the DNI office "A big criticism was that, in the face of alleged obstruction by former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the intel czar's office had too little control over Pentagon intel agencies like the giant NSA. Assuming Clapper does become Pentagon intel chief, however, relations between Defense agencies and the intel czar's office may improve considerably: four intelligence officials, who asked for anonymity discussing intel issues, say that Clapper once angered Rumsfeld by telling Congress he would be comfortable if his NGA operation was moved out of Pentagon control and under direct control of the intel czar."

Democrats May Seek Access To White House Records On Katrina. Newsweek (1/15, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "One early indication of how aggressively Capitol Hill Democrats will investigate the Bush administration -- and how strongly the White House will resist -- will be how vigorously the new congressional majority pursues Katrina inquiries. Under GOP leadership, both House and Senate committees sought copies of Katrina records, but the White House declined to turn over messages between the president and his top advisers. According to a GOP investigator involved with the probe…Bush aides indicated that if Congress pressed harder, the White House was likely to claim such material was covered by executive privilege. But now that the Democrats have subpoena power, an effort to force the White House to turn over the messages is a 'possibility,' says a House Democratic source." Former FEMA administrator Michael Brown "told NEWSWEEK that in a still-secret videoconference shortly after Katrina hit New Orleans, he warned presidential aides that 90 percent of the city was being 'displaced,' but was greeted with 'deafening silence.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112940

Invigorated Blue Dogs Plan To Challenge Liberals. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Schulte, 2.03M) reports, "Veteran liberals such as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, hold the party's reins, but their power is likely to be tested by a group far removed from the party establishment-conservative Democrats who are flexing newfound muscle. Eighteen of 41 incoming House freshmen joined the New Democrat Coalition and/or the Blue Dog Coalition, caucuses of pro-business and fiscally conservative Democrats, respectively. … Pro-technology and free trade, the New Democrats boast a few more members, but the budget-minded Blue Dogs may have more bite. Now 44 members strong, this conservative caucus looks to be a cohesive voting bloc on fiscal issues. It also claims some freshman stars, like former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler of North Carolina and former sheriff Brad Ellsworth of Indiana, both of whom won in GOP strongholds. … Showdowns are possible over some key Democratic initiatives, such as halving interest rates on student loans and reforming the alternative minimum tax."

Democrats Said To Have Brief Window Of Opportunity To Cement Majorities. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "Elected with a mandate to clean up Washington by a deeply disgruntled public, Democrats have a mighty task ahead and a plan to move quickly in the first few weeks. But their efforts are fraught with any number of challenges: holding the progressive and centrist wings of the party together, turning legislation into law with the slimmest of Senate majorities, and working with a president who has seen little resistance from Capitol Hill during his six years in office. How Democrats fare in the next few months -- before the presidential election begins to overwhelm Washington -- will help determine whether the party maintains control in 2008 and beyond. … First up, Democrats plan to pass their 100-hour agenda through the House before the president's State of the Union address on January 23." U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (1/15) writes, "the now minority congressional Republicans are feeling liberated. The burden of trying to run a fractious Congress is gone. Now they get to become professional critics. No longer do they have to sweat to deliver a 'majority of the majority' to the White House for every big vote-including Iraq. They can be the opposition voice, the backbenchers, the unruly minority."

Survey Finds Much Of Ninth Ward Does Not Have To Be Rebuilt From Scratch. The Washington Post (1/8, A5, Burdeau, 690K) reports a survey by urban planners and students at Cornell, Columbia University and the University of Illinois has found that the neighborhoods in New Orleans' Ninth Ward "can be brought back largely as they existed before Hurricane Katrina flooded them. … The only section that must be demolished before being rebuilt lies directly next to the levee breach on the Industrial Canal, an area that covers less than a square mile in the Lower Ninth Ward, the planners said." Andrew Rumbach, a Cornell planner, said the research data shows that the area "can be rebuilt, and rebuilt in a cost-effective way. What is lacking are the resources."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Plan To Include "Surge," Aid, "Benchmarks" For Iraqi Leaders. More details are becoming known about President Bush's new Iraq strategy. The New York Times (1/8, A1, Gordon, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports this morning Bush's "new Iraq policy will establish a series of goals that the Iraqi government will be expected to meet to try to ease sectarian tensions and stabilize the country politically and economically, senior administration officials said Sunday. Among these 'benchmarks' are steps that would draw more Sunnis into the political process, finalize a long-delayed measure on the distribution of oil revenue and ease the government's policy toward former Baath Party members, the officials said." The Times adds, "After meeting with the president and his national security team on Friday at the White House, senators from both parties said they told Mr. Bush they would have trouble supporting an American troop increase unless the plan included specific goals for the Iraqi government. Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, said one of his Senate colleagues asked why the effort to add to American forces in Iraq would be more likely to succeed than previous troop increases. Mr. Sununu said the president and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, responded that Mr. Bush's plan would 'include more specific goals, different rules of engagement and different expectations for cooperation with the Iraqi government.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/7, lead story, 3:10, Corke, 9.87M) said, "Administration officials tell us when the President does speak about his plan, he will offer a balanced approach, one that clearly defines the future role for American forces in Iraq," and USA Today (1/8, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "Bush is reviewing a plan that would send up to 20,000 more US troops to Iraq, a decision that would trigger heavy opposition from Democratic congressional leaders." The White House "plans a presidential address no sooner than Wednesday to discuss the proposal, which includes new programs for jobs, reconstruction and political assistance in Iraq, according to two administration officials who have been briefed on it." The "officials, who spoke on the condition they not be identified because the president has not made final decisions, said increases would come in phases that could add up to 20,000 troops during the next several months." The plan also

DOJ_NMG_0112941

"includes up to $1 billion in economic assistance, such as job creation and reconstruction projects, the officials said. It also calls for political assistance, including help for human rights groups and political organizations, in an effort to promote peaceful reconciliation among warring Shiite and Sunni factions."

Last night, ABC and NBC (CBS was preempted) ran analysis pieces that cast doubt on the usefulness of a troop "surge." ABC World News (1/7, story 2, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) reported, "We had lunch with General Odierno. He's the top US military commander in Baghdad. He reckoned that US troops could come into Baghdad and in three or four months, restore relative peace and security and then start withdrawing and let the Iraqis take over. However, in the past when they've done that, that has never worked. And it's very unclear what has changed now that would make it work." And NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 2, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) said "there are questions about whether…Bush's new plan will be embraced by the Iraqis who have a new plan of their own to secure Baghdad." NBC (Maceda) added, "Only months ago Iraqis welcomed another bold plan, Operation Together Forward. Despite the effort of 17,000 troops inside Baghdad it failed to stem the violence." In a similar report, the Christian Science Monitor (1/8, LaFranchi, 59K) reports "critics say" the "surge" option "would simply repeat past tactics that have not delivered," while "advocates of a big surge say it could be worse than nothing, only exposing more US troops to danger without providing the larger numbers they say are needed to get the job done of securing the civilian population."

Odierno Makes Case For New Strategy. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Moore, 850K) reports Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, "the newly installed day-to-day commander of military operations in Iraq, said that success here would depend on a multi-pronged strategy including economic aid and political negotiations in addition to increased military actions targeting Shiite and Sunni Arab militants." Odierno, "who left his job as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's military advisor to become the operations chief for Iraq," said "more soldiers would speed the training of the Iraqi force and help quell sectarian fighting in the capital. He said bringing peace to Baghdad could be accomplished either with additional American troops or expanded recruiting and training of Iraqi troops or a combination of the two." USA Today (1/8, 5A, Jervis, 2.27M) notes Odierno "called for a 'balanced approach' targeting extremists of both sects. The new strategy would consist of clearing neighborhoods of insurgents and patrolling those areas heavily; creating more jobs; launching provincial elections; and outlawing militias, he said."

The New York Times (1/8, Burns, 1.16M) reports, "Meeting American reporters over lunch at a villa in the grounds of one of Mr. Hussein's former palaces…Odierno was careful not to divulge details of Mr. Bush's new war plan, which the president is expected to make public in coming days, perhaps on Wednesday." But "much of the Bush plan has been leaked."

Odierno's comments were noted by the two network newscasts that aired last night. ABC World News (1/7, story 2, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) said, "We had lunch with General Odierno. He's the top US military commander in Baghdad. He reckoned that US troops could come into Baghdad and in three or four months, restore relative peace and security and then start withdrawing and let the Iraqis take over." NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 2, 2:20, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "Speaking of Baghdad today, Lieutenant General Raymond Odierno, the number two commander in Iraq, explained why" past plans to address the violence failed: "It failed because we couldn't hold what we had cleared, and you have to go after both Sunnis and Shiites." The Washington Post (1/8, A12, Partlow, 690K) and McClatchy (1/8, Youssef) also report on Odierno's comments.

Scowcroft Offers Conditional Support For Targeted Surge. Former National Security Advisor Brent Scowcroft was asked on ABC's This Week (1/7, Stephanopoulos) if he would "advise sending more troops to Iraq right now," Scowcroft responded, "I believe, if there is a specific mission that they can accomplish and for a specific period, then it's worthwhile. … The mission would have to be some particular thing in Baghdad, for example. There's ethnic cleansing going on in Baghdad. If that can be stopped by a specific number of troops in a specific period of time, that would be demonstrable improvement. But just the increase -- general increase of troops spread out through all the missions that they have, I think would be -- would not be effective."

State Department Concerned By Bush Plan. The Financial Times (1/8, Dinmore) reports, "At the heart of…Bush's new way forward'…is the plan already under way to expand the US civilian presence across Iraq and complete the world's largest embassy in Baghdad. Construction of what critics call 'Fortress Baghdad' has led to arguments inside the State Department amid fears that the overwhelming diplomatic presence will perpetuate a sense of US occupation and become a focus of local anger." US diplomats "say that just as the armed forces are being stretched to breaking point, the US foreign service is suffering from low morale and operations in the rest of the world are being damaged by the diversion of resources to Iraq." Meanwhile, "the State Department has told the Financial Times that the US civilian presence in Iraq has 'grown considerably beyond the numbers projected for the new embassy compound.'"

Al-Rubaie Says Iraqis Have Plan To Crack Down On All Militias. CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie. Asked when the Iraqi military would "crack down on the various militias, especially the Mehdi Army of Muqtada al-Sadr," al-Rubaie said, "We have a full comprehensive plan for all militias, not only Mahdi militias, but all other militias we have a full comprehensive plan, and we have already started implementing this plan. But we are going to speed up this process in the year 2007."

DOJ_NMG_0112942

More Commentary On Bush's Plan. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M) editorializes, "Even with Democrats running Congress, Mr. Bush has a political window to pursue a more robust security strategy. The paradox is that the fastest way home from Iraq is a bolder commitment now. ... If anything, in Iraq it now appears [Bush] has been too deferential. He was telling the truth when he said his generals, and former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, told him they had enough troops to do the job." The Journal adds, "We hope Mr. Bush also refrains from using the words 'surge' or 'temporary' to describe his plans this week. A better message is that he will do whatever it takes to reinforce the forces of moderation and democracy in Iraq to prevent a defeat that would empower American enemies in Iraq and in the war on terror. ... The tragedy nearly four years after the fall of Saddam is that such a strategy has never been tried."

The Weekly Standard's William Kristol, appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume), said, "Bush has chosen to change strategy in Iraq in a way that I think makes sense. The new rationale for the new strategy has been laid out in great strength by retired Army Chief of Staff Jack Keane, and Fred Kagan, and now I think David Petraeus." Asked if 20,000 troops is likely to be enough to make a difference, Kristol replied, "The Keane and Kagan plan calls for four or five brigades in Baghdad and one or two Marine regiments in Anbar, which will be a little more than 20,000. They may phase them in. So it might start with 20,000. But look, Dave Petraeus is going to take over. And he's committed. He's taking over with a mission: win the war. And if he comes back to the president a month from now, when he's in command on the ground and says, 'let's accelerate the surge'…which I think would be a good idea, frankly, frontload the surge -- it could be 30,000 or 35,000 troops."

In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/8, A17, 2.04M) Bing West, former assistant secretary of defense, and Eliot Cohen, professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, write, "The apparent problem is uncontrolled sectarian violence in Baghdad and the apparent solution is to send more American soldiers to restore order. The actual problem is a dysfunctional, sectarian Iraqi political system. Here at home, the imminent debate between the Congress and the administration about the number of American forces is a diversion. … The much-debated 'surge' would only modify our current strategy,"

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/8, A15, 690K) Gen. Wesley Clark, former NATO Supreme Commander, writes, "The odds are that this week President Bush will announce a 'surge' of up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops into Iraq. Will this deliver a 'win'? Probably not. But it will distract us from facing the deep-seated regional issues that must be resolved. … What the surge would do is put more American troops in harm's way, further undercut the morale of U.S. forces and risk further alienating elements of the Iraqi populace."

The Washington Post's Jackson Diehl (1/8, A15) writes, "The new plan for Iraq that President Bush will announce this week will suffer from the same fallacy that has infected each of his previous war strategies. … That is, the notion that American action can produce decisive results in Iraq in six to 12 months." Diehl adds, "the question the country faces is not what can be done on Washington's time, in six or 12 months. It's how the U.S. mission can be configured to adapt to the clock that's running in Iraq."

The New York Times' Paul Krugman (1/8) writes, "The only real question about the planned 'surge' in Iraq — which is better described as a Vietnam-style escalation — is whether its proponents are cynical or delusional."

Boston Globe (1/8, 413K) columnist James Carroll writes, "With his lies at the beginning of this war, and his fantasy now that an honorable outcome remains possible, the president is a taunting killer, caught in the act. ... Stop this man."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/8, 385K) editorializes, "New nameplates on desks need to be accompanied by new and better plans for stabilizing and exiting Iraq, for carrying out diplomacy around the world, and for more fully coordinating U.S. intelligence gathering. ... Bush's own statements and leaks about this week's announcement suggest that he still hasn't gripped the reality that the earlier U.S. goal - to turn Iraq into a stable democracy - is now unachievable. ... Simply looking into Iraqi President Nouri al-Maliki's eyes to see whether he is sincere about disbanding Shiite death squads won't work either. Bush ought to listen to the Baker-Hamilton commission's suggestions to beef up the training of Iraqi security forces, and hold talks with regional neighbors, including Iran and Syria, who can influence the outcome in Iraq."

"Soft Partition" Of Iraq Suggested. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (1/8, 88K), Johns Hopkins visiting scholar Edward Joseph and Brookings fellow Michael O'Hanlon suggest, "Many have already concluded our backup plan for Iraq should be packing up and going home -- or, at most, redeploying to Iraq's borders to protect displaced civilians and deter its neighbors from entering into the civil war. But there is at least one promising Plan B that, while hardly ideal, would be far better for America, Iraq, and the broader region than complete defeat, all-out civil war, and the possibility of broader regional conflict. It would build on Sen. Joe Biden and former Assistant Secretary Leslie Gelb's idea of a soft partitioning of Iraq -- moving away from centralization toward a loose federation (akin to Bosnia) of three largely autonomous regions in which present and future oil revenues would be shared equitably. But it would go beyond Biden/Gelb to confront directly the sectarian strife now raging in and around Baghdad. Rather than striving for a 'neutral Baghdad' as Mr. Biden and Mr. Gelb propose, the Iraqi government would assist threatened minorities relocate to where they feel safer -- helping them find new jobs and housing in the process. This is in effect the Bosnia model for Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0112943

Pelosi Suggests Democrats Could Withhold Funding For Troop "Surge." As President Bush prepares to announce his new strategy for Iraq, ABC World News (1/7, lead story, 3:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported "the new Speaker of the House, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, flexed some new political muscle. Speaker Pelosi raised the possibility that the Democrats could withhold money for the expected centerpiece of the President's plan, sending more troops to Iraq." ABC (Morrell) added, "With Democrats now in control of Congress, and of funding the war in Iraq, they have the power to thwart the President's new strategy. And today, for the first time, the new Speaker of the House warned Congress may not foot the bill, if the President, as expected this week, orders thousands more troops to Iraq."

Pelosi, on CBS's Face the Nation (1/07, Schieffer) said, "If the President chooses to escalate the war, in his budget request we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now. … But if the President wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it. And this is new for him because up until now the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions. … It's not an open-ended commitment anymore." Pelosi added, "There is complete chaos now. … Right now, the war in Iraq is harming our military readiness." The AP (1/8, Yen) reports that "asked about Pelosi's remarks, White House spokesman Alex Conant said Bush welcomed any ideas on Iraq that 'lead to success.'" He added, "We're glad the speaker wants us to succeed in Iraq."

The Washington Times (1/8, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and House Appropriations Committee chairman, "echoed his party leader's warnings and some of her wording, saying, 'There are certainly going to be no blank checks' from his panel." Added Obey, "I think we're going to scrub his request and, at the same time, use it as a chance to really discuss whether or not the policy behind that request makes any sense."

The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Pasternak, 850K) notes "the Democratic leaders also acknowledged that they had a limited ability to prevent the White House from adding forces. Any effort to block funding would expose them to charges of not supporting the troops. And since Congress authorized the use of force in Iraq, placing restraints on that approval could be unconstitutional." Pelosi "emphasized that Congress would not cut off funding for US forces now in Iraq, and said that Democrats supported the president's proposal to increase the overall size of the Army and the Marine Corps." But the Washington Times/UPI (1/8, Waterman) reports "Democrats who want to block any proposed escalation in US troop levels in Iraq have the constitutional authority and the legal power to do so, scholars says. 'It's a fundamental constitutional principle that Congress can initiate and regulate war,' said Neil Kinkopf, a law professor at Georgia State University in Atlanta." Kinkopf, "a former Clinton administration Justice Department official who worked in the Office of Legal Counsel, presented a paper for the liberal American Constitution Society last week arguing that Congress has the power to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq -- a move many expect him to announce this week."

NBC Nightly News (1/7, lead story, 3:10, Corke, 9.87M) noted that in appearances yesterday, Democrats "sharpened their criticism" of Bush's expected Iraq plans. One reason for that, says today's Boston Globe (1/8, Klein, 413K), is that "antiwar activists in the Democratic Party are stepping up demands that their party's leaders cut off funding for the war -- a dramatic step that would force the president to quickly end American involvement in the war. … The push by liberals underscores a split within the Democratic Party that winning the majority in Congress hasn't healed. Democrats are caught between a desire to support US troops and appear strong on national security and a sometimes competing push to end an increasingly unpopular war."

CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who said, "Given a choice between using the money to bring the troops home or using the money to continue the war, I think the American people want a process to begin that will bring our troops home. … What we need to do is, as we announce that we're going to withdraw, we also enable a political process to be started that begins the transition to an international security force."

Democrats To Hold Iraq Hearings This Week. The Washington Post (1/8, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Democratic leaders who had hoped to emphasize their domestic agenda in the opening weeks of Congress have concluded that Iraq will share top billing, and they plan on aggressively confronting administration officials this week in a series of hearings. Pushed by House members who want a quick, tough response to the Iraq strategy President Bush is expected to announce this week," Pelosi "has backed off from her initial assertion that nothing should detract attention from the legislation she hopes to pass in the first 100 hours of House debate." The Post adds, "Late last week, she summoned the chairmen of the Armed Services, Foreign Affairs, intelligence, Homeland Security, and Oversight and Government Reform committees to plot a series of hearings. On Thursday, Democrats will call Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to appear before the House Foreign Affairs Committee to defend the war-strategy shift Bush will outline in a nationally televised speech. A House Armed Services Committee hearing with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, planned for Jan. 19 was abruptly moved to this Thursday after consultations with Pelosi."

DOJ_NMG_0112944

The Christian Science Monitor (1/8, Chaddock, 59K) says that "oversight hearings convening across Capitol Hill, beginning this week, mark an escalation in congressional opposition to the war, including among members of the president's own party." The Monitor adds, "Leading off this month's blitz of Iraq hearings, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to convene a closed intelligence briefing Tuesday afternoon. In all, it plans a dozen hearings on the war this month."

Waxman Characterizes Iraq Spending Audits As "Very, Very Frightening." Rep. Henry Waxman, on ABC's This Week (1/7, Stephanopoulos), said that his "top priority" as chairman of the House Government Reform Committee "is to make sure that taxpayers' funds are no being wasted, that there's no fraud and abuse. These are the taxpayers' dollars, and what we've seen so far in Iraq, according to the government's own auditors, is billions of dollars that have gone to waste and corruption and graft. We're going to look into that more carefully. Only a small part of the money spent in Iraq has been audited, but what we've seen is very, very frightening."

Bush Seen As "Determined To Defy" Opposition To Sending More Troops. Newsweek (1/15, Darman, Wolffe, Thomas, 3.12M), in an article on the Iraq stances of GOP Sens. John McCain and Chuck Hagel, reports that President Bush "seems determined to defy his detractors, not to mention popular opinion. This week Bush is expected to announce a 'New Way Forward' on Iraq that will call for more troops to try to bring order and political stability to Baghdad. … To Bush's many critics, like Hagel, the new Iraq strategy adds up to a waste of more American lives. To Bush's smaller and dwindling band of supporters, like McCain, failure in Iraq is unthinkable. And if duty requires more sacrifice, then so be it. A senior Bush aide, who declined to be named discussing internal White House strategy, tells NEWSWEEK that the president's way-forward plan will be a middle-road approach that falls somewhere between McCain's and Hagel's positions. He will call for a staggered troop increase based on benchmarks for the Iraqis' performance."

Newsweek (1/15, Johnson, 3.12M) reports Bush's speech "laying out his new strategy for Iraq will be scrutinized for its specifics. … But at least as critical to success may be whether Bush is convincing. A draft report recently produced by the Baghdad embassy's director of strategic communications Ginger Cruz and obtained by NEWSWEEK makes the stakes clear: 'Without popular support from US population, there is the risk that troops will be pulled back ... Thus there is a vital need to save popular support via message.' Under the heading DOMESTIC MESSAGES, Cruz goes on to recommend 16 themes to reinforce with the American public, several of which Bush is likely to hit: 'vitally important we succeed'; 'actively working on new approaches'; 'there are no quick or easy answers.'"

Insiders "Suspect" Rove Crafted Bush's Response To ISG. U.S. News and World Report's "White House Week" feature (1/15, Walsh, Bedard, Mulrine) reports White House adviser Karl Rove "is showing no signs of leaving, as some had predicted. Indeed…Rove is as aggressive as ever in making policy arguments-his main theme being that Republicans lost the congressional elections because they didn't sufficiently live up to their core conservative ideals. And his influence is still pervasive, sources say. For instance, GOP insiders suspect that Rove had a big hand in distancing Bush from the Iraq Study Group because he believed the bipartisan panel was too critical of current Iraq policy. Rove, aides say, believes that victory is still achievable and that Bush should pursue it as vigorously as he can."

Democrats Not Expected To Block Iraq War Funding Requests. Newsweek's Howard Fineman (1/15) writes Sen. Barack Obama "says that sending more troops would be 'a mistake that compounds the president's original mistake.' But don't expect Obama -- or most other Dems -- to try to block George W. Bush when he asks Congress in the coming weeks for another billion-dollar bundle for the war. The party won't deny the funds, and may not even try to attach conditions to them. Obama made that clear last week when I saw him in his office. … Party leaders (especially Nancy Pelosi) fear being branded as 'weak on defense' if they kicked off in Congress with antiwar maneuvers." U.S. News and World Report's "White House Week" feature (1/15, Walsh, Bedard, Mulrine) reports President Bush's "strategists say he has a lot more latitude in setting a new policy than his antiwar critics realize -- at least for the next few months. 'The Democrats are going to be in a real bind,' says a Republican insider with close ties to the White House. 'The president will come out with a strong plan to get order in Baghdad, and if the Democrats do anything to undermine or block it, it will look to Americans as though they wouldn't give his plan a chance.' The strategist predicts that 'their tendency will be to give the president a free hand and blame him if doesn't work.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112945

U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Kingsbury, 2.03M) reports House Democrats "have promised hearings into how the war in Iraq has been handled, with scrutiny in a range of committees expected to turn on contractor oversight, force readiness, and the president's forthcoming plan in Iraq. Over on the Senate side, expect three hearings on Iraq this month alone. And Congress will almost certainly consider expanding the size of the Army and Marine Corps, a measure that is expected to receive broad support on both sides of the aisle." Sen. Patrick Leahy "wants to crack down on war profiteering, and he's promising to implement the Iraq Study Group recommendations to develop the devastated country's judicial system and train its police force." U.S. News and World Report's Brian Duffy (1/15) reports, "Democrats promise vigorous oversight, and given their all-but-total abdication on the issue heretofore and the administration's abject mismanagement of postwar operations there, that's as it should be. Obsession with toll-taking alone, however, would be a mistake."

Provincial Shiites Rely On Mahdi Army To Provide Security. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "Shiite militias have been called into Baqubah at the behest of beleaguered Shiites, often arriving from strongholds such as Baghdad's Sadr City to provide protection against a Sunni insurgency that has driven thousands of Shiite families from their homes. 'The Shiites get pushed around by Sunnis, and JAM shows up,' says the officer. JAM, or Jaish al-Mahdi, is also known as the Mahdi Army militia, which is loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr,

Will Says Saddam's Execution Exposed Iraq's "Barbaric Sectarianism." In his column for Newsweek (1/15, 3.12M) George Will writes, "The hanging of Saddam Hussein…may have been a tipping point. The video, which The Economist said resembled 'the sordid snuff videos circulated on the internet by al-Qaeda,' may have been, in the scheme of things, just a straw. But coming when it did, it was, for many Americans, perhaps the last straw. In it, they recognized how far into the abyss Iraqi political culture has fallen. The hanging was conducted in the presence of taunting adherents of Moqtada al-Sadr, the loutish cleric whose militia, the Mahdi Army, is a prime example of why post-Saddam Iraq is a thugocracy. The hanging was an episode of bloodthirsty primitivism in the service of barbaric sectarianism. Which is to say, the hanging was an accurate expression of Iraq's civic culture."

Meanwhile, U.S. News and World Report's Fouad Ajami (1/15) writes, "There was mayhem at the gallows, and there was justice at the gallows. … It was said in the Sunni strongholds of Iraq, and in the Arab capitals, that it had been bad form that the dictator had been dispatched at dawn, on the first day of Id al-Adha" but "those protests came from people who had never shed a tear for Saddam's victims. Their loyalties are atavistic: They are motivated by a dread of the Shiites, and by a reflexive, unthinking anti-Americanism."

Lawmakers Break Largely Along Party Lines On "Surge." NBC Nightly News (1/7, lead story, 3:10, Corke, 9.87M) reported the expected "surge" proposal "sparked heated debate among lawmakers on Capitol Hill" on the Sunday morning political talk shows. Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden was shown saying, "Think about this: Nobody, nobody, has recommended what the President is about to do." Republicans "say more troops are needed." GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "The biggest mistake we could make is to repeat the mistakes of the past and not have enough people on the ground to make a difference."

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/7, Russert) for his response to Bush's anticipated "surge" proposal, Biden said, "There's not much I can do about it. Not much anybody can do about it. He's commander in chief. If he surges another 20, 30, or whatever number he's going to, into Baghdad, it'll be a tragic mistake, in my view, but, as a practical matter, there's no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop.' … I've drafted a resolution of disapproval that is just hortatory, it's – to send to the Senate to try to convince the president that there are significant numbers and members of the United States Senate who think this proposal is a mistake, and hopefully force him to reconsider it."

Graham, on NBC's Meet the Press (1/7, Russert), predicted that "there'll be a lot of support by Republican members. … Even though it may not be politically popular for the moment, I think it is in our best interests long term." Graham added, "The reason Senator McCain and Lindsey Graham and a few others are supporting this when 14 percent of the public supports us, and 80-something percent is against us, is we're thinking about the consequences of a failed state in Iraq. That's more important than 2008. We cannot let this country go into the abyss. Now is the last chance and the only chance we have left to get this right. … The biggest mistake we could make as a nation is to listen to Pelosi and Reid doctrine of withdrawing without wondering what happens when we leave."

South Carolina's The State (1/8, Rosen) notes Graham's comments this morning, adding the senator "has broken with Bush on key national security issues in the last two years, most prominently over how the United States should interrogate and prosecute accused terrorist detainees." Now "his support for Bush's anticipated plan to send more troops to Iraq places him at odds with other prominent GOP senators. Sen. Richard Lugar, an Indiana Republican who was replaced by Biden as head of the foreign relations panel, has declined to endorse a troop increase; GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, also eyeing a White House run, called the increase 'folly' and 'Alice in Wonderland' last week."

DOJ_NMG_0112946

With the exception of GOP Sen. Trent Lott, who on CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) would not commit to backing Bush's expected "surge" plans, lawmakers broke along party lines on the Sunday talk showed. Said Lott, "I want to see what the [President's] plan is. I think it makes sense to wait. I think a lot of people are anticipating everything the President may propose. They may be surprised."

As the Washington Post (1/8, A4, Tyson, 690K) notes "Republican lawmakers…voiced general support for the Bush plan as outlined, although they acknowledged it will be controversial and unpopular." For example, asked on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume) if he believes his Republican Senate colleagues will "go along" with Bush's plan, Sen. Mitch McConnell predicted, "There will be some who will and some who won't. … At the end of the day, though, I don't think Congress will cut off money for the troops. Congress is incapable of micromanaging the tactics in the war. And even though this will be a controversial step, I think the president will be able to carry it out, and I hope he'll be successful. … I don't think the President should be criticized for, A, recognizing that things were not going well and, B, making substantial changes in order to achieve the goal."

CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Minority Whip Roy Blunt, who said, "I think it's a huge mistake…to begin to jump to the commander in chief's job as a member of Congress. And I think my friends Nancy [Pelosi] and Harry [Reid] are making that mistake by thinking they can strategize what's the best thing to happen. What's more important is the mission. And that's what I'm interested in hearing the president talk about is the mission."

CNN's Late Edition (1/7, Blitzer) interviewed Sen. Barbara Boxer, who said, "The Congress ought to have a chance to look at this. And frankly, I'd like to have a vote on this, you know, whether we want to escalate the number of troops in there. My own view is, that's the wrong way to go."

Rep. Steny Hoyer, on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume), noted that Democrats "see this simply as an escalation and not a change. Essentially, we've gone up and down on troop levels before. We did so just recently. And when we sent troops into Baghdad, we sort of had community-by-community success but a general escalation, both in violence, sectarian confrontation, and loss of life. So we don't see this as a new policy, and I think it's going to be greeted with great skepticism."

Rep. Charles Rangel, on ABC's This Week (1/7, Stephanopoulos), commented, "I think the public is way ahead of the Congress in saying enough is enough. And the whole idea that we're supposed to tell our children to put themselves in harm's way in order to support a surge, which generals say have nothing to do with the military victory, is going to undercut the President even further."

McCain, Hagel Offer Sharply Different Assessments Of "Surge" Proposal. Newsweek (1/15, Darman, Wolffe, Thomas, 3.12M), in an article titled, "McCain vs. Hagel: Two Views on the War," notes, "War itself is a foreign concept to many solons of Capitol Hill; a small number—perhaps as few as 25 out of 535—have come under fire in combat." Sens. John McCain and Chuck Hagel "are obvious and visible exceptions. … Both men have seen the face of war up close. But on the question of the Iraq war, they are almost mirror opposites." Hagel "is almost angrily dismissive of the idea of sending an additional 10,000 to 20,000 troops to Iraq. … 'will guarantee that there's going to be a lot more American casualties. And there's going to be a lot more animosity by the Iraqis.'" McCain, "by contrast, was almost dispassionate when he told a NEWSWEEK reporter that he wishes to expand the war in Iraq. His attitude was coolly self-assured. 'All of us establish records,' he says about his repeated calls for more troops in Iraq. 'If I was wrong in the beginning, my credibility might be somewhat less now.' McCain suggests that the Bush administration…should have listened to him all along. 'I hate to sound so 'I told you so,' but I've been saying we've got to have a larger Army and Marine Corps for a long, long time.'" Newsweek adds, McCain "can sound a little matter-of-fact about sending young people off to combat."

Hagel Said To Have Appeal To Conservative Primary Voters. Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (1/15) writes, "The most stunning thing about the Republican campaign so far is the vacuum on the right. While McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney (a moderate Republican until five minutes ago) battle over the centrists in the party, the conservative base that actually determines the nomination remains forlorn. … Pooh-bahs in both parties have convinced the candidates that they have to raise $100 million this year to be competitive. This is nonsense in the Internet age, peddled by consultants who need that booty for their own pockets." Sen. Chuck Hagel "might not run" but "if he does…would be formidable."

Fallon Seen As "Experienced" Officer And Diplomat. The New York Times (1/8, Shanker, 1.16M) reports in a positive article, "A range of military officers at the Pentagon noted that if Adm. William J. Fallon was confirmed by the Senate to the Central Command position, he would be not only the first naval officer to command the region, but also a four-star officer moving between regional combatant commands. Often, such posts are given as promotions to three-star officers." "Senior" sources "said Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates's recommendation of Admiral Fallon, currently in command of all American forces in the Pacific, reflected a wish for seasoned eyes on Afghanistan and Iraq as well as a new focus on regional initiatives to reassure allies and deter adversaries, in particular Iran." Fallon has been both "diplomatic" and "tough" in his Pacific duties: "he volunteered" to apologize to Japan in 2001 after a US submarine accidentally sank a Japanese ship; on the other hand, in the Philippines, "he took the unusual and punitive move of canceling a large annual field exercise with the Philippines over a local judge's failure to honor the bilateral treaty governing protections for American military personnel." The Times predicts that he "can be expected to pay great attention to the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan, but to leave day-to-day operations to the senior commanders on the ground in Baghdad and Kabul, similar to his current relationship as Pacific regional commander to the four-star Army officer in charge of forces just in South Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0112947

US, Iraqi Forces Launch "Thundering" Assault On Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Bombers, fighter jets and attack helicopters unleashed a thundering attack today as U.S. and Iraqi soldiers closed in on a web of sunken irrigation canals east of Baghdad, where they believed Sunni Arab insurgents were massing. The pre-dawn strikes shook the ground and sent orange fireballs and thick smoke into the sky. ... About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops are participating in the assault, which includes attack helicopters, tanks and Humvees. Over the past four days, columns of soldiers have pushed through hamlets populated by wheat farmers and sheep herders in a methodical sweep to clear an area full of spider holes, secret tunnels and weapons caches. ... The region is a stronghold of the powerful Al Daini tribe, which includes many disaffected former officers from Saddam Hussein's army."

Five More US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. The AP (1/8, Frayer, Mattar) reports, "The U.S. military said three airmen were killed in Baghdad Sunday by a car bomb, a soldier was killed by small arms fire in Baghdad a day earlier, and another soldier died in combat in western Anbar province on Friday. A British soldier also died in a traffic accident. ... A new battle for Iraq's capital was under way with Iraqi forces mired in gunfights with insurgents and U.S. helicopters hovering over an area where some 30 people died in fighting the previous night."

Nearly 23,000 Iraqis Said To Be Killed In 2006. The Washington Post (1/8, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "More than 17,000 Iraqi civilians and police officers died violently in the latter half of 2006, according to Iraqi Health Ministry statistics, a sharp increase that coincided with rising sectarian strife since the February bombing of a landmark Shiite shrine. In the first six months of last year, 5,640 Iraqi civilians and police officers were killed, but that number more than tripled to 17,310 in the latter half of the year, according to data provided by a Health Ministry official with direct knowledge of the statistics. ... Last year's spike in casualties occurred despite an ambitious U.S. military operation in the capital, Together Forward ... Iraq's death toll from violence is controversial because it provides a vivid report card on the difficulty of U.S. and Iraqi efforts to bring order to the country. Neither the U.S. government nor the military provides death totals for Iraqis." Although Health Ministry statistics are considered more reliable, "because they are based solely on death certificates ... The ministry is under the control of the Shiite religious party of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is behind much of the sectarian killing."

Increased Violence Slows Supply Lines In Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (1/8, Barrett, 59K) reports from the Kuwaiti-Iraqi border, "More than 200 18-wheelers wait to cross into Iraq. Braving Sunni insurgents, Shiite militias, and criminal gangs, these trucks are vital links in the supply chain that keeps some 130,000 US military personnel in Iraq afloat. ... A stark reminder of the perilousness of the 400-mile journey from here to a US logistics hub in Iraq came last week in a videotape of five kidnapped security contractors." Violence has increased on the route; "It's worse than before ... [the trucks] come under fire more frequently," said an anonymous Pakistani businessman. The Monitor adds, "And with the possibility of increasing US forces by some 20,000 combat troops seeming more likely, the supply route from Kuwait will be ever more vital." British professor Paul Rodgers "says that a more substantial US combat presence in Iraq could cause insurgents to avoid direct confrontation and intensify attacks on supply lines."

Two More Saddam Co-Defendants Await Execution. The AP (1/8, Frayer, Mattar) reports, "Two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants were taken from their cells and told they were going to be hanged on the same day the former dictator was executed, their lawyer said Sunday. But the two condemned men still await death as Iraqi officials decide how to avoid the kind of outcry that followed Saddam's hanging on Dec. 30." The two are "Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief Barzan Ibrahim and the former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar." A defense attorney for them said of the delay, "Their execution should be commuted under such circumstances because of the psychological pain they endured as they waited to hang." Human Rights Watch "said the speedy trial and subsequent execution of Saddam and those planned for Ibrahim and al-Bandar illustrated the Iraqi government's disregard for human rights."

Professor Decries Saddam's Hanging. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M), medical professor Abraham Verghese writes, "Saddam's hanging disturbs us because it was perverse, vengeful, furtive, hasty, carried out under cover of darkness and in front of a hoarse, excitable male audience who acted as if they were at a carnival, or, to be more precise, as if they were at a lynching. ... With the video I felt just as I did as a child witnessing an actual hanging: That the condemned man gets perverse revenge because there is a shame that accompanies such a spectacle; it spreads and stains all who are there, all who drive by, all who watch it on television, or who, like me, download it with a click of the mouse; the killer being executed has suddenly become noble, and turned us into killers."

DOJ_NMG_0112948

UK's Brown Suggests Iraq Policy Shift. The AP (1/8, Stringer) reports, "Treasury chief Gordon Brown, expected to succeed Tony Blair as prime minister by September, suggested Sunday that he will pursue an Iraq policy that is more independent of Washington than the current government. Brown ... promised to be 'very frank' with President Bush. He also said that Britain is likely to scale down its commitment of troops to Iraq over the next year — even as the White House is considering dispatching thousands more, at least temporarily." Brown's comments on BBC radio "seemed intended to distinguish himself from Blair, who has been criticized in Britain for his strong support for Bush and the war, both unpopular here."

US Agencies Lack Adequate Number Of Arabic Speakers. ABC World News (1/7, story 10, 3:00, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "As the nation debates what to do next in Iraq, tonight, we spotlight one enormous and often overlooked obstacle, a drastic shortage of Americans who speak Arabic. The recent report from the Iraq Study Group found that of the 1,000 Americans at the US Embassy in Baghdad, only 6 are fluent in Arabic. Many critics ask, 'If we can't speak the language in Iraq, how can we improve things?'" ABC noted that "although more and more Americans are studying Arabic at home and abroad…only 10% of US colleges offer Arabic courses. Soldiers heading to Iraq try to learn a few phrases. But critics say the lack of Americans fluent in Arabic is making the US problems in Iraq immeasurably worse." Meanwhile, critics say "that the government needs to make a massive investment in training Arabic speakers, as it did during the cold war training Russian speakers."

Iraqi Soccer Suffers From War Too. The New York Times (1/8, Semple, 1.16M) reports, "Soccer has become an escape from the uncertainty and violence of life, a source of camaraderie and even a binding force of nationalism in a country riven by sectarianism. ... Despite the national team's successes abroad, the sport at home has been fraught with the same uncertainties as the rest of Iraqi life. The professional league halted at the 2003 invasion; play was not resumed until late 2004. Though the stadiums remain remarkably free of violence, fear of attacks has cut into attendance. Ticket revenues and government support have declined, and the stadiums and practice facilities are in poor shape. The best players have fled abroad, seeking safer conditions and more lucrative contracts. ... In recent months, athletes and sports officials have been shot and kidnapped."

Newborn Babies, Women Killed In Taliban Attack. The New York Times (1/8, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "The Taliban appeared to be resuming their campaign of violence after a week of quiet over the Islamic festival of Id al-Adha. Two newborn babies, their mother and a grandmother were killed in a roadside bombing in eastern Afghanistan as they were returning home from the hospital on Sunday, said the provincial police chief of Khost, Muhammad Ayub, who called the attack 'inhuman.' ... More than 600 civilians have been killed in the past three years, including those killed as a result of operations by NATO, American and Afghan troops as well as attacks by the Taliban and Al Qaeda, the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission reported Sunday. The commission appealed for the military to take more care to avoid civilian casualties and called for compensation to be given to the victims' families."

LATimes Weighs In On Watada Trial. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, 850K) editorializes about the Watada court-martial, "Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada may or may not have a good claim for conscientious objector status. ... But Army lawyers are overreaching when they try to prosecute their case by drafting reporters. ... The Army has his statements, but it subpoenaed reporters to authenticate that he, in fact, said what is in print and on tape. ... No prosecutor should be able to conscript any reporter into being a deputy by compelling testimony about a statement made by a source -- or go fishing for information beyond what a reporter presents in a story --unless it's absolutely vital to protect US citizens from crime or attack."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jobs May Still Face DOJ Scrutiny In Apple Options Probe. Bloomberg (1/8, Gullo, Guglielmo) reports, "Apple Computer Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs, exonerated by the company's board last month in a stock-options scandal, may still face scrutiny from U.S. investigators." Bloomberg continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice may question Jobs as they probe whether current and former Apple executives, directors and others committed fraud by backdating some stock-option awards to inflate their value, said criminal defense attorneys who formerly worked at those agencies." Bloomberg adds, "Apple said Dec. 29 that 6,428 stock options issued between 1997 and 2002 were backdated. That included one grant to Jobs marked as approved at a special board meeting that never occurred. Jobs recommended some favorable dates on options other than his own. Apple, which found 'no misconduct' by Jobs, didn't say which options the CEO backdated or why it faked a board meeting. … 'The SEC and the Justice Department are not bound by the company's conclusions,' said San Francisco-based attorney Jahan Raissi, a former senior counsel in the SEC's enforcement division. 'They have far more powerful tools to force people to talk to get information.'" Bloomberg notes, "Cupertino, California-based Apple, maker of the iPod music player and Macintosh computer, is among the largest of the more than 195 companies embroiled so far in a stock-options scandal that broke last year. … Prosecutors will want to know what Jobs, 51, was told in meetings and in telephone calls and if any advice was given to him by outside attorneys, said Robert Mintz, a white-collar criminal defense attorney in Newark, New Jersey, and former assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey. … A person familiar with the matter said Oct. 5 that federal prosecutors in San Francisco are investigating Apple's backdating of stock options. … The computer maker's revelation that Jobs chose some of the dates for options grants will prompt investigators to explore his role, said William Portanova, a white collar criminal defense attorney in Sacramento, California, and former U.S. prosecutor in California."

DOJ_NMG_0112949

Apple Probe Investigator May Have Had Conflicts. USA Today (1/8, 2B, Farrell) reports, "One of the directors in charge of Apple's internal investigation into backdated stock options ran a computer reseller that accounted for about $600 million worth of Apple sales from 2000 to 2003. … That financial relationship, even though it no longer exists, should have disqualified director Jerome York from the assignment, say two corporate governance experts." USA continues, "York, an Apple director for the past 10 years who chairs the board's audit and finance committee, was one of three board members on a committee that oversaw last year's probe into the company's improperly awarded options grants. … In January 2000, York led an investor group that paid more than $700 million to buy Micro Warehouse, a distributor of Macintosh computers and related products. York became chairman and CEO." USA adds, "Over the next three years, according to Apple's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Apple drew about 3% of its annual net sales from Micro Warehouse. York sold the company's assets to CDW in September 2003 for $22 million. … In addition to the history of his business relationship with Apple, York faced another conflict in overseeing the special probe: He sat on Apple's compensation committee during part of the time when Apple now says options were backdated. Apple said York recused himself from that part of the probe. … As head of the compensation committee, York had approved some of the grants that were investigated."

Apple Attorney Who Backdated Options Was Quietly Fired. The California Recorder (1/8, Scheck) reports, "Steve Jobs is an ideas guy. He wears jeans, grows beards and orates to cheering throngs at events like this week's MacWorld conference. … Jobs' biographers say evidence indicates that he's a pescetarian. He went to India. He takes only $1 a year in salary. And he leaves it up to other people to award him hugely valuable piles of stock in Apple Computer, where he's the CEO." The Recorder continues, "People like Wendy Howell, the former in-house Apple lawyer responsible for option paperwork, probably won't be attending Jobs' eagerly awaited MacWorld speech Tuesday. Late last year, she became the lone person to lose her job as a result of the company's well-publicized options problems. … Howell's name hasn't been publicly mentioned in the Apple options mess, and her firing wasn't disclosed by the company in its series of public disclosures of options problems. … But she was the person who filled out the paperwork on a 2001 option award to Jobs that has grown infamous since just after Christmas, when Apple acknowledged that the value of the grant was artificially pumped up via a set of fabricated meeting minutes." The Recorder notes, "Howell's role was detailed by various people familiar with the situation, all of whom refused to be named because of the federal government's ongoing criminal and regulatory probes of Apple. … As the person who wrote out those 'minutes,' Howell has become a central figure in the Apple probe -- both as a potential defendant in a fraud case and as someone who could tell the government who at the company knew about backdating and its financial and legal implications."

FCC Expected To Issue New Rules On Phone Records Protection. USA Today (1/8, 1B, Davidson) reports, "Four months after Hewlett-Packard's spying scandal, the Federal Communications Commission is expected within weeks to set new rules protecting personal phone records from unauthorized disclosure." USA continues, "The move follows last summer's revelations that investigators for Hewlett-Packard used deception to obtain the phone records of board members and reporters in an effort to identify the sources of news leaks about company matters." USA adds, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin is recommending the FCC order land-line and wireless phone carriers to require that customers use a password to immediately obtain their calling records from a representative by phone, FCC officials say. … Customers also could obtain their records without a password by asking phone companies to send the information to their home addresses, or having a phone company representative call them back at their home or cellphone number of record." USA notes, "A majority of the FCC's five commissioners support the proposal, though some details could be modified before the new rules are approved in the next few weeks, agency officials say."

DOJ_NMG_0112950

Goal Of CEO Pay Critics Said To Be "Social Responsibility." In a USA Today op-ed (1/8, 19A), Yaron Brook, executive director of the Ayn Rand Institute, says, "Critics of CEO pay are lampooning the $210 million Robert Nardelli received after a disappointing six-year tenure at Home Depot." But by "what right does the government, or anyone else, claim the power to dictate what owners of Home Depot or any other private company can pay someone to run their company? It's their company. If through error or irrationality they overpay (or underpay, and so fail to attract good managers), as Home Depot may have done, the loss is theirs." Critics "of CEO pay agitate for ever more control over corporate governance. They are not concerned with corporate wealth creation, but with 'corporate social responsibility' — the idea that executives and shareholders should be forced to sacrifice money-making for the sake of sundry 'stakeholders.'"

Herbert Says Wealth Distribution Inequities "Pervasive." In his New York Times (1/8, 1.16M), Bob Herbert says, "Data recently compiled by the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston offers a startling look at just how out of whack executive compensation has become." According to "the center's director, Andrew Sum, the top five Wall Street firms (Bear Stearns, Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, Merrill Lynch and Morgan Stanley) were expected to award an estimated $36 billion to $44 billion worth of bonuses to their 173,000 employees, an average of between $208,000 and $254,000, 'with the bulk of the gains accruing to the top 1,000 or so highest-paid managers.'" The "pervasive unfairness in the way the great wealth of the United States is distributed should be seen for what it is, an insidious disease eating away at the structure of the society and undermining its future."

CRIMINAL LAW:

States Tap Texas' Execution Expertise. USA Today (1/8, 16A, Johnson, Willing, 2.27M) reports that when New Mexico executed convicted murderer Terry Clark on November 6, 2001, the "executioner who carried out the death sentence was an unidentified contractor who learned how to administer a deadly chemical cocktail as a member of the lethal injection team in Texas, which operates the nation's busiest death house." The "outsourced execution, and others like it, has drawn attention to Texas' growing reputation as the nation's source for behind-the-scenes guidance and experience in carrying out lethal injections at a time when that method of execution is increasingly under fire. As lawsuits from California to Florida have challenged the constitutionality of lethal injections, more than a dozen states and the federal government have sought Texas' advice in carrying out such executions."

Bush May Address Homicide Wave In State Of The Union. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Sullivan, 2.03M) reports 2006 "is expected to snap a long stretch of relatively good news on the homicide front nationwide, moving questions about the causes of crime increases off the back burner they have occupied for more than a decade. … The numbers are causing more than a little alarm and getting more than a little attention-from the nation's police chiefs, from Congress, from the Justice Department, perhaps even from the president in his State of the Union speech later this month. Slowly but surely, violent crime is returning to the national agenda. Nationwide murder totals for 2006 will not be available until the fall, when the FBI releases its annual Uniform Crime Report. But an analysis by U.S. News shows a substantive, if uneven, increase in homicide in the nation's 20 largest cities. The 19 cities for which data were available had 4,152 homicides in 2006, compared with 3,919 the previous year-a 6 percent increase."

Judge To Consider Access To Jeffs Evidence At Hearing Today. The AP (1/8, Dobner) reports, "When a Cadillac Escalade ferrying polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs was pulled over in Nevada in August, authorities found $54,000 cash, 15 cell phones, portable radios, wigs and four laptops. The documents stored on those computers was to be the subject of a legal tug-of-war Monday as Jeffs' attorneys try to convince a judge that the laptops contain privileged communication between the spiritual leader and his followers." The AP notes, "Attorneys for the United Effort Plan Trust, which holds $110 million in church property, and Shem Fischer, a former follower who sued Jeffs after being fired," are seeking "access to papers, letters and electronic documents being held by the FBI. In court documents, Jeffs' Las Vegas attorney Richard Wright contends the information on the laptops is 'sacred and confidential' because it includes matters of church doctrine and private communications between Jeffs and his followers."

The Deseret Morning News (1/8, Winslow) reports, "The 'mother lode' of evidence the FBI seized…will be fought over in a federal courtroom," and "the feds don't seem willing to give it up. 'We will just continue with our same interest in the case,' said Melodie Rydalch, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney for Utah, which is handling the case. 'That is protecting the evidence that can be used in a criminal case.' … FBI agents have told the Deseret Morning News the seized evidence includes ledgers containing names of people who helped keep Jeffs on the run. The FLDS leader was put on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested in a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August 2006."

DOJ_NMG_0112951

WSJournal Criticizes Fitzgerald For Not Releasing Reporters' Affidavits. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M) says in an editorial that special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "has some other unfinished legal business that the public has a right to know about -- namely, the affidavits he filed with the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals to justify his motion to compel two reporters to testify about their conversations with Mr. Libby, and his willingness to throw one of them in jail for 85 days until she did so. Those documents remain under seal, which is why Dow Jones and the Associated Press filed a motion with the D.C. Circuit late last month requesting their release." Finding the "leaker was Mr. Fitzgerald's main charge from the Justice Department, so why did he keep pursuing reporters with such hyper-zeal for another two years?"

Judge Recommends Tightening Defendant Indigency Mechanisms. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/8), Morris B. Hoffman, a a Colorado state trial judge and a fellow at the Gruter Institute for Law and Behavioral Research, writes, "Sixteen years as a state trial judge have left me with a deep respect for the professionalism and competence of the public defenders who handle felony cases for indigent criminal defendants in my courtroom. … So when two economists from Emory University, Paul Rubin and Joanna Shepherd, agreed last year to collaborate with me on an econometric study of how effective public defenders really are, I had to guard against confirmation bias. I was positive that public defenders would prove more effective than their private counterparts. Mr. Rubin and Ms. Shepherd, with their occupational faith in markets, were equally positive of just the opposite. In the end, the economists were right, though with an interesting twist." Hoffman continues, "We looked at all 5,224 felony criminal cases filed in Denver in 2002. … The results were surprising. The average sentence for clients of public defenders was almost three years longer than the average for clients of private lawyers. … But our most notable finding was hidden in one of the variables we had controlled — the seriousness of the case. We had assumed that public defenders on average handled more serious cases than private lawyers, if for no other reason than that such cases carry higher bonds, and defendants who can't make those bonds are often rendered indigent by their pretrial incarceration. The length of their clients' sentences would of course be distorted by the fact that they handle more serious cases with longer potential sentences. … But when we removed the control for the seriousness of the crime, public defenders performed relatively worse, not better (five years more incarceration versus three years more)." Hoffman adds, "It turns out that the explanation, at least in part, is one that should put a smile on the face of all free-marketers and rational choice theorists: criminal defendants, just like any other consumers of services, appear to be making choices based on their rational assessments of costs and benefits. But, you might ask, do criminal defendants ever really have a choice between public defenders and private counsel? It appears many do. … Our data suggested that, contrary to the law's rather binary notion of indigency, a large chunk of felony criminal defendants are what we have called 'marginally indigent.' They could, if they had to, tap hidden resources, or the resources of family and friends, to retain private lawyers. But what drives that decision? Just what you'd expect from any rational consumer of criminal defense services: a combination of the seriousness of the offense and the likelihood of conviction." Hoffman concludes, "If self-selection by guilty, marginally indigent defendants is driving a big part of this effectiveness difference, the remedy may simply be to tighten the mechanisms we use to determine indigency. This solution would not only reduce the outcome differences between public defenders and private defense lawyers, but it would also give taxpayers more bang for their public defender buck."

CIVIL LAW:

Plame Denied Permission To Write About Her CIA Role. Newsweek (1/15, Isikoff, 3.12M) reports, "A CIA panel has told former officer Valerie Plame she can't write about her undercover work for the agency, a position that may threaten a lucrative book project with her publisher. … In what could be a precursor to a separate legal battle, Plame recently hired a lawyer to challenge the CIA Publications Review Board, which must clear writings by former employees. The panel refused Plame permission to even mention that she worked for the CIA because she served as a 'nonofficial cover' officer (or NOC) posing as a private businesswoman, according to an adviser to Plame."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Smaller Version Of Taser Goes On Sale For Private Use. USA Today (1/8, 1D, Davis) reports, "Taser International today unveils a new model of its controversial stun gun designed for widespread use by regular folks. It's more affordable and small enough to be stashed in a purse or backpack." USA continues, "Critics and supporters have a lot to say about the sleek device unveiled at the 2007 International Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas. The size of a TV remote control, the Taser C2 goes on sale in April for about $300 and comes in the metallic pink, electric blue and titanium silver of popular cellphones. … Opponents say Tasers can be used for torture; supporters say the devices are safe when used appropriately." USA adds, "Taser has sold about 120,000 civilian versions since 1994, a model that is larger than the latest incarnation and shaped like a gun. Since 1991, Taser has sold more than 200,000 devices to law enforcement. Both shoot barbs that pierce the skin and deliver an incapacitating jolt of electricity. Current civilian models cost about $1,000. … Taser says the C2, less powerful than the police version, is designed to stun for 30 seconds, providing enough time for the shooter to flee from danger. … The Taser C2 has some police worried. 'There are concerns in law enforcement about the public having access to these types of weapons,' says Wendy Balazik, spokeswoman for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. 'Those concerns include: Who is buying them? How are they going to be used? What are they going to be used for?'"

DOJ_NMG_0112952

NYTimes Urges Congress To "Fix" Electronic Voting Machines. The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "There is by now no doubt that there are serious problems with electronic voting machines: they fail to record votes, and even flip votes from one candidate to another. Election officials like to defend the machines by noting that they have been certified by independent testing labs. But the certification process has long been deeply flawed, and last week there was even more disturbing news — that the leading testing lab has been unable to meet the federal government's standards." Since last summer, "Ciber Inc., the largest tester of voting machine software, has been unable to meet federal quality standards that will take effect later this year." The Election Assistance Commission, "the agency that evaluates the labs, did not reveal that Ciber fell short, and is still not saying what is wrong." Congress should "pass legislation fixing the system. The vendors should continue to pay the costs, but the government should choose and pay the labs. That would make the labs responsive to the correct customer — the public."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Antitrust Division Defends Performance. The Legal Times (1/8, McLure) reports, "For more than two years, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division has been trying to shake the perception that it's been snakebitten. … It's a perception that Thomas Barnett, the head of the Antitrust Division, isn't happy about. 'I don't agree with it,' Barnett says, before ticking off what he views as the division's major merger challenges over the past year: a pretrial settlement with a dairy company protecting competition in milk sales to a number of schools in Kentucky and Tennessee, a consent decree with Mittal Steel Co. requiring it to sell a Canadian tin plant as part of its purchase of Arcelor S.A., and another consent decree requiring the sale of six generating plants as part of a merger between two power companies — a deal later blocked by New Jersey state officials. … Those actions, of course, are hardly of the magnitude of Oracle-PeopleSoft, the challenge to which Barnett helped oversee as a deputy to then-antitrust chief R. Hewitt Pate. And Barnett, who was confirmed as the division's assistant attorney general in February, is sensitive to criticism that his division hasn't been vigorously protecting consumers or playing an active role in public policy." The Times notes, "Late last month the Justice Department issued a release touting the Antitrust Division's achievements during his first year on the job. (Before his confirmation, Barnett served as the division's acting chief for several months.) The release highlights the division's continued crackdown on international price-fixing cartels (which netted nearly $500 million in criminal fines in 2006), its streamlining of the merger review process, and the division's recent spurt of activity before the Supreme Court (the high court has granted cert in seven antitrust cases over the past two terms, an unusually high number) as evidence that its lawyers have been anything but inactive. … Despite those activities, it's the division's merger-enforcement activity — or relative lack thereof — that is most notable to many antitrust lawyers in private practice. Behind the cautious approach, say these practitioners, is more than just conservative economic thinking about the role of government in the marketplace, but a fear of bringing another big case to trial and losing."

US Conducting Security Review Of European Telecom Venture. The Financial Times (1/8, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The US government conducted a national security review of the proposed $21bn (€16.1bn) joint venture agreement between Nokia and Siemens, and forced the European telecoms equipment makers to sign a 'mitigation agreement' that imposed restrictions on the new company." The Times continues, "While the US has hitherto shown keen interest in foreign takeovers of US telecoms carriers, the decision to probe the joint venture indicates a new trend. … Agencies involved in the national security review process – especially the departments of defence, homeland security and justice – are intensifying their scrutiny of companies that make components for mobile and fixed-line networks globally." The Times adds, "People familiar with the classified national security review by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US – Cfius – the inter-agency panel that investigates foreign takeovers of US assets for possible security threats, said the panel had imposed security requirements on the venture. These include procedures that dictate whether foreigners can work on US equipment and software. … But the government's interest in the industry – reinforced by the tough measures it imposed on Alcatel's merger with Lucent – raises questions about whether the inter-agency panel is going beyond its mandate of identifying and preventing risky foreign takeovers. … The mitigation agreement, or conditions to which a company agrees to gain regulatory clearance, could set a precedent in an industry that is bracing for consolidation globally."

DOJ_NMG_0112953

ENVIRONMENT

Democrats Target Minerals Management Service Over Oil And Gas Royalties. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A6, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "With Democrats controlling Congress, the oil industry is in for a rough ride," as is the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which "Democrats and some Republicans" complain as mishandled the program for collection of royalties for oil and gas drilling on federal lands. The "issue will hit the spotlight Jan. 18, when the House takes up energy legislation targeting oil-industry subsidies. One goal: untangling a legal mess that could allow companies to escape paying at least $10 billion in future royalties for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. As part of the debate, congressional critics are sure to ramp up their complaints about the service, which has said that it failed to include a clause requiring the royalties into leases issued in 1998 and 1999." The "department is scrambling to try to assuage critics. C. Stephen Allred, an assistant secretary at the Interior Department who oversees the service, announced Dec. 14 that five oil companies...had agreed to amend their leases to begin paying royalties on oil and gas produced since Oct. 1, 2006, but not before. Dozens of other companies haven't agreed to change the leases."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

San Francisco Area Has Highest Percentage Of Regular Drug Users. USA Today (1/8, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports the San Francisco metropolitan area "has a higher percentage of people who are regular drug users than any other major metropolitan area in the USA, a study from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration found." Nearly "13% of San Francisco residents reported using some type of illicit drug, such as marijuana, cocaine or heroin, in the previous month, according to data from the National Surveys on Drug Use and Health 2002-05. The national average is 8.1%." USA lists "other areas with drug-abuse rates higher than the national average" such as "Seattle, 9.6%; Detroit, 9.5%; Philadelphia, 9.1%; and Boston, 8.5%. Cities with the lowest drug use: Houston, 6.2%; and Washington, Dallas and Riverside/San Bernardino, Calif., all at 6.5%."

Three "Operation Highstep" Suspects Face Charges In Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Coen) reported three men "extradited from Colombia have appeared in federal court in a drug- smuggling case, marking what is thought to be the first time defendants have been sent from that country to face charges in Chicago in at least a decade. They were among eight people indicted here in 2005 in connection with Operation Highstep, which cracked down on a nationwide ring of smugglers bringing heroin and cocaine into the U.S. hidden in furniture, the frames of paintings and the soles of shoes." The DEA "said the case was a unique effort. 'The extradition of these defendants is an example of a successful law enforcement partnership,' said Gary G. Olenkiewicz, special agent in charge of DEA's Chicago Field Division."

"Operation Director's Cut" Leads To 20-Year Sentence For Financial Services Executive. The Washington Times (1/6, Seper) reported a two-year investigation "involving an international Ecstasy and weapons-trafficking organization with Hollywood connections has netted its first prison sentence: a 20-year term for an executive of a Swiss-based financial, business and consulting service. Alexandre De Basseville, 36, of Switzerland and Los Angeles, an executive board member of ADB Swiss S.A., which owns the Los Angeles-based Limelight Films Inc., was sentenced…by U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee. … De Basseville and his co-defendant, Bruno Cavelier d'Esclavelles, 45, of Los Angeles, were arrested as part of the Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA) 'Operation Director's Cut' after a two-year undercover investigation into international money laundering." Rusty Payne "said authorities also arrested Fabian Pruvot, 37, Andre Prikazhikov, 31, and Brian Delansky, 33, all of Los Angeles."

Lawyers, Others In Rhode Island Face Charges In Drug-Deal Scheme. The AP (1/6) reported two lawyers, "including the brother of the mayor of corruption-plagued Providence, offered to set up a drug deal so clients could get a lighter sentence by alerting authorities, according to an indictment unsealed Friday. The Boston-based federal grand jury named John M. Cicilline, 49, brother of Mayor David Cicilline, and Joseph Bevilacqua Jr., 57, a disbarred lawyer who worked with John Cicilline. Also charged with conspiracy were paralegals and interpreters Lisa Torres, 39, and Juan Giraldo, 41. John Cicilline and Torres were also charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal investigators." According to the indictment, "Bevilacqua told Mendonca that if he was willing to pay several hundred thousand dollars, Bevilacqua could arrange for someone to tell federal authorities about drug shipments _ but that Mendonca and his wife would get credit for the information. Defendants who cooperate with federal prosecutors are eligible for reduced prison sentences."

DOJ_NMG_0112954

Audit Finds Problems With DEA Accounting Of Seized Funds. The Washington Times (1/8, Seper, 88K) reports, "About $616 million seized by the US Drug Enforcement Administration during investigations is 'at risk' because the agency has failed to 'consistently implement and document controls' over the cash, according to a government audit." The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General "said the accounting failures discovered by its auditors 'can lead to discrepancies in the amount of cash seized and counted, accusations of theft and misappropriation of seized cash.'"

Mexican Drug Cartels Strengthen Presence In Peru. In Lima, the Dallas Morning News (1/7, Corchado) reported that authorities say Mexican drug cartels, "once regarded mainly as couriers for South American cocaine producers, have spread their powerful tentacles deep into this Andean nation, sowing violence and nourishing the re-emergence of Shining Path guerrillas. … The Mexicans ship cocaine loads by boat to the Mexican coast, then up to the border with California or Texas, with its coveted Interstate 35 northbound corridor, Peruvian officials and experts said. South Texas remains the leading entry area for cocaine smuggled into the U.S., according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration."

IMMIGRATION:

US Halts Deportation Proceedings Against Brazilian Couple. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A6, Jordan) reports, "The U.S. government has terminated deportation proceedings against a Brazilian couple and their disabled son who were the subjects of a page-one profile in The Wall Street Journal last month, giving the family another shot at winning the right to live here permanently." The Journal continues, "The case of Zandro Souza and his family raised questions about whether the U.S. should grant permanent legal residency to immigrants who might one day prove to be a financial burden. Mr. Souza, who rose in six years from dishwasher to chef at upscale eateries, was pursuing legal residency in the U.S. for his family and had the sponsorship of an employer. … The family's four-year application process hit a snag during an interview with an immigration official who requested proof that Mr. Souza's son, Igor, who is blind and developmentally delayed, wouldn't become a 'public charge' if his parents died." The Journal adds, "After questioning the family about its future means of support, the agency issued a green-card denial that cited another reason for the family's rejection: namely, that it entered the U.S. on tourist visas with the intent of staying for good, a violation of federal law. In a letter dated Dec. 28, the day after the article appeared, the government withdrew its request for Mr. Souza and his family to appear for a deportation hearing. The memorandum addressed to Mr. Souza states that the government's notice to appear in court was 'improvidently issued' and should be dismissed without prejudice. Thursday, an immigration judge in Boston granted the government's motion to terminate the case. … Shawn Saucier, a spokesman for the federal immigration agency, said there is no guarantee the family would be granted green cards. He said the Souzas and their attorney would be summoned for another interview within a month."

Hoyer Suggests Bush Will Cooperate With Democrats' On Immigration Reform. Appearing on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume) House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer noted that when he and Speaker Pelosi met with President Bush "one of the things that we brought up -- we didn't discuss substance -- was the immigration bill. And he smiled and he said, 'You know, I think I'm going to have a lot easier time dealing with you on immigration than I had dealing with the House Republican leadership on immigration.' I think that's the case." Also on Fox News Sunday (1/7, Hume) Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said, "I've been challenging the new Democratic majority not just to do the easy things in the beginning of this session. … And I think there are two things that are very significant that would make a difference for the country. Let's fix the immigration problem, and let's save Social Security. We can do that before this Congress is out." McConnell added, "Divided government is the only way where you can kind of share the blame for doing big things that will sometimes become controversial."

The Washington Times (1/8, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Leaders of both parties say Democrats in Congress are likely to win bipartisan support for many of their signature issues, including passage of an immigration reform package that critics have derided as amnesty." Hoyer "agreed that the House Democrats could work with President Bush on an immigration bill compromise."

Labor's Opposition Could Stall Immigration Overhaul Deal. McClatchy (1/8, Montgomery) reports President Bush's "hopes of securing a comprehensive immigration overhaul have brightened considerably in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, but resistance from organized labor - one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies - could complicate those efforts." The AFL-

DOJ_NMG_0112955

CIO, "which represents 53 unions with more than 9 million members, is ratcheting up opposition to a temporary guest worker program, a key element of Bush's immigration plan. At the same time, two powerful unions in a breakaway labor coalition, Change to Win, have tended to support the provision." The labor divisions "take on heightened significance as Democrats assume control of the 110th Congress and begin shaping the legislative agenda." AFL-CIO officials say the guest worker program "is designed to give business a steady source of cheap labor and would take jobs from U.S. citizens."

Christian Conservatives Propose Compromise. The Washington Times (1/8, Hurt, 88K) reports a "number of leading Christian conservative groups have formed a coalition on immigration and illegal aliens that will push religiously grounded positions that both sides of the current immigration debate will both love and hate." In letters "sent today and obtained by The Washington Times, Families First on Immigration urges President Bush and leaders of the new Democratic Congress to adopt a grand compromise on the divisive issue that includes strong border security, an amnesty for illegals already here who are relatives of citizens and an end to birthright citizenship." Gary Bauer, "Deal Hudson of the Morley Institute for Church & Culture and David Keene of the American Conservative Union are among those who have joined forces to chart a new path on immigration reform, an issue that conservative Christians have generally avoided."

Growing Number Of Respondents In Immigration Courts Lack Attorneys. The Washington Post (1/8, A1, Brulliard, 690K) reports in a 1500 word story on the dearth of counsel available to respondents in Federal immigration courts, where there are "judges and prosecutors, evidence and witnesses. The consequences can be great: Banishment, separation from family, perhaps persecution at home. But unlike in criminal courts, the government does not provide free lawyers for the poor. And in what court officials deem a great concern, a growing number of people in immigration court have no legal counsel: Of more than 314,000 people whose cases ran their course in fiscal 2005, two-thirds went through on their own, or pro se."

TAX:

BB&T Plans Appeal Of Tax Refund Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, C6, Wells) reports, "BB&T Corp. said it intends to appeal a federal judge's rejection of a refund claim in a tax-shelter dispute with the Internal Revenue Service." The Journal continues, "A U.S. District Court judge for the Middle District of North Carolina ruled for the Justice Department in a case involving BB&T's claim of a $3.3 million tax refund related to a 1997 lease transaction. … The IRS had rejected the refund claim, and BB&T went to court to settle the dispute." The Journal adds, "BB&T spokesman Bob Denham said the Winston-Salem, N.C., bank is still reviewing the judge's opinion. 'We disagree, and we plan to appeal,' he said." The Journal notes, "The leasing transaction involved a controversial "lease in, lease out" arrangement. In 2004, Congress outlawed similar leasing arrangements under which companies bought assets and then leased them back to their prior owners. Such arrangements can produce big tax benefits because depreciation can be claimed on the assets. The IRS in 2005 said it would begin to pursue leasing transactions in court. … Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's tax division, hailed the court decision, saying it shows that 'to have a tax deduction for lease or interest expense, you must actually incur them.' She said the court found in the BB&T case that the lease-in, lease-out tax shelter didn't involve a genuine lease or genuine indebtedness."

CBO Study Finds The Very Wealthy Benefited The Most From Bush Tax Cuts. The New York Times (1/8, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "Families earning more than $1 million a year saw their federal tax rates drop more sharply than any group in the country as a result of President Bush's tax cuts," according to a CBO study. The CBO also reports that tax rates for "middle-income earners edged up in 2004…while rates for people at the very top continued to decline." According to the Times, the CBO study "reinforced the sense that while Mr. Bush's tax cuts reduced rates for people at every income level, they offered the biggest benefits by far to people at the very top — especially the top 1 percent of income earners. Though tax cuts for the rich were bigger than those for other groups, the wealthiest families paid a bigger share of total taxes." The Times adds that the study "offers ammunition to supporters and opponents of Mr. Bush's tax cuts."

Pelosi Suggests Repealing Tax Cuts To Pay For Education, Health Initiatives. The AP (1/8, Heilprin) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi says Democrats "are not ruling out raising taxes for the wealthiest people to help pay for tax cuts for middle-income families. … She spoke of pursuing an estimated $300 billion that people owe in back taxes, eliminating deficit spending and reducing wasteful federal spending. 'As we review what we get from ... collecting our taxes and reducing waste, fraud and abuse, investing in education and in initiatives which will bring money into the Treasury, it may be that (repealing) tax cuts for those making over a certain amount of money, $500,000 a year, might be more important to the American people than ignoring the educational and health needs of America's children,'" Pelosi said on CBS's Face the Nation. Pelosi, on CBS's Face the Nation (1/07, Schieffer) said, "What we're saying is Democrats propose tax cuts for middle-income families. And we want to have pay-go, no new deficit spending. We're not going to start with repealing tax cuts, but they certainly are not off the table for people making over half a million dollars a year."

DOJ_NMG_0112956

Rangel Rejects Speculation That He Plans To Repeal Bush Tax Cuts. The New York Times (1/8, Toner, 1.16M) profiles Rep. Charles Rangel, Chairman of the House Ways and means Committee. The Times notes Rangel "is trying hard to be restrained, about [President] Bush, his administration and his tax cuts. When asked about Mr. Bush's renewed insistence last week that Congress extend those tax provisions, Mr. Rangel paused and said, with almost visible effort, 'Part of what I think is my responsibility is not to be critical of the president.' He brushes off speculation about his party's plans for the Bush tax cuts, many of which have been criticized by Democrats for years as a giveaway to the richest Americans; it is simply premature, he argues, since their expiration date is three years off. Stan Collender, a longtime budget analyst, says it makes no political sense for Congress to 'deal with tax cuts before you have to, certainly not before the 2008 election.'

Novak Describes Conservative Unease Over Paulson, Payroll Taxes. In his column for the Washington Post (1/8, A15, 690K) Robert Novak writes congressional Republicans "ask this question: Will the current President Bush embrace a tax increase that would produce potential economic disaster and guaranteed political catastrophe?" According to Novak, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "has engaged in secret bipartisan talks discussing an increase in the $97,500 limit on personal income subject to the Social Security payroll tax. That would cause a jump in the top marginal tax rate." Paulson "certainly has given the impression in those discussions that he is amenable to raising the payroll tax, but a senior White House aide cautions that this decision has not yet been made." Novak concludes, "The economic woe that would result from higher payroll taxes would be matched by the political damage to the president. … That political calamity can be averted if Bush takes a payroll tax increase off the negotiating table."

Bipartisan Proposal To Eliminate The AMT Panned. The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (1/8, A15) calls the proposal by Sens. Max Baucus and Chuck Grassley to repeal the alternative minimum tax "a prescription so fiscally crazy that not even the Bush administration supports it. … The senators don't want to reform the AMT or link its repeal to wider tax changes; they just want to abolish it. This would destroy the chance to say to voters: Look, we're not going to extend all the tax cuts we gave you in 2001 and 2003, and while we're at it we're going to reduce the mortgage-interest deduction and other egregious loopholes so that we can collect more revenue without discouraging work by raising your tax rates. But wait, don't get too mad; at least we're going to kill the AMT for you."

Bush Said To Have Given Up On Future Tax Cuts. U.S. News and World Report's "White House Week" feature (1/15, Walsh, Bedard, Mulrine) reports Democrats "saw chicanery," but Republicans "smelled political reality in President Bush's announcement last week that he will seek a balanced budget in five years and an end to pork-barrel politics. Bush, after all, had taken a budget of surplus and turned it into one of deficit, but now he seemed to be adopting the new Democratic majority's fiscal pledges. Insiders at the White House spun it a different way: They said the president had hoped to push for deeper tax cuts in the next and future budgets, but the election of Democratic majorities in the House and Senate killed those plans. Now, they said, the president will submit a budget for fiscal 2008 that will leave little room for new Democratic add-ons without deeply cutting into defense spending or raising taxes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Many Republicans Expected To Back Minimum Wage Increase. ABC World News (1/7, story 4, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Another issue, perhaps the issue that Democrats and Republicans are most likely to find common ground, is increasing the minimum wage." ABC added, "The Democratic Congress wants to increase it to $7.25, over two years. … Today, just 500,000 workers make the current, Federal minimum wage. But more than 6.5 million earn less than the $7.25 that Congress is proposing and would therefore, get a raise." ABC notes, "Although Republicans in Congress have defeated every proposed increase in the last decade, President Bush has signaled he will sign this one into law." President Bush: "I support the proposed $2.10 increase in the minimum wage over a two-year period."

Democrats Will Begin "100 Hours" Program Tomorrow. ABC World News (1/7, story 3, :20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Back to Washington. On Tuesday, Democrats in Congress, plan to kick off a legislative blitz, which they're calling the first 100 hours. This is an ambitious agenda, which includes enacting the recommendations of the 911 Commission, promoting stem cell research, and negotiating lower prescription drug prices."

On Fifth Anniversary, NCLB Seen As Changing Schools. USA Today (1/8, Toppo, 2.27M) reports on the effect of the No Child Left Behind Act on schools after five years, calling it "a cornerstone of Bush's domestic agenda and one of his few truly bipartisan successes." It is also described as "a vast -- and contentious -- book of federal mandates" that "faces a tough future as Congress prepares to reauthorize it." While it is "too early to tell" whether it is "improving education nationwide," the act "has had a major influence on the daily experience of school for millions of kids, by "driving teachers crazy," "narrowing" the curriculum, focusing attention on poor and minority students, adding tutors and "changing how reading is taught."

DOJ_NMG_0112957

The Christian Science Monitor (1/8, Paulson, 59K) reports that NCLB has "changed the conversation about education in America, and has focused attention on poor-achieving groups of students who had been overlooked." While noting some proposed changes, it concludes that, "while the conversation is heated, the likelihood that NLCB will be reauthorized this year may be small."

Researcher Suggests Public Schools Could Shift $77 Billion Per Year To Improve Schools. The Washington Post (1/8, Mathews, 690K) reports on an Education Sector finding that "U.S. public schools could have as much as $77 billion more a year to improve teaching if they reduced spending on seniority pay increases, teacher's aides, class size limits and other measures often found in teacher union contracts." These expenses are described as having "a weak or inconsistent relationship with student learning." In response, "teachers union officials sharply disputed the report's findings."

Big-City Mayors Seek To Control Schools. The AP (1/8, Zuckerbrod) reports on the growing movement in large cities for mayoral control of schools noting the current effort by Washington, D.C. Mayor Adrian Fenty and successful mayoral takeovers of the schools in New York, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Harrisburg, Pennsylvania as well as attempts in Los Angeles, Albuquerque, New Mexico, and Seattle. The Mayors "say they are better equipped to take on the infighting, inertia and high turnover rates associated with school boards and the superintendents who report to them." Brown University's Ken Wong "analyzed test scores in about a dozen cities with mayors in charge of schools from 1999 to 2003. The results showed modest but statistically significant progress in reading and math for elementary and middle-school students."

Education Department Seeks Change In ABA's Diversity Standard For Law Schools. The Washington Post (1/8, Strauss, 690K) reports U.S. Department of Education general counsel Kent Talbert, "is challenging the American Bar Association's new standard on diversity in enrollment and hiring, which calls for the law schools it accredits to take 'concrete action' to attract more minority students, faculty and staff." ABA officials said that "the department is misinterpreting the standard and pushing an anti-affirmative action agenda." The National Advisory Committee on Institutional Quality and Integrity which is "voted to extend the ABA's role for 18 months rather than the usual five years and required the association to improve the way it carries out the task of accrediting law schools. But the committee dropped the staff recommendation to include any action on the diversity standards." Talbert said that the department "would appeal the decision to leave the standard alone."

Domenici Optimistic That Democrats Will Pass His Mental Health Bill. USA Today (1/8, Elias, 2.27M) reports, "Bills that could expand access to mental health care for Americans stand a better chance of passing with the new leadership that has taken over Congress, key lobbyists and congressional supporters of the legislation say. Their top priority is a bill requiring insurers to offer comparable benefits for treating mental disorders and physical illnesses, known as 'parity.'" Sen. Pete Domenici "introduced three earlier parity bills. 'Now our prospects are the best that they've ever been,' says Matt Letourneau, spokesman for the senator. Although parity has bipartisan support, past legislation stalled in committee because House leadership didn't favor it, says Laurel Stine of the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group."

Chao's Third Public Affairs Chief Resigns After Three Months. Al Kamen, in his column in today's Washington Post (1/8, A13, 690K), reports Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao "is looking for a new public-affairs chief. The incumbent, Randy Clerihue, announced in a Dec. 21 internal e-mail that he was leaving after barely three months in the job. This could set the world indoor record for brevity for a Senate-confirmed position. … His replacement would be Chao's fourth public-affairs chief, not counting an acting chief in the early part of the administration. In the past 18 months or so, public-affairs departures include two deputy assistant secretaries and four press secretaries."

Roberts' "Constitutional Crisis" Claim Criticized. The Washington Post (1/8, A13, Barnes, 690K) reports, "Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. usually knows just the right thing to say, his star turn during his 2005 Senate confirmation hearings being Exhibit A." But "maybe not so with the blandly titled '2006 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary,' issued, as he noted, on the typically slow news day of Jan. 1. He should rest assured that it has been noticed -- and roundly razzed by some in the legal punditry." Roberts "devoted his entire address to the call for a pay raise for federal judges." While "there are plenty of people who agree with Roberts that judicial salaries should rise to attract and retain the brightest in the legal field," Roberts' "description of the issue as a 'constitutional crisis' was too much for some."

DOJ_NMG_0112958

After Cost Overruns, Delays, Capitol Visitor Center Nears Completion. USA Today (1/8, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "Two years after its scheduled opening date, and more than double its original price tag, the Capitol Visitor Center inches its way toward completion." It will "take at least six additional months to test more than 5,000 security alarms, sprinklers and other safety devices before the public can enter." When the doors "finally will open to the public is a major point of contention surrounding the project, which was originally scheduled to be finished in 2005." Architect of the Capitol Alan Hantman "predicts a ribbon-cutting this fall, but auditors at the Government Accountability Office say the date will slip. 'We think it's going to be early 2008,' says Terrell Dorn of the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress." USA adds the "other sore point is cost. Government auditors estimate it will be close to $600 million. The original, 1999 price tag: $265 million." Still, even "some of those who have complained the loudest about the project's rising cost and lengthening delays admit to being wowed by the almost-finished result."

Federal Pay Raise Doesn't Keep Pace With Private Sector. The Washington Post's (1/8, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The annual base pay raise for most federal employees kicks in, increasing the median white-collar government salary in the region to $86,791." The Post adds that while that figure is "not shabby," this "year's increase -- 2.64 percent in the Washington-Baltimore region -- is one of the smallest annual raises in recent years, and the raise doesn't go far in an area where the cost of living runs about 30 percent higher than the rest of the nation." The Post adds, "Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, called the 2007 raise 'very disappointing,'" and she added, "'This time of year especially, as employees are considering career options and deciding whether they want to stay for the long term or the short term, they build that pay raise into their decision-making,' Kelley said. She fears 'more and more will decide that they are going to look elsewhere.'"

Gerson Describes Bush's "Voracious" Reading Habits. The Washington Times (1/8, McCaslin, 88K) reports, "'Anti-elitist' -- That was Michael Gerson, former chief speechwriter to President Bush from 2001 to 2006, discussing the president's 'voracious' reading habits and related perceptions during a guest appearance on C-SPAN's 'Q&A' with Brian Lamb last night. '[A] couple of months ago it was leaked out by somebody that he was reading Albert Camus' 'The Stranger.' Does that track for what you know of George Bush?' asked Mr. Lamb. 'Sure,' Mr. Gerson replied. 'The president is a voracious reader and recommended to me a variety of books when I was at the White House, and gave them to me. He recommended to me ... 'A Godly Hero,' the biography of William Jennings Bryan, a book he'd read. 'Recommended to me ... the book on Martin Luther King and Lyndon Johnson, the relationship between the two men. And he recommended to me the pope's [Benedict XVI] book on relativism.'"

WPost Urges Congress To Nix Agricultural Subsidies. The Washington Post (1/8, A14, 690K) says in an editorial that the "law that authorizes a range of unnecessary and ill-targeted agriculture programs is set to expire in September. So expect fronts for agribusiness, rural banks and farm insurers (and the members of Congress who accept their campaign contributions) to try and sell the same line again this year: Extend the programs or nail the coffin shut on America's heartland. It's about time to nail the coffin on that tired line instead." Federal agricultural payments "are in fact fueling a rapid consolidation of American farms into enormous agribusinesses." Decisions about "who should be farming what and where should be left to the marketplace; the government should not distort the market to push smaller competitors out, especially at the price of $15 billion in annual subsidies."

OTHER NEWS:

Positive Employment Data Worries US Equities Markets. USA Today (1/8, 6B, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "Federal Reserve interest rate cuts are looking less likely after U.S. businesses created a stronger-than-expected 167,000 jobs in December and workers' wages rose at a rapid pace. … The good news on jobs was an unwelcome development for some stock traders, who had been betting that the Fed would soon begin trimming interest rates in response to slower economic growth. The Dow Jones industrial average fell more than 82 points to 12,398 in Friday trading.

Weak Dollar Said To Benefit US By Closing Current Accounts Deficit. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A2, Whitehouse, 2.04M) reports, "Last year, the U.S. dollar did what economists had long predicted it would have to do: It fell in value against other currencies. And many believe that if Americans know what is good for them, they should be hoping for more of the same this year. … A weaker dollar would help narrow the [current account] deficit by making U.S. exports more attractive to foreign buyers while making it costlier for Americans to buy products from abroad." According to the Journal, "A tougher question is how far and how fast the dollar needs to fall. Some economists fear a sudden plunge will roil international markets and trigger a U.S. recession. Others believe a slower and more manageable adjustment is under way. They guess it could take a decline of 8% to 25% over as many as 10 years to get the U.S. current-account deficit down to a more sustainable level of 3% of gross domestic product."

DOJ_NMG_0112959

US Investors Said To Have Basis For Optimism About 2007. U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Lim, 2.03M), as part of its cover package on the economy and investing in the new year, reports, "as 2007 kicks off, economists and market watchers are about as optimistic as they've been in recent memory. Eight out of 10 money managers polled by the Russell Investment Group predict that stocks will post their fifth consecutive positive year. One in three thinks the equity markets will return around 10 percent or more in 2007." U.S. News and World Report (1/15. Pethokoukis, 2.03M) reports, "The worst might also be over in housing. Existing-home sales have risen in back-to-back months, and the damage seems to be relatively contained." The U.S. News and World Report (1/15, Pethokoukis, 2.03M) reports, "according to recent calculations by the Financial Times, the euro…is set to overtake the greenback as the world's most popular currency. But not so fast, Old Europe. What's gotten lost in all the euro hype is that the FT's financial figuring applies to notes in circulation: cold, hard cash. When it comes to currency-denominated assets, the dollar is still king. The United States runs the largest stock and bond markets in the world, and 66 percent of global foreign currency reserves are denominated in dollars-some $2.1 trillion-compared with only 25 percent in euros, according to the International Monetary Fund."

OPEC Production Cuts Likely To Buoy Oil Prices. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, Pin, 2.04M) reports, "The price of oil may have started 2007 by losing around 8% of its value, but the likelihood of a swift supply response from producers and a series of other factors are likely to underpin the price in the longer term. Though supply will remain steady until [OPEC] cuts output in a few weeks, analysts said expectations of sustained demand and a long list of geopolitical uncertainties will contribute to a firm oil price." The Journal adds, "Crude-oil contracts for February delivery ended a two-day plunge in the U.S. Friday, rising 72 cents, or 1.3%, to $56.31 a barrel -- still off 7.8% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange. The bearish tone has been set in recent days amid an unseasonably balmy winter in key heating regions such as the U.S. and Japan, and at a time when oil-product inventories in these major markets are relatively ample."

Researchers Extract Stem Cells From Amniotic Fluid. ABC World News (1/7, story 9, :35, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Researchers at Harvard and Wake Forest reported today their lab tests showed that amniotic fluid from pregnant women contains stem cells with tremendous medical potential. These cells can be gathered without hurting the mother or the fetus, and would prove much less controversial than research done with embryos."

The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Kaplan, 850K) notes "the finding points to a promising avenue of research that sidesteps the hurdles facing embryonic stem cell research, which has been stymied by moral objections to the destruction of embryos that occurs when the cells are harvested." The study also "suggests another advantage: Unlike embryonic cells, which can form tumors when implanted in lab animals, amniotic fluid stem cells do not appear to do so."

USA Today (1/8, Weise, 2.27M) reports, "Though much research into the safety and effectiveness of these potential embryonic stem cell substitutes still needs to be done, the huge advantage would be that they can be easily harvested from both amniotic fluid as well as placental tissue after a baby is born." The Washington Post (1/8, A1, Weiss, 690K) and Washington Times/AP (1/8, Elias), among other newspapers, also report on the stem cell discovery this morning.

NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 5, 3:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) also noted the "breakthrough." NBC's chief medical editor Dr. Nancy Snyderman said, "It will be interesting to see how the politics kick up. There is a lot of tissue. Fetuses are not going to be harmed at all. Because it is there and scientists will be able to offer it to everyone, this may not be much of a political debate at all."

Analysts Predict Population Shifts Will Continue To Benefit The GOP. The Washington Times (1/8, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Ongoing population shifts from the North to the Sun Belt states will benefit Republicans more than Democrats in future House races and could enlarge the Republican Party's electoral count in presidential elections, political analysts say. … Projections of the number of Americans moving from the Democrat-dominated Northeast to the more Republican-friendly Southern and Western states 'show that seven congressional seats in 13 states have already changed at this point in the decade,' according to an analysis by Election Data Services, a firm that studies how population shifts affect redistricting changes under congressional reapportionment. It forecasts a loss of House seats in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Missouri, Iowa and Louisiana, gains of one seat each in Florida, Georgia, Arizona, Nevada and Utah, and a gain of two seats in Texas. Another analysis shows an even larger 'probable' shift of House seats from the North to the Sun Belt, according to Polidata, a Virginia-based demographic and political research firm. Under these 'probable changes,' 13 seats could shift among 19 states, with eight gainers and 11 losers. 'All the gainers are in the South and West and all the losers are in the East and Midwest except Louisiana,' the Polidata study said. Leading the 'biggest gainers' would be Texas, with four additional seats."

DOJ_NMG_0112960

Biden Says He Will Form Presidential Exploratory Committee This Month. ABC World News (1/7, story 5, :20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The field of Democratic presidential candidates got even more crowded today when Delaware Senator Joe Biden threw his hat into the ring. He has long been clear he was planning to run." NBC Nightly News (1/7, story 6, :20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported Biden "told NBC's Tim Russert on 'Meet the Press' today that he will create an exploratory committee later this month." USA Today/AP (1/8, 10A) reports Sen. Joseph Biden" said Sunday that he is seeking the Democratic nomination for president and thinks he can hold his own against potential high-profile rivals such as fellow Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama." The AP (1/8) reports Biden, "who long has made clear his intentions to seek the White House in the wide-open race, has about $3.5 million in his campaign account. He has campaigned extensively in early voting states such as New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada." Bloomberg (1/8, Sobczyk) notes Biden was "first elected to the Senate in 1972" and became chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week. The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) notes that Biden "also sought the presidential nomination in 1988. But he dropped out of the race after admitting that he had used speeches by other politicians without attribution, and after reports that he had plagiarized while in law school."

Patrick Pledges To Support Kerry In 2008. The Boston Globe/AP (1/8, Johnson) reports that although Sen. Barack Obama "visited Massachusetts three times last year to campaign for" Gov. Deval Patrick" and former president Bill Clinton "appointed Patrick to the top Justice Department civil rights post during the 1990s," Patrick "says he would have to support" Sen. John Kerry if he runs for president again. Patrick is quoted as saying, "I will tell you that if my home senator runs, I've got to be with him. I love the other candidates, but we will see. I don't know that he has made a decision yet."

Edwards May Be Engaging In "Choreographed Candor." In his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (1/8, C1, 690K), Howard Kurtz writes, "John Edwards is ridiculing his political consultants. 'You know, they gave me a really great memo,' he says, waving the document, which advises him to highlight the importance of public education when addressing teachers. 'I pay a lot of money for people who have the expertise to tell me this.' An unscripted moment caught on a cellphone camera? Not exactly. The video of the presidential candidate chatting on his plane is on Edwards's Web site." Edwards "seems unusually frank about the absurdities of political life -- or is this just carefully choreographed candor, packaged for the YouTube age?" Referring to the 2008 campaign, Joe Trippi, "who masterminded Howard Dean's Internet-driven bid in 2003 and 2004," said, "You're going to see reality, and you're going to see savvy manipulation under the guise of something that's authentic and real."

McCain Portrayed As Out Of Step With Conservatives On Key Issues. In a very long -- more than 10,000-word -- profile of Sen. John McCain appearing in Vanity Fair (2/07) Todd Purdum portrays McCain as conflicted over many key social issues , including gay marriage and immigration. Purdum notes "one minute he's toeing the conservative line (on gay marriage, say, or immigration) and the next he's telling someone what he really thinks." Purdum recounts an appearance on MSNBC's Hardball where McCain commented "I think that gay marriage should be allowed. … I don't have any problem with that," but then retracted his statement minutes later after conferring with his advisers. Purdum also describes a McCain appearance in Milwaukee this fall when he was "asked how debate over the immigration bill was playing politically." McCain is quoted as saying, "In the short term, it probably galvanizes our base. In the long term, if you alienate the Hispanics, you'll pay a heavy price." Then he "added, unable to help himself, 'By the way, I think the fence is least effective. But I'll build the goddamned fence if they want it.'" The piece also compares McCain's current campaign strategy with his failed 2000 bid and goes into great detail concerning McCain's numerous health problems.

McCain Campaign Hobbled By His Support For More Troops In Iraq. he Los Angeles Times (1/8, Wallsten, 850K) reports McCain "is putting those military bona fides on the line — aggressively backing an unpopular plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq at a time that other presidential hopefuls are steering clear of the war or calling for troop reductions. … Besides Bush, no politician has more to lose than McCain, the presumed GOP front-runner in 2008 and the plan's biggest backer in Congress. Now that Bush is pursuing the McCain approach, the senator could soon find himself defending the policy to a war-weary public in Iowa, New Hampshire and other key election states where surveys show voters are fed up with rising U.S. casualties. McCain readily admits that the new strategy is likely to result in even more violence." The Times goes on to report that McCain aides "say they have devised no particular strategy for shielding their boss from the political fallout if a troop buildup does not work. In a sense, they said, the senator's stance might serve to remind voters of the kind of straight talk that boosted McCain's popularity in 2000, when he defeated Bush in the New Hampshire primary. 'It doesn't mean that lots of us who work for him and respect him so much don't worry about things like this,' said McCain's longtime chief of staff, Mark Salter. 'I'm sure we do. But there's no game plan for it. There's been no fretting and no meetings.'"

DOJ_NMG_0112961

Many States Plan Expansion Of Health Care Coverage. USA Today (1/8, 1A, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports, "States are planning large expansions in health care coverage this year in an aggressive and potentially expensive attempt to reduce the ranks of the 42.4 million Americans who are uninsured. The states are acting at a time when Congress…has put health care lower on its agenda. Governors and state legislators in both parties and most states have made expanded medical coverage a priority for legislatures. Popular proposals include guaranteeing medical coverage to all children; subsidizing medical insurance at small businesses; and providing tax incentives for businesses and individuals to make coverage more affordable. A few states are considering universal health coverage for all residents. Others are focusing on price competition and preventive care."

NYTimes, LATimes Praise Schwarzenegger's Universal Child Health Care Initiative. The New York Times (1/8, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Guaranteed health care for children is the new political apple pie. No one can say he is against it, and it's a sure applause line for politicians who want to show concern for reducing the number of uninsured in America. But special recognition is due California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, who is reportedly ready to begin his new term with an actual proposal that his state insure all children. And by all, he means undocumented immigrants, too. The proposal seems a challenge to fellow Republicans, and even to much of the state's Democratic leadership. Predictably, anti-immigrant groups said that including all children would cost billions more than the $400 million experts estimate. In truth, the idea is economical and, if anything, quite modest."

The Los Angeles Times (1/8, 850K) editorializes, "The governor's inaugural address Friday was one of the best in state history, infused with California pride and optimism, and was the most eloquent speech of his career. … Today he is to deliver an address on healthcare, unveiling a proposal to extend medical care and insurance coverage to many, perhaps most, of the state's 6.5 million uninsured. It's the kind of speech that can't rest on lofty calls to work together. It must delve into the details of a thorny and politically divisive issue."

Schwarzenegger To Propose Welfare "Rollback." The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Halper, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "will propose a major rollback of the state's welfare system this week, including a cutoff of aid to tens of thousands of children whose parents do not meet minimum work requirements or are in the country illegally, administration officials said Sunday." The "proposed $465-million reduction in California's welfare budget came two days after the governor promised that his second term would feature 'post-partisan' cooperation." The move "was met immediately with resistance from Democrats, who expressed bewilderment that the governor would attempt to cut welfare aid to children in the same week his administration is expected to move forward with a plan to expand health insurance to many of the same children."

Schwarzenegger Wants California To Play Prominent Role In 2008 Primaries. Newsweek (1/15, Breslau, 3.12M) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "plans on influencing the 2008 election. Schwarzenegger says he'd like to move the California primary from June…to a much earlier date, in February. … The governor hopes the change will encourage candidates to spend more time talking to voters in the nation's most populous state, instead of 'sucking us dry for money' at fund-raisers." Newsweek notes Schwarzenegger "is coy about expressing his support for any particular candidate. … His top campaign strategist recently went to work for" Sen. John McCain. And he "says he would 'encourage' New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg…to run too."

Schwarzenegger Said To Be Considering 2010 Senate Run. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (1/15, Bedard) reports, "There's growing buzz in Washington and California that…Schwarzenegger likes this government stuff so much that he's got his eye on the Senate. Specifically, the seat held by Sen. Barbara Boxer, who's up for re-election in 2010."

Georgia Legislator Seeks To Strip McKinney's Name From Highway. The Los Angeles Times (1/8, Jarvie, 850K) reports that in Atlanta, "where the average commute lasts 31.2 minutes and drivers have no shortage of bottlenecks and wrecks to grumble about, a Republican state lawmaker is exercised about a different kind of transportation issue: Cynthia McKinney Parkway." Georgia Rep. Len Walker "cannot abide driving along a suburban highway honoring Georgia's former Democratic congresswoman." A "week after McKinney filed her final congressional measure — a resolution to impeach President Bush — Walker pre-filed a bill in the Georgia Legislature to strip McKinney's name from the street and restore the name Memorial Drive." Walker's bill "has slim chance of passing," but "his effort has struck a chord among critics of McKinney, who lost her bid for a seventh term in the summer's Democratic primary after a high-profile altercation with a Capitol Hill police officer."

DOJ_NMG_0112962

Former President Bush Discharged After Hip Replacement. The AP (1/8) reports former President George H.W. Bush "has been released from the Mayo Clinic after undergoing successful hip replacement surgery, the clinic said." The "82-year-old former president was discharged from the clinic on Saturday, following the operation on his right hip that was performed Wednesday, the Mayo Clinic said on its Web site."

WPost Backs Effort To Allow Virginia Governors Two Terms. The Washington Post (1/8, A14, 690K) says in an editorial, "For 15 years or so, and in various forms," Del. Harry R. "Bob" Purkey, "a Virginia Beach Republican, has tried to coax the commonwealth into the modern age by doing away with the rule prohibiting sitting governors from running for reelection. He and his allies have come close." Now Purkey "and his fellow Republican legislators are in negotiations with Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), and both sides appear serious about a compromise." This year, "after so many failed attempts, let's hope Mr. Purkey's efforts are not in vain."

Israel Denies Planning Attack On Iran. The Washington Times/AP (1/8, Stringer) reports the Sunday Times of London published an article Sunday claiming "that Israeli pilots were training to strike targets in Iran with low-yield nuclear weapons, but Israel swiftly denied the report and analysts expressed doubts about its reliability." Citing "unidentified Israeli military sources," the newspaper "said the proposals drawn up in Israel involved using so-called 'bunker-buster' nuclear weapons to attack nuclear facilities at three sites south" of Tehran. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office "declined to comment on the report," but foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev denied the report, saying, "If diplomacy succeeds, the problem can be solved peaceably." AFP (1/8) also quotes Regez as saying Israel is "100 percent behind the international community's efforts to bring about an end to Iran's nuclear program. Israel totally supports Resolution 1737 and the international community must be ready to take even tougher measures against Iran."

Abbas To Seek Early Elections Despite Hamas Objections. The New York Times (1/8, A9, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "told Fatah political leaders in Bethlehem on Sunday that he intended to proceed with his demand for early presidential and parliamentary elections, and that he had lost hope in negotiating a unity government with Hamas." Abbas also said Saturday that he was making changes to his security personnel. While he "did not make clear who would hold the top post, the United States has been urging him to appoint Muhammad Dahlan, the former security chief in Gaza, to lead all security forces in the Palestinian Authority." However, the Times says Dahlan is "especially despised by Hamas, and he is not especially popular among many other Palestinians, who believe that he is corrupt and too close to the United States and Israel." Meanwhile, Fatah held "a large rally on Sunday in a Gaza City sports stadium, marking the group's 42nd anniversary with a show of strength and defiance after days of bloody clashes" with Hamas.

Fatah, Hamas Continue To Battle. The AP (1/8, Daraghmeh, Barzak) reports, "Geography is playing a big role in the violent Palestinian power struggle: When Hamas attacks in its stronghold in the Gaza strip, its rival Fatah retaliates in the West Bank, where it holds sway." Fatah "says its dominance of the West Bank holds Hamas in check and could keep the lid on what some fear will turn into a full-scale civil war in Gaza. But to maintain that dominance, Fatah militants in the West Bank have resorted to new tactics -- including kidnapping government officials and shooting Hamas sympathizers at random."

US Sends Military Advisers, Weapons To Boost Somalis. USA Today (1/8, 10A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports the US has "quietly poured weapons and military advisers into Ethiopia, whose recent invasion of Somalia opened a new front in the Bush administration's war on terrorism." The US and Ethiopian militaries have "a close working relationship," Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter said, including intelligence sharing, arms aid and training that gives the Ethiopians "the capacity to defend their borders and intercept terrorists and weapons of mass destruction."

UN Urged To Extend Presence In Somalia. The Financial Times (1/8, Turner, England, Dinmore) reports, "Western and African powers in Nairobi last week described the defeat of Somalia's Islamic Courts by Ethiopian-backed forces as a 'historic opportunity' to rebuild the shattered horn of Africa country, and put an end to the 'warlordism' that has torn apart efforts at political reconciliation since the 1990s. But a history of botched intervention in the world's most failed of failed states leaves few doubts that fixing Somalia poses a severe challenge to the world's peacekeeping systems, and may yet embroil Ban Ki-moon, the new UN secretary-general, in one of the first major challenges of his tenure." The UN's peacekeeping department is "already overstretched with almost 100,000 troops in 18 operations, and there is little appetite for a UN mission in Somalia after the ill-fated operation of the early 1990s." Therefore, officials and diplomats "have been keen to encourage alternatives to traditional peacekeeping, such as providing international support to regional groups such as the African Union (AU), and are trying to develop an African standby force for such situations."

DOJ_NMG_0112963

Somalis Struggle To Establish Control, Provide Security. The New York Times (1/8, A5, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports town elders in Somalia "are struggling with the same questions: how to provide security; what to do with the remaining Islamists; how to determine the proper role for religion, an important theme in Somali society; and how to unify rival clans, rebuild infrastructure and live with the Ethiopians." Meanwhile, the new Somali government "made disarmament its first step but despite meetings, pleas, deadlines and threats, officials have collected few weapons. In Mogadishu, hundreds of people rioted Saturday at the prospect of house-to-house searches," which "led Jendayi E. Frazer, the United States assistant secretary of state for Africa, to cancel a planned trip to Mogadishu on Sunday."

The AP (1/8, Kennedy) reports Frazer has "stressed that the US will provide only a support role," saying, "Some people would like the United States to lead on this issue. I would prefer that we lead from behind, and what I mean by that is pushing the Somali people first, pushing the sub-region next and then mobilizing the resources of the international community."

Expert Urges US To Play Active Role In Somalia. Jonathan Stevenson, a professor of strategic studies at the United States Naval War College, writes in the New York Times (1/8, 1.16M) that "unless America plays a constructive role in Somalia's next stage, the conflict could become a regional war and a new field of jihad." Stevenson says the "temptation in Washington will be to keep its distance and rely on Ethiopia, the European Union and Kenya for as long as possible," however, "neither the American public nor the world believe that the Bush administration's predominantly military approach to counterterrorism is working. Relying primarily on Ethiopian troops to tamp down Somali Islamism would represent a continuation of that flawed model, and of the corresponding risk of fueling the jihad." Instead, he suggests that the US' "full participation in a diplomatic process in the Horn of Africa, on the other hand, would constitute a relatively low-cost way of signaling a new American approach to Islam and a re-engagement in sub-Saharan Africa., which has largely been left out of Washington's post-9/11 calculus."

Richardson Optimistic For Breakthrough On Darfur. The AP (1/8, Pickler) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "got a bleak assessment Sunday of the deteriorating situation in Darfur, but expressed optimism for a breakthrough" with the Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. Richardson "heard disturbing reports of rape, death and corruption from the top US diplomat in Sudan and humanitarian workers, but said he was not deterred from the challenge of trying to help bring peace where years of international efforts have failed." The governor told reporters, "I think we make some measurable progress if we can help the cease fire and the humanitarian situation and possibly start a united political process that helps the UN peacekeeping effort alive." Richardson is scheduled to meet with al-Bashir on Monday in Khartoum, then fly to Darfur on Tuesday to meet with rebel leaders and the commander of overwhelmed African Union forces assigned to patrol the area.

US, EU Revive Hopes For Trade Deal. On its front page, the Financial Times (1/8, A1, Callan) reports negotiations between the US and the European Union "have revived hopes that a deal can be struck on the stalled Doha round of world trade talks by the end of the month," according to EU and American officials. Top negotiators have told the Financial Times "they hope to achieve a breakthrough in the coming weeks, paving the way for an agreement with Brazil and India at the World Economic Forum in Davos this month." The Times calls the proposed deal "a last-ditch attempt" to revive the talks before President Bush loses his authority to negotiate trade pacts later this year. EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson told the Times that the US and EU are "closer to an agreement than is commonly thought," saying the two sides are "not that far apart to give up on the process."

Mandelson To Push Bush On Trade. In a separate report, the Financial Times (1/8, Callan, Daniel, Parker, Bounds) reports Mandelson Monday will "attempt the improbable feat of persuading George W. Bush to take a political gamble on multilateralism and expend precious political capital on reaching a world trade deal during his final two years in office." Mandelson "believes he has a unique personal relationship with Mr. Bush that will help him convince the president the trade talks have reached an 'endgame' and that he must step in."

German Lawmaker Urges Creation Of Single Trans-Atlantic Market. Matthias Wissmann, a member of the German Bundestag from the Christian Democratic party, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/8, 2.04M), "German Chancellor Angela Merkel has made the creation of a single trans-Atlantic market a priority of our country's European Union presidency." The "present situation," he adds, "bodes well for this initiative. The Democratic Party emerged strengthened from the recent elections in the US. Although at first sight this seems like a victory for protectionist tendencies, it was the Democrats who, some years ago, developed the idea of closer economic relations between the US and the EU." Through its "commitment as a founding member of the European Community 50 years ago," Wissmann concludes, "Germany has already played a crucial part in the creation of a successful economic area. There is nothing to prevent us from applying the successful model of the single European market in the trans-Atlantic context."

DOJ_NMG_0112964

EC's Barroso To Challenge Bush On Climate Change. The Financial Times (1/8, Parker, Bounds) reports President Bush "on Monday be challenged to join the fight against climate change as Europe embarks on a 'new industrial revolution' aimed at cutting the continent's greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent. José Manuel Barroso, the European Commission president, will use his visit to the White House on Monday to give Mr Bush a preview of a new EU energy policy designed to put the bloc at the forefront of energy efficiency and use of renewables." Barroso "will argue that Europe and America have a joint economic interest in cutting energy use and to reduce their dependence on imported oil and gas." The EC will "propose a big increase in the bloc's use of renewable energy, a rise from under seven per cent of today's energy mix to about 20 per cent by 2020."

China Profits From Carbon Credit Market. The Wall Street Journal (1/8, A10, Ball, McKinnon, Oster, 2.04M) reports, "China is turning its environmental problems into a shrewdly managed financial asset, capitalizing on corporate and governmental efforts to curb global warming. How much China's actions will do for the atmosphere remains an open question." One way companies can comply with carbon dioxide emissions caps "is by bankrolling emission-cutting projects in the developing world, where such projects often are cheaper than back home. In return, the Western companies receive 'carbon credits' that essentially allow them to continue to emit greenhouse gases themselves." China, "has become the biggest source of developing-world carbon credits bought by Western investors, benefiting both Chinese corporations and Chinese government tax receipts."

China Tightens Censorship Over Press. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/8, A1, Cody, 690K) reports Chinese President Hu Jintao's "ascension to power more than three years ago generated hopes that information controls would loosen as part of the economic opening he has championed. But they have tightened instead." The Post notes that "several prominent editors have been fired over the past two years -- the most recent one last month -- for straining at censors' guidelines." As an example, the Post details the case of Qin Zhongfei, who "spent a month in jail on criminal charges because of a poem he wrote satirizing local officials accused of corruption."

New Year's Bombings Reflect Difficulties Facing New Thai Government. The New York Times (1/8, Mydans, 1.16M) reports that a "string of lethal bombs that disrupted New Year's celebrations here has signaled the start of a difficult year for Thailand as entrenched elites struggle for control of the country's future." It is still unclear who set the bombs, "but the message they sent to Thais was that a showdown is likely in the coming months between the ruling military junta and the opponents it unseated in a coup more than three months ago." The Times notes that a "struggle for power that began with street demonstrations more than a year ago appears to be resurfacing after pausing for breath after the nonviolent coup on Sept. 19 ended the five-year tenure of Thaksin Shinawatra as prime minister."

Zoellick Urges Bush, Congress To Create AAFTA. Former deputy secretary of state Robert Zoellick writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/8, A17, 2.04M), "This year President Bush and the Democratic-led Congress should launch a new Association of American Free Trade Agreements (AAFTA)," which "could shape the future of the Western Hemisphere, while offering a new foreign and economic policy design that combines trade, open societies, development and democracy." Zoellick says that although the President and Congress are "understandably absorbed by the dangers of war," the US "cannot afford to ignore the rest of the world." The US trade agenda, he writes, has "turned out to be our strongest lifeline to developing democracies in the Americas," but "is not enough." With the passage of the FTAs with Colombia, Peru and Panama, Zoellick says the President and the Congress "could use the free trade framework to spur an ongoing dynamic for development and democracy."

O'Grady Says Coca-Growing Movement Bolstering Morales' Popularity. Wall Street Journal (1/8, A16, 2.04M) columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes, "Evo Morales is an anti-American extremist who wants to turn Bolivia into another Venezuela," which "naturally alarms Washington, but not enough to halt its war on drugs, which is aiding the president -- and leader of Bolivia's coca-growing peasant movement -- in his bid to become a dictator." Morales, "who badly needs to maintain the appearance of public support so that the international community tolerates his takeover," is "trying to spin the constitutional crisis as a confrontation between races and economic classes. But he has to worry about places like the poor and largely indigenous city of El Alto, just above La Paz, where there is evidence to suggest that many who voted for him are unhappy with his unlawful intervention in the constitutional process and growing impatient with his failure to deliver on economic promises." This, O'Grady writes, "is where US drug policy comes in. Railing against the Yankees who want to destroy peasant income has proven extremely effective in keeping the Morales base -- the country's indigenous coca growers who brought him to power -- energized and his numbers afloat. … If Washington policy makers ever decide to tackle the demand for cocaine and stop blaming supply, Mr. Morales's political career would be in jeopardy.

DOJ_NMG_0112965

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Gov To Seek Cuts In Aid To Families On Welfare."
"Money Clashes With Mission."
"Health Insurers Deny Policies In Some Jobs."
"China's Medicine Wars."
"Troop Surge In Iraq Would Have McCain In Tow."
"Stem Cells In Amniotic Fluid Show Promise."

USA Today:
"Verizon Wireless Goes Prime Time With TV Simulcasts Via Cell phone."
"States To Expand Health Coverage."
"States To Watch."
"How Bush Education Law Has Changed Our Schools."

New York Times:
"Plan Sets Series Of Goals For Iraq Leaders."
"Private Firms Lure C.E.O.'s With Top Pay."
"Taking Control Of Electric Bill, Hour By Hour."
"After Many Years, It's Rangel's Turn At The Helm."
"New Warsaw Archbishop Quits Over Communist Collaboration."
"In Obesity Fight, Many Fear A Note From School."

Washington Post:
"War's Toll On Iraqis Put At 22,950 In 2006."
"Amniotic Stem Cells Hold Promise."
"Battling Deportation Often A Solitary Journey."
"Green Line Metro Train Derails, Injuring 20."
"Censorship Persists In China."

Washington Times:
"Immigration Debate Gets Religious."
"Warsaw Bishop Steps Down Over Communist Links."
"20 Hurt In Green Line Derailment."
"Pelosi Threatens To reject Funds For Troop Surge."
"French Frown On Scheme To Export Louvre."
"Library Book Returned After 47 Years, late Fees Included."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution
"Louisville Coach To lead Falcons."
"Focus Is On Top 2 Power Brokers."
"A Suicidal Patient But No Safe Haven."
"Pelosi: No Blank Check For Iraq War."

Houston Chronicle:
"Texas Revenue Forecast To Be Released Today"
"HPD Officers Fatally Shoot Hammer-Wielding Man"
"Passport Rules Change May Mean Dip In Tourism"
"Pelosi: Extra War Funds Request May Be Denied"
"Clara Harris' In-Laws Seeking Damages In Lawsuit"
"Sixth Ward Preservationists Post YouTube Pleas"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New Iraq Strategy; New Iraq Strategy-Analysis; First 100 Hours; Increasing The Minimum Wage; Sen. Biden's Presidential Bid; Miami Port Incident; Massive Avalanche-Colorado; Auto Show; Stem Cell Research Breakthrough; Speaking Arabic; Cross Country Train Travel.
CBS: Preempted By Basketball.
NBC: New Iraq Strategy; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Massive Avalanche-Colorado; Strange Warm Winter Weather; Stem Cell Research Breakthrough; Sen. Biden's Presidential Bid; Auto Show; Consumer Electronics Show; Miami Port Incident; Football Player's Death; Missing American Sailor; Arch Bishop Resigns; Royal Treatment.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Pelosi-President Bush And Iraq; Iraq-Bus Attacked By Gunmen; Southern U.S.-Extreme Weather; Stem Cell Research-Amniotic Fluid; Chrysler-New Versions Of Minivan; Detroit-North American Auto Show; Las Vegas-Consumer Electronics Show.
CBS: Iraq-Bus Attacked By Gunmen; Pelosi-President Bush And Iraq; Miami-Port Security Scare; Stem Cell Research-Amniotic Fluid; Southern U.S.-Extreme Weather; TN-Two Teenagers Suspected Of Killing State Trooper; College Football National Championship; NFL Playoffs.
NPR: Iraq-Bus Attacked By Gunmen; Pelosi-President Bush And Iraq; Biden-Troop Strength In Iraq; Canadian McKay Visits Afghanistan; Bangladesh-Violent Protests; President Bush Declares State Of Emergency In Nebraska; California Man Fails Round-The-World Boat Trip; Detroit-North American Auto Show.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with European Commission President Jose Barroso, White House.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks at the National Awards for Museum and Library Services, East Room.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 11:30 a.m. Meets for morning business. At noon, considers S.Res.19, to celebrate the life of the late President Gerald Ford, followed by consideration of S.1, the Ethics Reform bill.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets in pro forma session.

DOJ_NMG_0112966

Other: HEALTH SPENDING _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. Health Affairs will host members of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services National Health Statistics Group for a media briefing on their article analyzing U.S. health spending in 2005, to be published in the January/February 2007 Health Affairs. Briefers: Aaron Catlin, Cathy Cowan, Stephen Heffler, and Benjamin Washington from the National Health Statistics Group, CMS; Samuel Zuvekas, senior economist, AHRQ. Location: National Press Club, Murrow Room.

INSURERS' PROFITS _ 10 a.m. The Consumer Federation of America (CFA) holds a news conference to release new data they say demonstrates that auto and home insurers dramatically increased profits and surplus in recent years, in part by systematically overcharging for insurance and by shifting costs to consumers and taxpayers.CFA will provide detailed information on the strategies its says insurers have used to inappropriately shift costs and on how state and federal policymakers can prevent these practices. Location: National Press Club, Lisagor Room.

SPELLINGS-NCLB _ 10 a.m. US Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings will commemorate the fifth anniversary of the signing of the No Child Left Behind Act by President Bush with a speech to national education leaders. Location: US Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, 1615 H St. NW.

STATE HIGHWAY SAFETY _ 10 a.m. Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety holds a news conference to unveil its ``2007 Roadmap to State Highway Safety Laws. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

MASSACHUSETTS-EDUCATION _ 10 a.m. - 1:30 p.m. The Center for American Progress sponsor a conference, ``Supporting Student Learning: Massachusetts Style," focusing on expanding learning time. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., will deliver the keynote address. Highlights: Session I: State Leadership in Expanding Learning Time. Participants: Hilary Pennington, Senior Fellow, Center for American Progress and Co-founder and Vice Chair, Jobs for the future; Chris Gabrieli, Co-founder and Chairman, Massachusetts 2020; and David Driscoll, Commissioner, Massachusetts Department of Education. Session II: Local Voices on Implementation. Participants: Paul Toner, Vice President, Massachusetts Teachers Association, former President, Cambridge Teachers Association; Robin Harris, Principal, Fletcher-Maynard Academy; AND Dr. James Caradonio, Superintendent, Worcester Public Schools. Location: Center for American Progress, 1333 H St. NW.

TEAMSTERS-PRIORITIES _ 10:30 a.m. The Teamsters Union will outline its legislative, political and regulatory priorities and goals for 2007, including the Employee Free Choice Act, minimum wage, fair trade, rail security and cross-border trucking, in a news briefing. Location: International Brotherhood of Teamsters, 25 Louisiana Ave. NW.

EDUCATION POLICY _ 11 a.m. The Heritage Foundation hosts a discussion with Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas., and Rep. Jimm DeMint R-S.C. Topic: ``A Better Answer for Education: Reviving State and Local Policymaking Authority." Location: Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

US-JAPAN TRADE _ 12 p.m. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez and Japan's Minister of Economy, Trade and Industry hold a briefing press availability following a meeting on US-Japan trade issues and renewing the joint initiative for ``Enhance Cooperation on IPR" and other global initiatives announced in March, 2006. Location: Diplomatic reception area, 5th floor, Commerce Department, 14th Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

DEMOCRATS-ETHICS REFORM _ 12:30 p.m. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid joins Senators Russ Feingold, Barack Obama, and Amy Klobuchar to discuss Senate Democrats commitment to ethics reform. Location: Senate Radio/TV Gallery.

IRAQ FUTURE _ 1 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies will bring together members of the U.S. House of Representatives Armed Services Committee to discuss their agenda for Iraq in the 110th Congress. Participants: Reps. Ike Skelton, D-Mo.; Jim Saxton, R-N.J.; Jim Marshall, D-Ga.; and ``Mac Thornberry, R-Texas. Location: CSIS, 1800 K St. NW, Conference Level B1.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION _ 1 p.m. - 3 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts an address by professor Gordon H. Hanson on the economic and social factors that influence the flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico to the U.S. and considers evidence on the effectiveness of policies that regulate the cross-border flow of illegal immigrants and their access to U.S. jobs. Migration scholar L. Alan Winters responds as AEI's Steven J. Davis moderates. Location: AEI's Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

MATH-SCIENCE STANDARDS _ 2:30 p.m. The New America Foundation, Fordham Foundation, others, hold a news conference with Sen. Chris Dodd, NAM President John Engler, Alliance for Excellent Education President Robert Wise, others, to announce legislation creating voluntary core standards in math and science. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

JAPAN FINANCIAL _ 3 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) Japan Chair hosts Japans Minister of Finance Koji Omi, who will discuss his views on the Japanese economy, as well as various policy issues in the context of the upcoming Japanese Upper House election. Location: CSIS 1800 K St. NW, Conference Level B-1.

DOJ_NMG_0112967

US-EU TRADE _ 3:30 p.m. US Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab holds a media availability with EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson. Location: Winder Building, 604 17th St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0112968

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 08, 2007 8:43 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Monday, January 08, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070108.pdf; dojclips070108.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Conservatives Decry Terror Laws' Impact On Refugees (WP) .3
Men In Jordan Charged With Attack Plots (AP) 5
First Wiretapping, Now Letter-opening? (LAT).....5
Government: Out Of Our Mail (SFC).....6

Homeland Response:

False Alarm Tests Miami Port's Security (MH) 6
3 Men Held After Misunderstanding About Truck At Miami Port That Seemed Suspicious (FLSUNSEN).....8
Miscommunication Cited In Port Alert (NSDY/AP).....9
Bill Would Order All Air Cargo Screened (USAT) 9
Congress And Your Security (NYT).....10
Politics: A White House Shuffle (NSWK).....11
Congress: Is A Katrina Probe On? (NSWK).....11
The Dems Now Have Some Dogs In The Fight (USNEWS)..12
Changing The Guard (USNEWS).....13
The Perils Of Pouting (USNEWS).....14
Ninth Ward Fairly Sound, Study Says (AP).....15

War News:

Plan Sets Series Of Goals For Iraq Leaders (NYT).....16
Bush Considers Expansion Of Up To 20,000 Troops (USAT)18
Plan For Troop 'Surge' In Iraq Gathers Force (CSM).....19
Iraq Battle Plan Includes Aid, Talks, Troops (LAT) 20
U.S. General Aims For Baghdad Pullback (USAT).....22
War Could Last Years, Commander Says (NYT).....22
Baghdad Needs Iraqi Troops, General Says (WP).....24
Military `surge' Not Enough To Save Iraq, U.S. Commander Says (MCT).....25
US Twists Civilian Arms To Fill Fortress Baghdad (FT).....27
A Heavier Iraq 'Footprint' (WSJ) 28
'Our Only Hope' (WSJ).....29
The Smart Surge: Diplomacy (WP).....31
War Against Time (WP).....32
Quagmire Of The Vanities (NYT) 33
The Lynching Of Iraq (BOS).....34
Editorial | Change In Washington (PHI).....35
Resort To 'Soft-partition' Repair? (WT).....36
Pelosi Hints At Resisting Troop Surge (AP).....38
Pelosi Threatens To Reject Funds For Troop Surge (WT) ...39
Bush Must 'Justify' Surge, Pelosi Says (LAT).....40
Scholars Wade Into Troop Surge (WT) 42
Activists Demand An End To War Funds (BOS).....42
Democrats Revise Agenda To Deal With War In Iraq (WP) 44
Capitol Hill Prepares For Tough Hearings On Iraq (CSM).....45
McCain Vs. Hagel: Two Views On The War (NSWK) 46
How The U.S. Is Losing The PR War In Iraq (NSWK).....49
White House Week (USNEWS).....50
Fineman: Sidestepping The 'Surge' (NSWK) 51
After The 100-Hour Show Comes The Slog (USNEWS).....52
One Last Chance (USNEWS).....53
A Problem Province (USNEWS) 54
George F. Will: MacArthur's Two Words (NSWK).....57
Measure For Measure (USNEWS) 58
Graham Says Boost In Troops A Last-ditch Effort (TSSC).....59
Democrats Vow To Resist Buildup (WP).....60
Alter: Hagel Could Have A Shot (NSWK).....61
Adm. William J. Fallon: An Experienced Naval Officer, And A Diplomat (NYT).....62
U.S. Launches Air Assault On Sunni Haven (LAT).....63
5 More U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq (AP).....64
War's Toll On Iraqis Put At 22,950 In '06 (WP).....66
A Tougher Journey To Stock US Troops In Iraq (CSM).....68
5 More U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq (AP).....69
My History With The Rope (WSJ) 71
Britain's Brown Suggests Policy Shift (AP).....72
Iraq's Escape Is Soccer, But Soccer Can't Escape War (NYT).....73
Taliban Resume Their Attacks In Afghanistan (NYT).....74
Military Injustice (LAT).....75

Corporate Scandals:

Apple's Jobs May Still Face U.S. Scrutiny Over Stock Options (BLOOM) 75
Investigator In Apple Probe Had Conflicts (USAT) 77
Apple Quietly Canned Lawyer Who Backdated (LAW) 78
FCC Rules Expected On Phone Records (USAT) 80
Pay Is Company's Prerogative (USAT) 81
Working Harder For The Man (NYT) 82

Criminal Law:

States Turn To Texas For Execution Guidance (USAT) 83
The New Math On Crime (USNEWS) 84
Polygamist's Papers Topic Of Hearing (AP) 86
Evidence Hearing For Jeffs Today In Las Vegas (DESERET) 87
Fitzgerald's Wild Source Chase (WSJ) 88
Free-Market Justice (NYT) 89

Civil Law:

Writer's Block: Valerie Plame Vs. CIA (NSWK) 90

Civil Rights:

Taser Sells Small Version For Wider Use (USAT) 91
Testing The Testers (NYT) 91

Antitrust:

DOJ Defends Recent Record Of Antitrust Division (LEGALT) 92
US Reviews European Telecoms Venture (FT) 94

Environment

Congress Targets Oil-Drilling Subsidies (WSJ) 95

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

S.F. Area Is No. 1 For Regular Drug Use, Study Says (USAT) 97
3 Extradited From Colombia (CHIT) 97
Drugs, Money Laundering Put Executive In Prison (WT) 98
Mayor's Brother, 3 Others, Indicted In Alleged Scheme (AP) . 99
Audit Faults DEA, Says $616 Million In Seizures 'At Risk' (WT) 100
Mexican Drug Cartels Move Into Peru (DMN) 101

Immigration:

U.S. Halts Souza Family Deportation (WSJ) 103
GOP Willing To Back Democrats' Key Bills (WT) 104
Democrats' Ties To Labor Could Complicate Immigration Reform (MCT) 105
Immigration Debate Gets Religious (WT) 106
Battling Deportation Often A Solitary Journey (WP) 107

Tax:

BB&T Plans To Appeal Ruling On Tax Refund (WSJ) 110
Bush Tax Cuts Offer Most For Very Rich, Study Finds (NYT) 110
Dems Look At Tax Cuts For Middle Class (AP) 111
After Many Years, It's Rangel's Turn At The Helm (NYT) 112
A Bush Tax Increase? (WP) 114
A Bad, Bipartisan Tax Plan (WP) 115

Congress-Administration:

How Bush Education Law Has Changed Our Schools (USAT) 116
Next Round Begins For No Child Left Behind (CSM) 120
Cutting Provisions In Union Contracts Could Free Funds (WP) 121
Mayors Seek To Take Charge Of Schools (AP) 122
U.S. Education Officials Question Diversity Standard (WP) .. 123
Supporters Renew Push For Mental Health Care (USAT) 124
Time Does Not Bend For Democrats, But The Congressional Record Does (WP) 125
Outside Court, Roberts Hears Dissent (WP) 126
Capitol Center Nears Completion (USAT) 127
Pay Raise Trails Private Sector (WP) 129
Inside The Beltway (WT) 130
Agriwelfare (WP) 131

Other News:

Creation Of Jobs Beats Forecast (USAT) 132
Why U.S. Should Root For Dollar To Weaken More (WSJ) .. 133
Aging Bull (USNEWS) 134
Outlook 2007 (USNEWS) 136
The Greenback May Rebound (USNEWS) 137
OPEC Cuts Likely To Buoy Oil Long Term (WSJ) 137
Stem Cells In Amniotic Fluid Show Great Promise, Study Says (LAT) 138
Stem Cells Extracted From Amniotic Fluid (USAT) 140
Scientists See Potential In Amniotic Stem Cells (WP) 141
Population Shift Likely To Boost GOP (WT) 142
Biden Dispels Doubt: He'll Join 2008 Race (USAT) 143
Biden Says He Can Run With '08 Rivals (AP) 143
Biden Declares Bid For 2008 Democratic Presidential Nomination (BLOOM) 144
Biden Joins List Of Presidential Contenders (NYT) 144
Patrick Says He Would Support Kerry If He Seeks Presidency Again (BOS/AP) 145
A Candidate's Not-So-Candid Camera? (WP) 145
Prisoner Of Conscience (VF) 147
Despite Hefty Risk, McCain Is Unwavering In Support For Troop Surge (LAT) 159
States To Expand Health Coverage (USAT) 160
Mr. Schwarzenegger's Modest Idea (NYT) 161

DOJ_NMG_0112971

Golden Visions (LAT) 162
Gov. To Seek Cuts In Aid To Families On Welfare (LAT) 162
How Gov. Arnold Plans To Shake Up Primaries (NSWK) 164
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 164
Lawmaker Wants McKinney's Name Off Road (LAT) 166
Former President Released After Surgery (AP) 167
Hamstrung In Virginia (WP) 167
Newspaper Cites Plans For Iran Nuke Attack (WT/AP) 168
Israel Plans 'Nuclear' Strike On Iran (AFP) 169
Abbas Tells Party He'll Proceed With Elections (NYT) 170
Fatah And Hamas Continue Bloody Struggle (AP) 170
U.S. Support Key To Ethiopia's Invasion (USAT) 172
UN Under Pressure To Extend Presence In Somalia (FT) ..173
Islamists Out, Somalia Tries To Rise From Chaos (NYT) ...174
Ethiopian Forces Attacked In Somalia (AP) 176
A Fleeting Victory In Somalia (NYT) 177
Richardson Gets Bleak Darfur Assessment (AP) 178
US And EU Talks Revive Hopes Of Trade Deal (FT) 179
Mandelson To Push Bush On Trade (FT) 180
Nurturing Our Most Important Relationship (WSJ) 181
Washington Faces Challenge Over Climate (FT) 182
China Cashes In On Global Warming (WSJ) 183
As Grip Of Censors Endures In China, A Satirical Poem Leads To Jail Time (WP) 184
Behind Bombs, Signs Of A Turbulent Year For Thailand (NYT) 187
Happily Ever AAFTA (WSJ) 188
Coca Democracy (WSJ) 190

TERRORISM NEWS:

Conservatives Decry Terror Laws' Impact On Refugees (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Conservatives who supported President Bush's reelection have joined liberal groups in expressing outrage over his administration's broad use of anti-terrorism laws to reject asylum for thousands of people seeking refuge from religious, ethnic and political persecution.

The critics say the administration's interpretation of provisions mandating denial of asylum to individuals who give "material support" to terrorist groups is so broad that foreigners who fought alongside U.S. forces in wars such as Vietnam can be denied asylum on the grounds that they provided aid to terrorists.

Advocates for refugees add that people who were forced to aid terrorist fighters at gunpoint could be labeled as supporters and turned away; such cases include a nurse who was abducted and told to treat a guerrilla fighter in Colombia and a woman in Liberia who said her father was killed and she was raped and forced to stand by as rebels occupied her home for several days.

"This is so indefensible," said Michael Horowitz, a fellow at the conservative Hudson Institute and a former lawyer in the Reagan administration. "It is causing heroes who fought for the United States to be afraid of being deported."

"It's outrageous," said Barrett Duke, vice president of public policy for the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission. "I think it's essentially a reaction of fear to the current terrorist danger." The language in the laws, he added, is "a knee-jerk reaction."

Gary L. Bauer, president of American Values, a conservative public policy group, said the anti-terrorism thrust of laws such as the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act is supported by most conservatives, "but the enforcement of it has lapsed into ludicrousy. The concept of material support is being distorted, and even the definition of the term 'terrorism' is being turned on its ear."

The number of individuals granted asylum since 2001 has fallen steadily, from 39,641 then to 25,257 last year, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The number of refugee arrivals has fluctuated since 2001, from a high of 68,925 that year to 28,304 in 2003 to 53,738 last year. But it has not risen as high as the 72,000 who were allowed into the country the year before the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0112972

Vager Vang, 63, is one of thousands of ethnic Hmong refugees in the United States who is hoping to gain legal residency with his green-card application. Vang fought in Laos alongside U.S. forces during the Vietnam War and helped rescue an American pilot who was shot down there.

But according to some interpretations of the Patriot Act, Vang is a former terrorist who fought against the communist Laotian government. Although his admission that he fought with Americans helped him gain refugee status in the United States in 1999, it may have hindered his green-card application after Sept. 11, 2001. The application has stalled at the Department of Homeland Security, and Fresno Interdenominational Refugee Ministries, the California group that helped him fill it out, is suspicious.

"It's not like DHS is telling people, saying, 'We're holding up your green-card application because you may have provided material support to terrorists,' " said Sophia DeWitt, a project director for the ministry. "They're just not communicating anything at all."

In central Florida, Lam Kim, 47, is fighting deportation. Kim fled Burma after soldiers ransacked her parents' house and found letters from the Chin National Front thanking her for a donation. The organization, which the Bush administration has labeled a terrorist group, is fighting against the Burmese military junta.

Kim, who uses a pseudonym, said she gave the money to help the group feed people in her ethnic group. She was jailed for two years after arriving in the United States in 2004, and her asylum request was rejected by an immigration judge. "If I go back to Burma," she said softly over the telephone, "I have to give my life. I am not terrorist. I say it not fair."

A Colombian nurse living in California who declined to give her name said she was abducted by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) outside Bogota and forced to treat one of their soldiers. She fled Colombia with her daughter in 2000 after her life was threatened in a note to her family. Her asylum request was rejected last year.

"I had no option," she said. "What will happen if I go back? I will be killed. They look for people. They know when they arrive at the airport. They have names."

Critics say that during the past two years, the Homeland Security Department has refused requests to broaden waivers that would have opened doors to people such as Hmong and Montagnard fighters who helped the United States in Vietnam and asylum-seekers such as Kim.

Horowitz, of the Hudson Institute, said he hopes Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), an opponent of "material support" provisions who has said the administration's definition of terrorists is a "catch-all," is serious about putting the issue on his agenda and holding hearings within the next two months. Leahy's spokeswoman said last week that the issue is high on his agenda.

"The key to ending these policies is in the hands of the new Democratic majority" in the House and Senate, Horowitz said. "I do not believe this is a sustainable policy."

Bauer, the American Values president, agreed, saying he plans to force the issue. "I've got a list of 150,000 conservative activists I e-mail," he said. "We're going to elevate it now as something we think time is long overdue for action."

If there are hearings in the Senate, Paul Rosenzweig, chairman of a Homeland Security advisory committee, could be called to testify. He said he is prepared to answer questions about why the department has not acted on complaints to grant waivers to people who, some say, clearly are not terrorists.

"I will completely own up to wishing we had done more, but it's a big department," he said. In the past year, the department broadened a waiver that allowed more ethnic Burmese refugees into the country, and it is in the process of broadening a waiver for Hmong and Montagnard guerrillas who fought for the United States.

The United States must be careful to not allow terrorists into the country, while fulfilling its promise to harbor the persecuted, Rosenzweig said. "It's a difficult problem," he said. "It isn't as easy as some might wish to balance the security risks that come with this and the humanitarian impulse."

Rosenzweig said that officials at the Homeland Security, Justice and State departments met with advocates about the waivers and that the meetings went well.

DOJ_NMG_0112973

But few of the advocates agreed. "I wouldn't say the meetings went well," said Jennifer Daskal, a program director for Human Rights Watch. "The administration presented a proposal that would expand the waiver and basically said, 'Trust us.' It's been two years, and the administration hasn't done a whole lot to instill confidence."

Melanie Nezer, an attorney for the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, said, "They're proposing to broaden the waiver, but the waiver hasn't worked." While the administration grants waivers to ethnic Burmese in refugee camps outside the country, she said, it rejects the applications of persecuted Burmese already in the United States.

"It's an unbelievable problem because it's absurd," Nezer said.

Men In Jordan Charged With Attack Plots (AP)

AP, January 8, 2007

Two men were charged Sunday with plotting attacks against Americans living in Jordan.

Prosecutors indicted Mohammed Shehada, 25, a Jordanian, and Sameeh al-Hotari, 25, who was born in Kuwait, for conspiracy to carry out terrorist attacks and possession of an automatic weapon, a Kalashnikov.

Shehada and al-Hotari, who were in police custody, allegedly decided to avenge Muslims "who suffer from the Americans" and planned to kill an American man who lived in a suburb of the Jordanian capital, Amman. The indictment did not identify the American.

The two suspects began watching the American in August but were arrested before they could try to kill him, the indictment said.

The two men were accused of plotting to kill other Americans, but indictment did not give specifics about those plans.

There was no information about attorneys for the two men, and a trial date has not been set.

First Wiretapping, Now Letter-opening? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

THE BUSH administration seems determined to raise the specter of surveillance over every means of communication within the United States. Not content to monitor selected phone calls and e-mails in secret, it recently hinted that letters and packages may be opened without a search warrant too.

The disclosure came in yet another presidential "signing statement," in which President Bush gives his opinion about the legislation on his desk. This one accompanied the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act — a bill to modernize how the Postal Service sets rates, promotes competition with private carriers and shores up funding for its employee retirement benefits.

In his statement, Bush seemed to assert a broader right to do warrantless mail searches than postal regulations allow. The executive branch, he said, would interpret the section on mail privacy "in a manner consistent, to the maximum extent permissible, with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances … and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

Befuddled, some privacy advocates started asking why the White House felt compelled to assert these surveillance powers when the issue wasn't even on the table. Was Bush trying to provide cover for another secret monitoring program? Was he laying the groundwork for a new one? Was he prodding balky government agents into being more aggressive on mail searches?

Suspicions have undoubtedly been heightened because of the administration's aggressive use of signing statements to defend executive-branch prerogatives, even when they're not at issue. By late July, Bush had used them to challenge more than 800 provisions of bills he signed into law. All of his predecessors combined had challenged fewer than 600 provisions in that manner.

The White House tried to allay fears last week about mail snooping. "There is nothing new here," said spokesman Tony Snow. The statement, he said, is "merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president."

On the surface, he's right. The courts have allowed searches without a warrant under "exigent circumstances," and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act permits them in emergencies when the targets are foreign agents or terrorists.

Still, it's hard not to be suspicious of the president's position on mail privacy, given the administration's record on the issue of domestic surveillance. In the name of the "war on terror," it has taken an unusually expansive view of government power and a correspondingly restrictive view of individual privacy rights. It also has sought to redefine what constitutes a "reasonable" search, and has often done so unilaterally and in secret.

DOJ_NMG_0112974

The administration may indeed be up to nothing new when it comes to mail — and that's not the least bit comforting.

Government: Out Of Our Mail (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, January 8, 2007

IN YET another power grab that whittles away our rights without a plausible justification, President Bush has given the government expanded authority to read our mail.

This White House has long signaled that it will do what it wants in the name of national security, laws be damned. It has reserved the government's right to detain and even torture suspects without due process, and has asserted for itself wide latitude to electronically eavesdrop on Americans without obtaining search warrants.

So perhaps it should surprise no one that Bush would add a "signing statement" to a postal-reform bill passed by Congress that suggests the new law allows the opening of mail that would be "otherwise sealed against inspection" for broadly defined security purposes.

Once again, the White House attempted to downplay the significance of a signing statement, insisting the president was not trying to exert any new authority. Instead, the Bush spinners said the purpose of the signing statement was to reiterate current law, which clearly does allow postal authorities to open a package suspected of containing a ticking time bomb -- the example of choice for those trying to pooh-pooh the concerns. Also, before the administration tries to trot out a red herring about wanting to intercept "letters from al Qaeda" without delay, it has every opportunity to do so under current law -- and could then apply for a warrant after the fact.

Bush has added hundreds of similarly substantive "signing statements" to legislation he has approved during his presidency. Some of his statements have unilaterally weakened, or in some cases even overturned, the intent of a bill passed by Congress. His signing statements have tempered congressional attempts to outlaw torture, limit political meddling in scientific research, protect whistle-blowers and recruit women and minorities into the intelligence services.

Before Bush took office, presidential signing statements were relatively rare and mostly limited to expressions of how an administration planned to carry out the stated intent of Congress -- not significant changes in policy.

In this case, the signing statement appears to weaken the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act's reiteration of basic protections of first-class mail from searches without court approval.

If the Bush administration believes those protections are excessive in this era of terrorism -- a highly dubious argument, considering the latitude in the law to inspect packages of suspicious nature or origin -- then it had every opportunity to raise its concerns and to propose modifications while the bill was being aired on Capitol Hill.

"Just trust us," seems to be the operative phrase of this administration.

However, history has shown the potential for government abuses in the absence of strong mail-privacy laws. Bush continues to roll back the clock -- and the Constitution -- with his signing statements.

Page B - 6

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

False Alarm Tests Miami Port's Security (MH)

By David Ovalle, Jay Weaver, Aldo Nahed And Rob Barry

The Miami Herald, January 8, 2007

What started as a potential terrorist plot at Miami-Dade's seaport Sunday morning quickly flubbed into a sobering reminder of the post 9/11 state of fear.

Initially, the story line sounded startling:

Officers stopped a Middle Eastern man driving an 18-wheel rig with mysterious cargo. Two men, the reports went, were discovered hiding in the trailer portion.

DOJ_NMG_0112975

The men had tried to "slip" past security and the port was shut down, media outlets reported.

The truth, however, emerged far less threatening -- the men were not terrorists and were only hauling electrical auto parts. Ultimately, the scare was blamed on miscommunication and unfounded reports.

"We live in a different world these days, and we have to take these situations very seriously," said James Maes, assistant seaport director for safety and security.

The story unfolded on a brilliant Sunday morning as hordes of passengers flocked to the looming cruise ships at one of the nation's busiest ports.

An Iraqi-born trucker from Michigan appeared at about 8 a.m. at the port's main entrance without proper identification, police said.

The 20-year-old driver said he was alone -- at least, that's what the security guard understood -- and the truck was rerouted to another checkpoint.

"I can't tell you how this miscommunication occurred, but apparently there was some kind of miscommunication -- apparently there was a language barrier," said Miami-Dade Lt. Nancy Goldberg, a spokeswoman.

State law dictates anyone that without the proper port ID be rerouted to another checkpoint. There, Miami-Dade officers spotted the two other men, ages 28 and 29, one of whom had no ID.

The alarm was sounded.

"Based on these series of events and in an abundance of caution, we initiated security protocols that included calling in our Southeast Regional Security Task Force," Goldberg said.

That includes the FBI, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the U.S. Coast Guard, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

FBI agents questioned the men.

County and federal authorities used a gamma ray ID device to examine the blue 40-foot container, which had 22 pallets inside.

Miami-Dade's bomb squad responded. A machine called a radio isotope device, known as RID, was used to rid any notions of radioactivity inside.

"We X-rayed the container, and the contents consisted of what was manifested on the shipping documents," said Jose Ramirez, the customs agency's port director.

The cargo indeed matched its manifest: auto wiring harnesses bound for Latin America. The devices are used to help rewire electronic equipment like stereos in cars.

By 5:15 p.m., authorities stood in front of local and national reporters to stress that despite the false alarm, security procedures unfolded perfectly.

Detectives from Miami-Dade's homeland security bureau will determine if the men will face any criminal or administrative charges.

The identities of the men, two Iraqis and one Lebanese, were not released on Sunday. Their employer was unknown.

All three were legal U.S. residents -- none were on any terrorist watch lists.

At least two of the three had a criminal history, according to several law enforcement sources.

By early afternoon, reporters had flocked to a staging area near where passengers embark on cruise ships.

For some reporters, the long lines seemed an indication of ramped-up security -- it was, in fact, normal Sunday traffic.

In the ensuing hours, various authorities and sources gave differing details, adding to the confusion. Soon, rumors had made their way into news reports online and on television.

Some outlets reported the port had closed. Others, including The Miami Herald's website, reported the discovery of two 55-gallon containers, a subtle indication of dangerous chemicals.

"There was some confusion," said Lt. Goldberg.

In the era after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, such scares are not unprecedented.

In September 2002, three medical students who made off-color remarks about 9/11 at a Georgia restaurant sparked a similar law enforcement response and media frenzy after blowing through a toll booth on Alligator Alley.

DOJ_NMG_0112976

On Sunday, authorities -- as they did then -- reminded reporters that the incident proved a valuable drill.

"The security checks and balances at the port worked well and effectively. What in the past would have taken us three to four days had taken the federal, local and state authorities a few hours to investigate and resolve," Goldberg said.

By the time of the much-delayed press conference, the mood had lightened -- especially when a cruise ship horn and one from a passing car, playing the squeal of a horse, interrupted the speakers.

Herald staff writers Evan S. Benn and Luisa Yanez contributed to this report.

3 Men Held After Misunderstanding About Truck At Miami Port That Seemed Suspicious (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 8, 2007

The arrival of a suspicious cargo truck at the Port of Miami Sunday sparked anxiety, confusion and a flurry of rumors involving hidden passengers and possibly hazardous cargo.

Federal agencies were called in and reporters flocked to the scene. By mid-afternoon the story of a potential terrorist threat at one of the nation's busiest ports was playing on every major news network.

But at the end of the day, the security situation amounted to nothing more than a false alarm caused by miscommunication, authorities said.

"The Port of Miami is safe," Miami-Dade police Lt. Nancy Goldberg announced shortly after 5 p.m. At no time during the day was cargo or cruise traffic disrupted, she said.

The scare started at approximately 8 a.m. when a truck, ostensibly carrying auto parts, pulled into the port's main gate. The driver, a 27-year-old Iraqi national, did not have a port-issued identification card and was sent to a security office to obtain a one-day pass.

At the main gate, the driver said he was alone, according to Goldberg. However, when the truck was inspected more thoroughly, Miami-Dade police officers found two men in the cab -- a second Iraqi, 23, and a Lebanese national, 20.

The additional passengers, and the fact that one was not carrying any identification, led police to detain the men and treat the situation as a possible terrorist threat, Goldberg said.

Investigators moved the truck to the port's examination facility to be X-rayed and screened for radioactive emissions. The inspection determined the 45-foot trailer contained electronic automobile parts--just as the driver's manifest stated.

Meanwhile, agents with the Federal Bureau of Investigation spent hours interviewing the men -- two brothers and a friend, according to FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela. The names of the men, who reside legally in Dearborn, Mich., were not released.

Orihuela insisted the heightened security alert was not a case of racial profiling. "It would have been the same response regardless," she said.

After lengthy questioning, the agents concluded the men were harmless and that the day's sinister-seeming events resulted from a simple misunderstanding between the truck driver and the port security officer regarding the number of passengers in the truck.

"He was asked and he stated that he was by himself," Goldberg said.

The truck driver and passengers speak "some English," while the port employee who questioned the driver is a native Creole speaker, she said.

The driver, who worked for a Dearborn, Mich., trucking company, might also have lied initially about being alone because many trucking businesses have strict rules about extra passengers, one law enforcement official said.

The men remain under investigation by the Miami-Dade police in connection with possible criminal or administrative violations, Goldberg said.

She praised the response from local, state and federal agencies, saying it would be a mistake "to minimize" any possible threat to port security.

"We have to be alert as a country to absolutely anything because the public depends on us," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0112977

Miscommunication Cited In Port Alert (NSDY/AP)

By Kelli Kennedy, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 8, 2007

MIAMI -- Three legal immigrants in a cargo truck were detained at the Port of Miami on Sunday after a routine inspection raised concerns, but police say the incident may have stemmed in part from a language barrier.

The port's cargo area was shut down Sunday as the Miami-Dade bomb squad X-rayed the truck and scanned it for radioactive materials. Nothing unusual was found, officials said.

The men in the truck -- two Iraqis and one Lebanese national -- were still detained by local police Sunday evening, but authorities said no federal charges were expected. Officials initially said the men, all permanent U.S. residents, had been caught trying to slip past a checkpoint at the port's entrance.

A port security officer became suspicious when the truck driver could not produce proper paperwork in a routine inspection to enter the port about 8 a.m., Miami-Dade police spokeswoman Nancy Goldberg said.

The driver also indicated he was alone in the truck, though security officers found two other men in the cab, she said. The two passengers, ages 28 and 29, were a friend and a relative of the 20-year-old Iraqi driver, she said.

"Due to a miscommunication between the gate security personnel and the truck driver, we believe there was a discrepancy in the number of people in the vehicle attempting to enter the Port of Miami," Goldberg said. "This, and the fact that one of the individuals did not have any form of ID, raised our level of concern."

"Maybe it could have been a language barrier; we don't know at this point," she said.

The truck's contents -- electrical automotive parts in a 40-foot container -- matched the driver's cargo manifest, Goldberg said.

The port's cargo area was shut down Sunday as the Miami-Dade bomb squad moved the truck away from public areas of the port to X-ray and scan it for radioactive materials.

More than 20 pallets containing spools of wire and other automotive parts taken from the truck were still being scanned, but no radioactive material had been found, said Jose Ramirez, a U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokesman.

The three men remained in local police custody for questioning, Goldberg said, but had not been arrested or charged by Sunday evening.

The men do not appear on any terrorist watch list, said Barbara Gonzalez, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman.

The FBI and the Department of Homeland Security were called to the scene, along with federal and local law enforcers, "in an abundance of caution," Goldberg said.

The Port of Miami is among the nation's busiest. More than 3.6 million cruise ship passengers traveled through in 2005. Its seaport services more than 30 ocean carriers, which delivered more than 1 million cargo containers there in 2005.

Passengers in the normally busy cruise ship area of the port were unaware of the official bustle in the cargo area. When told of the situation, some said they thought it probably made boarding lines longer. But officials said Sunday's long lines were normal.

"I feel freaked out," said Connecticut resident Allie Tetreault, 23, who was waiting to board a Caribbean cruise when she heard about the security alert. "That's not good to hear right before you are going on vacation."

* —

Associated Press writer Phil Davis in Tampa, Fla., contributed to this report.

Bill Would Order All Air Cargo Screened (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — The House of Representatives could approve an aviation-security measure Tuesday that would require all cargo on passenger planes to be inspected for bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0112978

The measure is part of a 277-page Democratic bill that is likely to pass in the House. Its final approval is uncertain, however, amid criticism from industry groups that warn that it could prevent quick delivery of vital goods.

Each year, U.S. passenger planes carry about 6 billion pounds of cargo, typically sent by businesses that want fast shipment. Such cargo is carried on passenger planes to speed delivery and is stored in the belly of jets along with passenger luggage.

Democrats, who took control of Congress last week, are pushing for the air cargo provision as part of a bill aiming to bolster homeland security. They say it would close a major hole in security.

Inspections are now done on only a small portion of cargo on passenger planes.

"Passenger planes are still at the top of the terrorist target list," said Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., Congress' leading advocate for cargo inspection. "Here is a backdoor way onto planes."

Cargo aircraft, which carry about 75% of air shipments and have far fewer people on board, would not have their goods inspected.

Airlines and cargo companies say inspections would take so long that passenger planes could not carry goods that require fast delivery. That includes live seafood and other perishables, and items such as auto parts that manufacturers want brought directly to plants to avoid storage costs.

"These requirements will slow down the flow of commerce," said Brandon Fried, executive director of the Airforwarders Association, whose members move cargo from businesses to air carriers.

Airlines might cancel certain passenger routes if those flights can no longer carry cargo, said David Castelveter, spokesman for the Air Transport Association, which represents major U.S. airlines. That's because cargo shipments can provide a large portion of a flight's revenue, and a route may not be profitable without cargo.

Markey dismissed gloomy scenarios and noted that under the legislation, passenger airlines would not have to inspect all cargo until September 2009.

The Transportation Security Administration regulates air cargo largely by setting security requirements for companies that ship goods on passenger planes and inspecting those companies.

Markey's four-year push for cargo inspections has its best chance of passing now that Democrats control the House and Senate, said Fried, who told an aviation security conference last month that he vows a "massive lobbying campaign" against such cargo inspection.

Markey said he's not sure whether the Senate will retain a cargo-screening provision in its bill. House approval "will result in more pressure," he said.

On Friday, 10 groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce sent lawmakers a letter urging "realistic solutions" that focus inspections on high-risk shipments and encourage companies to tighten cargo security.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., chairman of the Senate aviation subcommittee, has asked the TSA whether cargo can be secured without inspecting every package, his spokeswoman Wendy Morigi said. If it can't, Rockefeller "will look to see how we can realistically achieve 100% physical screening," Morigi said.

Congress And Your Security (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

The new Congress is about to revisit some perilously neglected needs of homeland security, with Democrats determined to mandate inspection of all incoming sea cargo by 2012. This is an overdue protection that Republicans bottled up in the last Congress. The House, run now by the Democrats, plans swift passage of legislation requiring both stronger port security and the screening of all air cargo over the next three years.

The bipartisan commission that studied the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks criticized Congress for neglecting these vital steps. They should long ago have been antiterrorism no-brainers for the nation. The complaints of business lobbyists about undue burdens on commerce pale when compared with the havoc that would be created in the American economy if terrorists mounted another major attack.

DOJ_NMG_0112979

The Senate should move quickly on these important protections. That chamber will also face a key test of whether the new Democratic majority can override the selfish regional politicking that has skewed the formula for distributing homeland security aid to states and localities. The House proposal is properly written as a risk-based formula, awarding more aid to states like New York and California and other areas where the obvious risks are greater. The question is whether senators from less populated states will again be able to treat homeland security funds as just more local pork, rather than focusing on demonstrated threats.

During last year's Congressional election campaign, the Democrats promised to deliver on the neglected proposals of the 9/11 commission. The House legislation gets only part of the way there. On the imperative need for ensuring radio compatibility between different first responders, it creates study grants for localities and states rather than imposing clear deadlines for addressing the problem and fixing it.

The legislation also sidesteps some of the 9/11 commission's most important findings about the dysfunctional intelligence apparatus. It fails to declassify the nation's costly intelligence budget — a necessary first step for understanding the murky ineptitude of this branch of government. It also makes no effort to rationalize or referee the counterproductive rivalries between the Pentagon's intelligence agencies and their civilian counterparts.

The House measure amounts to a worthy step forward, but one that does not go far enough. The new Congress should be uncompromising on the challenges of homeland security.

Politics: A White House Shuffle (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

Intelligence insiders expect recent personnel shifts to strengthen the authority of the national intelligence director, the job Congress created to improve U.S. spy operations after September 11, 2001. Last week the White House announced that the first "intelligence czar," Ambassador John Negroponte, would return to the State Department as Condoleezza Rice's deputy. His replacement: Mike McConnell, a retired Navy three-star admiral whose career path is similar to that of new CIA Director Michael Hayden, a four-star Air Force general; both men once directed the eavesdropping agency NSA. New Defense Secretary Robert Gates is expected to replace Defense Intelligence Under Secretary Stephen Cambone with another military man, retired Air Force three-star Gen. James Clapper, who headed a spy-photo agency known as NGA. "They have known each other for years and get along very well," said a CIA official, who asked not to be identified discussing an intelligence issue.

Under Negroponte, the intel czar's office was praised by both congressional and executive-branch officials for greatly improving—via its National Counterterrorism Center—the sharing among relevant agencies of intelligence reports about terror threats. But the office was criticized for slower progress in sharing intel on other subjects—including nuclear proliferation—and for establishing a new layer of bureaucracy. A big criticism was that, in the face of alleged obstruction by former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the intel czar's office had too little control over Pentagon intel agencies like the giant NSA. Assuming Clapper does become Pentagon intel chief, however, relations between Defense agencies and the intel czar's office may improve considerably: four intelligence officials, who asked for anonymity discussing intel issues, say that Clapper once angered Rumsfeld by telling Congress he would be comfortable if his NGA operation was moved out of Pentagon control and under direct control of the intel czar. At the time, Hayden, then chief of NSA, expressed similar sentiments.

Congress: Is A Katrina Probe On? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

One early indication of how aggressively Capitol Hill Democrats will investigate the Bush administration—and how strongly the White House will resist—will be how vigorously the new congressional majority pursues Katrina inquiries.

Under GOP leadership, both House and Senate committees sought copies of Katrina records, but the White House declined to turn over messages between the president and his top advisers. According to a GOP investigator involved with the probe, who asked to remain anonymous discussing sensitive matters, Bush aides indicated that if Congress pressed harder, the White House was likely to claim such material was covered by executive privilege. But now that the Democrats have subpoena power, an effort to force the White House to turn over the messages is a "possibility," says a House Democratic source, who also asked to remain anonymous due to political sensitivities. Democrats have ample reason to believe such material could provide new evidence of White House bungling: former FEMA chief Michael (Brownie) Brown told NEWSWEEK that in a still-secret videoconference shortly after Katrina hit New Orleans, he warned presidential aides that 90 percent of the city was being "displaced," but was greeted with "deafening silence."

DOJ_NMG_0112980

The Dems Now Have Some Dogs In The Fight (USNEWS)

By Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Democrats won a stunning victory in November, but that may have been the easy part. Now, they have to prove to voters they can stand together to get things done. But, as Republicans learned on issues like immigration, party unity can be a fleeting notion.

Veteran liberals such as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, hold the party's reins, but their power is likely to be tested by a group far removed from the party establishment-conservative Democrats who are flexing newfound muscle. Eighteen of 41 incoming House freshmen joined the New Democrat Coalition and/or the Blue Dog Coalition, caucuses of pro-business and fiscally conservative Democrats, respectively. Both were born in the wake of the 1994 Republican revolution. Moderate New Democrats claimed the mantle of pragmatists like Bill Clinton. Pro-technology and free trade, the New Democrats boast a few more members, but the budget-minded Blue Dogs may have more bite. Now 44 members strong, this conservative caucus looks to be a cohesive voting bloc on fiscal issues. It also claims some freshman stars, like former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler of North Carolina and former sheriff Brad Ellsworth of Indiana, both of whom won in GOP strongholds. Fourth-term Arkansas Rep. Mike Ross, cochair of the Blue Dogs, says party leaders recognize them as a "force to be reckoned with," adding, "We didn't defeat Republicans with liberal Democrats. We're in the middle ... and that's where we're trying to bring our party."

Both Pelosi and President Bush met with caucus members before Congress reconvened. Pelosi has doled out key assignments as well, putting seven Blue Dogs on the House Appropriations Committee, which controls congressional purse strings. Conservative Democrats are the driving force behind three key initiatives in Pelosi's touted 100-hour plan: implementing pay-as-you-go rules requiring Congress to offset new spending, adding transparency to the earmarking process, and promising members adequate time to review a bill before a vote.

Muscle. That's a far cry from the years when Blue Dogs operated on the fringe with hard-line members mostly from the South and Midwest. But as the federal deficit grew, so did their numbers, with members from California to New York. They still represent mostly rural regions, and while a few take liberal stands on abortion and gay marriage, most are pro-gun, pro-defense, and antiabortion. Many feel that has kept Blue Dogs from leadership positions. By contrast, New Democrat Rep. Rahm Emanuel led the party's bid to win back the House. But, in a sign of the times, he did so by recruiting Democrats more conservative than himself.

That strategy could set the stage for some testy battles with old-guard liberals now chairing key committees-not only Rangel but Rep. Henry Waxman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and Rep. John Dingell of Energy and Commerce. Observers expect the biggest fights to be over pay-as-you-go rules, which are anathema to more free-spending liberals. Showdowns are possible over some key Democratic initiatives, such as halving interest rates on student loans and reforming the alternative minimum tax so it doesn't hit more middle-class families-a fix that could cost the government $50 billion to $70 billion a year. Under pay-as-you-go rules, Democrats would have to find a way to offset that cost. Michael Franc of the Heritage Foundation expects Democrats to be tempted to waive the rules in tricky cases-thus inflaming the party's conservative wing-or raise taxes, which could be politically dangerous. "If Blue Dogs say, 'We're not going to give you a bye on this'... they've created a $50 billion headache for Charlie Rangel," Franc says.

Headaches aside, Ross says the Blue Dogs will stand firm. "There's going to be a natural conflict," says James Thurber, a political scientist at American University, "between Blue Dogs and the old bulls that are chairs."

Even in the more moderate Senate, a new middle may be emerging. Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine is overhauling the long-standing Senate Centrist Coalition to create a less formal atmosphere for Republicans and Democrats to talk over a weekly lunch or breakfast. Even the word centrist is likely to go in order to avoid any ideological association. New independent Joe Lieberman and Republican Lamar Alexander, meanwhile, are creating their own weekly, bipartisan breakfast group. Cynics note that bipartisanship and moderation always sound good at the beginning of a new Congress. And Pelosi's plan to kick-start the Democratic majority is mostly "low-hanging fruit," Thurber says. "The hard stuff comes with tax reform, Iraq, immigration, and healthcare." That's when we'll see just how well these Democrats can get along.

DOJ_NMG_0112981

Changing The Guard (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

The Democrats swooped into Washington last week for their first week in power in 12 years. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the first woman to lead the House, hoisted the gavel, was serenaded by Tony Bennett and the former members of the Grateful Dead, and had a hometown Baltimore street named after her. In the House of Representatives, the party passed a set of ethics and earmark reforms in the first two days of the session and now embarks on a 100-hour legislative sprint to show it can govern. In the coming days, President Bush will deliver his much-anticipated speech on Iraq policy, and Democrats have plans to haul Defense Secretary Robert Gates and the nation's top intelligence officials before Congress.

There's no mistaking the shift in tone and power on Capitol Hill. Elected with a mandate to clean up Washington by a deeply disgruntled public, Democrats have a mighty task ahead and a plan to move quickly in the first few weeks. But their efforts are fraught with any number of challenges: holding the progressive and centrist wings of the party together, turning legislation into law with the slimmest of Senate majorities, and working with a president who has seen little resistance from Capitol Hill during his six years in office. How Democrats fare in the next few months-before the presidential election begins to overwhelm Washington-will help determine whether the party maintains control in 2008 and beyond. And for political junkies, it should be quite a show.

Beginnings. First up, Democrats plan to pass their 100-hour agenda through the House before the president's State of the Union address on January 23. "It's not the specifics of what they pass that matters," says Mickey Edwards, a former Republican representative from Oklahoma. "What matters is that when Bush stands up in front of Congress, the people in front of him have already sent notice to him that they're in charge."

The Democrats' agenda, known as the Six for '06, encompasses six politically appealing bills. Those measures would hike the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, increase federal funds for embryonic stem cell research, implement most of the 9/11 commission's still-outstanding recommendations, repeal tax breaks for oil companies, halve interest rates on student loans, and allow the government to negotiate the price of Medicare prescription drugs. "We view these first 100 hours as essentially a mandate of the American people," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer. "We said to the American people that if you elect us, this is what we'll do." Democrats have decided to proceed with their agenda without an opportunity for Republicans to add amendments to the bills or to let the bills pass through the normal committee hearing procedure. Republicans immediately cried foul, but Democrats counter that the bills have been subject to congressional hearings in the past and were supported in the election.

The six bills may very well sail through the House, since the Democrats hold a 233-to-202-seat majority there. That's the easy part. "Passing the four items out of the House is training camp," says Brad Woodhouse of the Change America Now coalition, a group of labor unions and progressive groups that is lobbying for the agenda. "Getting them through the Senate is the regular season. Getting them signed by the president is the Super Bowl." Take embryonic stem cell research, for example: In 2005, Bush used the sole veto of his presidency to override a bill that would have increased such funding.

Deliberation. What happens next in the Senate could take much longer. Majority Leader Harry Reid has said Democrats' first 10 bills will follow normal procedures and be open to committee hearings. With a narrow 50-to-49-seat majority in the Senate-well short of the 60 votes necessary to overcome a filibuster-Democrats know they must work closely with Republicans to pass legislation. The tenuous nature of their hold has been underscored since mid-December, when Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota suffered a brain hemorrhage and was rushed to the hospital, where he remains in critical condition.

DOJ_NMG_0112982

Then there are the competing ambitions of roughly 10 presidential candidates from both parties, including presumptive front-runners John McCain, Barack Obama, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, that Reid must navigate.

The Democratic unity could be put to the test soon after the State of the Union speech, when Democrats begin to tackle a litany of thorny issues-from labor laws governing union organization to trade authorization and universal healthcare-that could drive a wedge between conservative and liberal Democrats and complicate the re-election of Democrats who won narrowly in heavily Republican districts. Labor unions and the party's left wing have bought into the 100-hour agenda as a "down payment" for their wish lists of new programs and laws. "There is no question. [Pelosi] is in a hard spot," says Robert Borosage, head of the progressive Campaign for America's Future. "The base of the party is demanding a significant challenge to the president."

The party's tensions were most visibly on display last week over Iraq. Democratic House Caucus Chair Rahm Emanuel tried to hold a press conference, only to be drowned out by a war protesters led by Cindy Sheehan, who became a household name after protesting outside the president's ranch. "De-escalate, investigate; troops home now!" they chanted, driving Emanuel back into a closed-door meeting. Democratic leaders, Sheehan said, "need to include the grass-roots voices."

Many of the tough oversight hearings on issues such as no-bid contracts in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and food and drug safety methods are likely to come after the State of the Union address so as not to overshadow the 100-hour agenda. Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, a 51-year veteran of the House, is finalizing his roster of Energy and Commerce Committee lieutenants this week and will then decide on hearings and potential legislation; Rep. Henry Waxman's powerful Committee on Oversight (newly added to the title) and Government Reform is doing pretty much the same thing. Several committees in both houses have vowed tough oversight hearings on Iraq, but the political challenges are heady; Congress has few options other than restricting or adding conditions to the funding of the war. "We will work on that to the best of our ability," says Reid. He and Pelosi warned Bush late last week that a troop surge would be misguided and urged the president to plan a phased withdrawal of troops.

Those old bull Democratic committee chairmen like Dingell, Waxman, and Rep. Charles Rangel of New York have been out of power for 12 years and are now eager for vigorous oversight, which could put them at odds with younger Democrats, who have a more centrist ideology and who worry about re-election in Republican-heavy districts. "I think there is an overall appreciation by the most senior members," says Rep. Joe Crowley of New York, a veteran moderate Democrat, "that the reason why Democrats are in control of the House is that we were able to reach beyond the traditional voting bloc to moderates." Such tensions haven't yet manifested themselves, but Democratic strategists see potential problems on issues like trade, spending, and taxes.

The most bruising fights in Congress will most likely come down to dollars and cents budget questions in the spring. Bush said last week he'd work with congressional Democrats, while throwing down the gauntlet on any attempt to raise taxes and saying his economic plan would balance the federal budget by 2012. Democrats so far vow to abide by rules that require any increase in new entitlement spending to be offset by tax revenue or cuts to other programs. The Democrats in charge of the House Budget and Appropriations committees have said Congress will "face a fiscal challenge of historic proportions" in 2007, given the costs of both the Bush tax cuts and the Iraq war (the president will ask Congress for roughly $100 billion in a supplemental bill in February). "I don't think you'll see a major liberal agenda pushed by the Democrats' caucus at the end of the day," says Jim Turner, a former Democratic representative from Texas. "Once the war is behind us and we have a chance to recover from the huge deficits that we're facing, then maybe."

Democrats and Republicans have pledged cooperation, with Senate leaders holding a bipartisan meeting last week to find common ground. But Republicans have a simple new fact to learn-life in the minority. "It's important to recognize," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said, standing beside Reid, "that over the past 25 years some of the most important achievements have been during a period of divided government." After their November losses, House Republicans said they'd strongly attack Democrats from the get-go, but they've now softened their approach-at least for the first month.

The bipartisanship may hold through January, giving Democrats something of a political honeymoon. How well they avoid the political traps in the months ahead and help shape Iraq policy will go much further in determining whether the 2006 election was merely a blip in the Republicans' control or a decisive realignment.

The Perils Of Pouting (USNEWS)

DOJ_NMG_0112983

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Believe it or not, lots of Republicans are downright chirpy these days. Yes, they lost the election. Big time. And they've lost their top committee assignments. And their big office suites. They're downsizing, to be sure, and that's not an easy or pleasant thing to do. On top of that, they've got a Republican president with an all-time-low approval rating of 30 percent. "And that's not good for any of us," says Tom Cole of Oklahoma, the newly elected chairman of the House GOP campaign committee.

So why the smiles? Because the now minority congressional Republicans are feeling liberated. The burden of trying to run a fractious Congress is gone. Now they get to become professional critics. No longer do they have to sweat to deliver a "majority of the majority" to the White House for every big vote-including Iraq. They can be the opposition voice, the backbenchers, the unruly minority. After all, they earned it.

But there's a peril in their new circumstance. The temptation is to behave badly, to prove the Democrats can't get anything done and don't deserve their new majority status. They can complain, as they did this past week, that they're being unfairly shut out of the legislative process. They can become obstructionist if they want; there's plenty of precedent for that. But to simply oppose would be a huge mistake: The public asked for reform and change. To get in the way of that would only be self-destructive.

A losing hand. Yet last week, the Republicans spent much of their time wallowing in a burst of newfound self-righteousness, whining about the Democrats' fast-track legislative strategy-passing ethics reform, then quickly moving on to popular issues like an increase in the minimum wage and federal funding for embryonic stem cell research. The Democrats went straight to the floor, bypassing the usual legislative committees and refusing to allow any amendments. After all, they argued, these measures have been fully vetted, debated, and redebated. Republicans, however, pretend to be shocked, shocked at this betrayal of House rules. Spare us the outrage. Have they forgotten that time in 2003 that the very partisan Tom DeLay and company prolonged a roll call vote for three hours to allow Republicans to round up enough members to pass the prescription drug benefit? Where were the House rules then?

In the end, though, this isn't about the rules. It's about what the public wants. "The American people didn't ask us to wait," the new chairman of the House Democratic caucus, Illinois's Rahm Emanuel, told me. "There's been an election. We ran on an agenda, and we're giving people an opportunity to vote on those bills." And while no one would accuse Emanuel of being anything but a partisan-he was the maestro of the party's House victory in November-his point is accurate. The GOP's whining leaders need to get a grip and then get on with it. "I have three children," Emanuel says, "and I know a tantrum when I see it." In fact, the Republican leaders' righteousness didn't even go over well with some of their own rank-and-file members. "When I saw our leadership whining about the process, I just about threw up," says Rep. Jeff Flake, a conservative Arizona Republican. "We sound like a bunch of babies."

Here's the point: Republicans can engage in a charade complaining about the process all they want. But when they ran the place, they failed on the policy. Consider ethics reform, passed in the House last week. Some Republicans wasted time grumbling that certain reforms didn't go far enough; that the plan to disclose pet spending projects-aka earmarks-should have included a system to simply cut these projects in half. Maybe so. But if it's so weak, why didn't they make the changes when they ran the place? In the end, they voted with the Democrats to pass the most far-reaching ethics reform in House history-including a ban on gifts from lobbyists and free travel on corporate jets. Republicans supported it, because it was the right thing to do, and, besides, they decided not to be suicidal. All of which is a good sign. As Flake says, Republicans should know they had their chance to reform, in the aftermath of the Jack Abramoff influence-buying scandal, and blew it. "We should admit we didn't handle ourselves very well when we were in charge."

A new CBS News poll finds the American people, at least, have hope that things will change. Sixty-eight percent say they're optimistic about the new Congress. If they are disappointed, beware.

Ninth Ward Fairly Sound, Study Says (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

AP, January 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112984

NEW ORLEANS -- Urban planners at three universities are challenging the notion that the city's Ninth Ward must be rebuilt from scratch, reporting in a new survey that the predominantly black neighborhoods can be brought back largely as they existed before Hurricane Katrina flooded them.

"The structural integrity of the buildings, even in the most devastated areas, are in much better condition than has been reported," said Kenneth Reardon, chair of Cornell University's Department of City and Regional Planning.

The only section that must be demolished before being rebuilt lies directly next to the levee breach on the Industrial Canal, an area that covers less than a square mile in the Lower Ninth Ward, the planners said. Homes there were battered by floodwaters from Katrina and then from Hurricane Rita nearly a month later.

Urban planners and students at Cornell, Columbia University and the University of Illinois carried out the survey, which was sponsored by ACORN, a national group that works to improve poor and moderate-income neighborhoods. Researchers and structural engineers based their assessment on the inspection of about 3,000 buildings.

The findings were released Saturday.

More than 80 percent of the Ninth Ward's structures "suffered no terminal structural damage," the research found, and the majority of those structures were built atop piers, making it easier to raise them to meet new flood zone requirements.

Only about 20 percent of Ninth Ward residents have returned home, the survey found. It cited bureaucratic and financial hurdles.

"That data shows that it can be rebuilt, and rebuilt in a cost-effective way. What is lacking are the resources," said Andrew Rumbach, a Cornell planner.

Many people in the Ninth Ward did not have flood insurance, and government rebuilding aid has been slow in coming. A lack of schools, day-care centers, businesses and public services, as well as high rents, are also keeping people away.

Ceeon Quiett, a spokeswoman for Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D), said that the mayor is interested in rebuilding the Ninth Ward, but that his office has not yet reviewed ACORN's report.

WAR NEWS:

Plan Sets Series Of Goals For Iraq Leaders (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — President Bush's new Iraq policy will establish a series of goals that the Iraqi government will be expected to meet to try to ease sectarian tensions and stabilize the country politically and economically, senior administration officials said Sunday.

Among these "benchmarks" are steps that would draw more Sunnis into the political process, finalize a long-delayed measure on the distribution of oil revenue and ease the government's policy toward former Baath Party members, the officials said.

As the policy is being debated in Washington, the new American operational commander in Iraq said Sunday that his plan was to send additional American troops, expected to be part of the policy change, into Baghdad's toughest neighborhoods, and that under the new strategy it may take another "two or three years" to gain the upper hand in the war. [Page A9.]

Without saying what the specific penalties for failing to achieve the goals would be, American officials insisted that they intended to hold the Iraqis to a realistic timetable for action, but the Americans and Iraqis have agreed on many of the objectives before, only to fall considerably short.

And the widespread skepticism about the Bush administration's Iraq strategy among Democrats and some Republicans was underscored by the new speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, in a television interview broadcast Sunday. She, along with the Democratic leader of the Senate, Harry Reid, informed the president that they were opposed to increasing troop levels.

DOJ_NMG_0112985

"If the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it," Mrs. Pelosi said on the CBS News program "Face the Nation." "And this is new for him because up until now the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions."

She also suggested that Congress should deal with financing for the current war and for the proposed increase as separate issues. "If the president chooses to escalate the war, in his budget request we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now," she said.

Whether lawmakers are prepared to advocate legislative steps to withhold funds from an expanded mission is unclear. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Democratic chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said Sunday that as a practical matter, there was little that lawmakers could do to prevent Mr. Bush from expanding the American military mission in Iraq.

"You can't go in like a Tinkertoy and play around and say you can't spend the money on this piece and this piece," Mr. Biden said on the NBC News program "Meet the Press." "He'll be able to keep the troops there forever, constitutionally, if he wants to."

"As a practical matter," Mr. Biden added, "there is no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop.' "

Mr. Bush is expected to refer to the benchmarks in a much-anticipated speech this week outlining his new Iraq strategy, including plans to send as many as 20,000 additional troops. Administration officials plan to make the benchmarks public sometime after the address.

In addition to trying to ease Congressional concerns over the new strategy, the administration is trying to instill discipline in an Iraqi government that has been slow to act and hampered by sectarian agendas.

"There will be an approach and a strategy that reflects not only the desire for the Iraqis to take more responsibility but the need for the Iraqis to step up," a senior administration official familiar with the deliberations said. "This is not an open-ended commitment. We are putting real specific requirements and expectations on the Iraqi government."

The Americans and Iraqis have agreed on benchmarks before. Indeed, some of the goals that are to be incorporated on the list of benchmarks have been carried over from an earlier list that was hammered out with the Iraqis and made public in October, but never met.

The benchmarks, for example, include a previously stated commitment: setting a date for provincial elections. That goal is intended to enfranchise Sunnis — who had initially boycotted the political process — and thus give them a role in the governing of Sunni-dominated areas.

Another measure that was carried over from the old list of benchmarks is the final completion of the long-delayed national oil law that would give the central government the power to distribute current and future oil revenues to the provinces or regions, based on their population.

The list of benchmarks will also deal with the still-unresolved matter of settling a new policy on de-Baathification. There is wide agreement among experts that the initial Iraqi approach toward former Baath Party members was too sweeping and excluded too many from government service and entitlements. A revised approach would seek to address those concerns by, for example, paying Army pensions to some former Baathists who have been excluded from receiving them.

One important theme of the new Iraqi strategy will be encouraging the Iraqi government to spend more on projects and programs in Sunni areas. Most of the funds allocated for the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province in western Iraq have never actually been expended. That has encouraged opposition to the Iraqi authorities in Baghdad and handicapped the American military's counterinsurgency efforts in the province.

"The assessment has been that the disbursement of funds from the Iraqi government from Baghdad out to the provinces, particularly the Sunni provinces, has been either slow or nonexisting," the senior Bush administration official said. "That has to change."

Administration officials said that by more clearly defining the goals and by planning to make them public some time after Mr. Bush's address they hoped to encourage a sense of accountability on the part of the Iraqis.

Mr. Bush discussed some of the goals — the need for provincial elections, the enactment of the oil law and reform of Iraq's de-Baathification policy — during his recent video conference with Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

DOJ_NMG_0112986

The Americans have not been the only ones underscoring the need for benchmarks. The Maliki government has pressed to gain direct command of Iraq's 10 army divisions, insisting it should be achieved by June. Some American officials have been concerned that it is overambitious. Nevertheless, an administration official has indicated that it is among the goals.

In Washington, the idea of benchmarks has been generally welcomed by lawmakers, though many remain skeptical that they will be achieved on schedule.

After meeting with the president and his national security team on Friday at the White House, senators from both parties said they told Mr. Bush they would have trouble supporting an American troop increase unless the plan included specific goals for the Iraqi government.

Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, said one of his Senate colleagues asked why the effort to add to American forces in Iraq would be more likely to succeed than previous troop increases. Mr. Sununu said the president and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, responded that Mr. Bush's plan would "include more specific goals, different rules of engagement and different expectations for cooperation with the Iraqi government."

Mr. Sununu said when he raised questions about oil revenue distribution, provincial elections and national reconciliation, he received "strong assurances that these were recognized as critical issues, that they were being addressed by the Maliki government," with one proposal that was nearing completion for the distribution of oil revenue and another regarding provincial elections.

Bush Considers Expansion Of Up To 20,000 Troops (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush is reviewing a plan that would send up to 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq, a decision that would trigger heavy opposition from Democratic congressional leaders.

The White House plans a presidential address no sooner than Wednesday to discuss the proposal, which includes new programs for jobs, reconstruction and political assistance in Iraq, according to two administration officials who have been briefed on it.

The officials, who spoke on the condition they not be identified because the president has not made final decisions, said increases would come in phases that could add up to 20,000 troops during the next several months. It is unclear how long the additional troops would stay.

IN IRAQ: Bombings, shootings kill 14 as army amplifies its efforts

The plan includes up to $1 billion in economic assistance, such as job creation and reconstruction projects, the officials said. It also calls for political assistance, including help for human rights groups and political organizations, in an effort to promote peaceful reconciliation among warring Shiite and Sunni factions.

Previous reconstruction efforts have faced serious problems and controversies, including repeated power outages and the awarding of no-bid contracts to U.S. companies.

Elements of the plan emerged over the weekend in The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has announced plans to increase the number of local forces in Baghdad.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., appearing on CBS' Face the Nation, said Sunday that Bush would have to justify any troop hike to the new Congress. "This is new for him because up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions," she said.

On Friday, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent a letter to Bush opposing any U.S. troop increase. The letter said, "Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed."

White House spokesman Alex Conant noted that Pelosi said she wants to succeed in Iraq, and "we're interested in any ideas that lead to success."

"The president looks forward to addressing the American people next week on the way forward in Iraq," Conant said.

In developing a new Iraq policy, the administration has changed the military leadership in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112987

Gen. David Petraeus, a supporter of U.S. force increases in Iraq, will head the multinational force there. He'll replace Gen. George Casey, who expressed skepticism over whether an increased U.S. military presence would be productive, and is being promoted to Army chief of staff.

Bush has also accepted the Pentagon's recommendation that Adm. William Fallon replace the retiring John Abizaid as head of the U.S. Central Command, which includes Iraq.

The administration is stepping up diplomatic efforts in the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East soon to discuss negotiations between the Israelis and Palestinians. Bush has been skeptical, however, about direct talks with Syria and Iran.

Bush would have support for a troop surge from at least two prominent senators, John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, I-Conn. Both said a troop increase would help quell sectarian violence.

Plan For Troop 'Surge' In Iraq Gathers Force (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

President Bush plans to lay out his Iraq strategy this week - and could opt for a modest increase of US forces.

WASHINGTON

Advocates of a "surge" of US troops in Iraq hope to persuade President Bush that the victory he seeks there is only possible with a substantial and prolonged escalation of the US presence.

The new congressional Democratic leadership, on the other hand, is calling on Mr. Bush to resist the idea. Yet the president may not satisfy either the "large and long surge" or the "no surge" camp when he unveils his plans in a speech to the American public, likely to occur Wednesday night. Speculation has grown as Bush has consulted widely and reshuffled his Iraq diplomatic and military teams that he could opt for a modest increase - no more than 20,000 troops.

Critics say that would simply repeat past tactics that have not delivered, while advocates of a big surge say it could be worse than nothing, only exposing more US troops to danger without providing the larger numbers they say are needed to get the job done of securing the civilian population.

"We must not low-ball this," says Frederick Kagan, a military historian at Washington's American Enterprise Institute (AEI) and a prominent proponent of a "large and long" US military increase. Insisting Iraq will be costly and bloody for the United States no matter what policy is chosen, he adds, "We can pay the price and win, or pay a similar price and lose."

Nearly two months after the Iraq Study Group dismissed any rise in US troops, advocates of military escalation are calling for an increase of up to 40,000 troops over the current 140,000 on the ground. The goal would be to secure Baghdad with a large American footprint long enough to allow economic development to take hold, and to defeat insurgents in the western Al-Anbar Province.

The strategy is supported by two prominent senators - longtime troop-increase advocate John McCain and Joseph Lieberman - and Washington neoconservatives. Other senators say they could support a small increase lasting a few months. Still others condemn the idea, including Republican Chuck Hagel, who calls it "folly."

Supporters say it would finally call on the US military to do something it should have done from the beginning. "The US military has never set the task for itself of providing security," says Mr. Kagan. What he advocates "is not simply a surge of troops," he says, "but a change of mission."

The major shift in mission that Bush is expected to announce is for US soldiers to take on the task of providing security to Iraqi civilians, primarily in Baghdad, instead of leaving that to the Iraqis. "What's being prepared is actually a drastic departure" from recent strategy, says Paul Hughes, a former Army colonel who served in Iraq under the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Bush has made it increasingly clear that he is committed to achieving "victory" in Iraq. He has announced a number of diplomatic and military moves in recent days suggesting that he is lining up his team for what he sees as the defining foreign-policy effort of his last two years in office.

First, director of national intelligence John Negroponte, a seasoned diplomat and former ambassador to postwar Iraq, was moved back to the State Department to serve as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The president's new Iraq policy is expected to include a substantial new reconstruction program involving small teams of State Department officials working among Iraqis, and Mr. Negroponte is seen as a boon to its successful implementation.

DOJ_NMG_0112988

Then Bush announced that Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus will replace Gen. George Casey as commander of multinational forces in Iraq. An expert in counterinsurgency, General Petraeus agrees with "surge" advocates that securing the civilian population must come first in Iraq.

Perhaps more important, official sources say, is that Petraeus fits better with Bush's vision of "victory." General Casey advocated transferring security duties to Iraqi soldiers and was doubtful that foreign soldiers could successfully fulfill that function.

The Iraq Study Group, chaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former congressional leader Lee Hamilton, emphasized diplomacy and a redeployment of US forces to training Iraqi forces as a prelude to reducing the American footprint. On the other hand, the pro-escalation forces foresee the US military performing key security functions for at least the next 18 months.

And while the Iraq Study Group pointedly refrained from speaking in terms of "victory" in Iraq, the escalation protagonists insist that victory is not only still possible but necessary to halting the march of Islamic extremism in the Middle East.

"This war is still winnable," says Senator Lieberman of Connecticut.

Lieberman, who refers to himself as an Independent Democrat, spoke Friday at an AEI forum where Kagan unveiled "Choosing Victory," a report he co-authored on how to achieve success in Iraq.

Virtually all sides in the debate over a new war strategy agree that Iraq is deteriorating rapidly and the situation there may have outstripped the US ability to turn things around. But the surge advocates' focus on "victory" - and their picture of the dire consequences for US security if the US is not successful in Iraq - is much more in tune with Bush's outlook.

The reshuffling of the president's Iraq team reflects in part an effort to rid the administration of divisions in Iraq policy that existed prior to the invasion. But some officials and analysts say the disputes over policy changes remain.

Cleavage continues over surge, with some policymakers and critics saying the right kinds of US troops and equipment are not available - and that ultimately Iraq can only be secure under Iraqis themselves.

Bush, who spoke at length by videoconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki last week, is expected to emphasize that the new security mission will be carried out with additional Iraqi security forces as well.

But surge advocates and critics tend to agree that the number of additional troops the Bush administration is considering is unlikely to be enough to make a difference.

Mr. Hughes, now a specialist in postconflict peace and stability operations at the US Institute of Peace in Washington, notes that the peacekeeping force in the Balkans was set up on the principle of one peacekeeper for every 50 civilians. That would mean 100,000 soldiers in Baghdad alone, excluding the huge Shiite sector of Sadr City.

If Bush sends 20,000 additional troops, "would we reach the number we would need? I don't think so," Hughes says. "Just sending more troops to Baghdad is like pouring more water in the sands of Al-Anbar. It's just going to disappear without accomplishing anything."

Iraq Battle Plan Includes Aid, Talks, Troops (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD — Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the newly installed day-to-day commander of military operations in Iraq, said that success here would depend on a multi-pronged strategy that included economic aid and political negotiations in addition to increased military actions targeting Shiite and Sunni Arab militants.

"We have always tended to look for the military for the solution to this problem," said Odierno, who left his job as military advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to become the operations chief for Iraq.

Speaking before an expected Bush administration proposal to request a surge of thousands of U.S. troops, Odierno said more soldiers would speed the training of the Iraqi force and help quell sectarian fighting in the capital.

He said bringing peace to Baghdad could be accomplished either with additional American troops or expanded recruiting and training of Iraqi troops, or a combination of the two.

DOJ_NMG_0112989

Odierno, a West Point graduate who has commanded the 4th Infantry Division in Tikrit and northern Iraq, was known as a tough fighter whose tactics sometimes bordered on the controversial.

But in his comments during a media luncheon at Camp Victory in Baghdad, Odierno said that he had "learned an awful lot" and acknowledged that the war, and the tactics necessary to prevail, had changed.

Odierno said that during a recent fact-finding trip by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, he offered several suggestions for increased U.S. involvement in Iraq.

"Some included a surge of economic capabilities, they included a surge of other capabilities within our government — Treasury, Justice — to work the rule of law, and some didn't include a troop surge," he said. "We provided a broad range of things and then we gave a risk analysis."

Odierno said that some tasks, such as training Iraq's police and military and securing Baghdad, could succeed without additional American troops, but they would take more time.

"Over time we can accomplish the mission," he said. "Now that time might be two or three years from now, so the issue becomes are we willing to wait two or three years or do we want to speed it up."

With a troop increase, of either Iraqis or Americans, Odierno said, he hoped to hand over security responsibilities for the capital to the Iraqi security forces by August or September.

The commander said he also hoped that the forthcoming Bush plan would address rampant unemployment in Iraq and political challenges that had become rallying points for Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias.

Iraqis alienated

Political instability and the alienation of ordinary Iraqis from their government have driven many people into the embrace of armed militant groups, he said, adding that the U.S. government could try to help close the gap by better protecting Iraqi civilians, creating jobs and helping to support elections for local councils more responsive to their constituents' needs.

Odierno said another reason for Iraqis' alienation was the tendency of many leaders to be more interested in sectarian interests than the national good of Iraq.

"We thought they'd come together rather easily," he said. "We underestimated that…. We thought they'd think Iraq first, and that didn't occur. I think maybe it will occur over time, but it's not occurring now."

Odierno said he hoped that the parliament, which hasn't had a quorum in more than a month, would pass a law clarifying the role of the Shiite paramilitary groups that have been implicated in death-squad operations against Sunnis.

"They have to have a militia policy," he said of Iraq's government officials. "In my mind, out of the militias, 80% of them are probably OK. We could probably immediately put them into either the police or the army."

U.S. and Iraqi forces would probably have to "capture or kill" the remaining 20% "that are … extreme," he said.

Finding a balance

Odierno said that targeting militias would balance military efforts in Baghdad that until recently were overly focused on Sunni areas. Shiite militias have been ruthlessly pressing their advantage in Baghdad, sweeping whole neighborhoods clear of Sunni Arabs.

One of the failings of a U.S. security plan for Baghdad that was announced with great fanfare in August was that it "was focused mostly on Sunni neighborhoods," he said. "One of the things I think about all the time is that we can't be seen as being a leverage of one group getting advantage over another group."

He said, however, that he was still questioning whether the U.S. had a strong partner in the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

"We all have doubts as we move forward," Odierno acknowledged. "But I think I have enough faith in that they're smart people, they're educated people. I think they want to move their country forward."

Odierno spoke on another day of continuing violence in Iraq.

A car bomb in Baghdad on Sunday killed three U.S. airmen assigned to the 447th Expeditionary Civil Engineer Squadron's Explosive Ordnance Division, the Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0112990

The U.S. military announced Sunday that a U.S. soldier assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters group was killed Friday in Al Anbar province. And in southwest Baghdad on Saturday, insurgents shot a U.S. soldier to death, the military said.

In east Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed two people and gunmen killed a Finance Ministry guard Sunday. In west Baghdad, seven mortar rounds killed four civilians.

At least 17 bodies were discovered in Baghdad, all showing signs of torture and all with gunshot wounds to the head.

In the southern town of Hillah, a car bomb killed two people in a market, and in Kut, a land mine killed a border patrol guard, police said.

moore1@latimes.com

*

Times special correspondents in Baghdad and Hillah contributed to this report.

U.S. General Aims For Baghdad Pullback (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD — U.S. troops could pull back to Baghdad's outskirts in a matter of months if Iraqi forces step up security, the new commander of U.S. combat forces in Iraq said Sunday.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno said it could be years before Iraqi forces can assume complete responsibility for the country's security. But a new security thrust in Baghdad could put Iraqi forces in the lead role by summer or fall, while U.S. troops provide support from outside the capital, he said.

"If you ask me where I want to be three to four months from now, I want (Iraqi security forces) operating in Baghdad and we are on the outskirts of Baghdad, providing support," he said.

Odierno, 52, recently replaced Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli as the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq. He will answer to Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who is replacing Gen. George Casey as the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Odierno's remarks came as President Bush prepared an overhaul of U.S. strategy in Iraq. The revision, to be announced this week, could boost the number of U.S. troops in the country from the current 132,000.

Ahead of Bush's announcement, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki unveiled on Saturday a major security plan for Baghdad. He promised to root out militias "regardless of sect or politics."

Odierno said Sunday that the massive Iraqi-U.S. security operation underway in Baghdad since summer has not succeeded.

"We were able to clear areas. We were not able to hold the areas," he said. "You have to go after both (Shiite) and Sunni neighborhoods, and (Operation) Together Forward was focused mostly on Sunni neighborhoods."

U.S. commanders have complained that al-Maliki's Shiite-led government has prevented them from targeting Shiites involved in the violence, including officials close to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Odierno called for a "balanced approach" targeting extremists of both sects. The new strategy would consist of clearing neighborhoods of insurgents and patrolling those areas heavily; creating more jobs; launching provincial elections; and outlawing militias, he said.

"Unfortunately, we're starting to show a lack of patience. And I understand why," said Odierno, whose son, Army Capt. Anthony Odierno, lost his left arm while on combat duty in Baghdad. "But I think the outcome here is too important not to have patience."

Violence continued as Odierno spoke to reporters Sunday:

•Three U.S. airmen working for a bomb-disposal team were killed by a car bomb in Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

•A senior Education Ministry official survived a roadside bomb attack, but gunmen killed three Sunni shopkeepers and a Finance Ministry guard in drive-by shootings, Baghdad police said.

War Could Last Years, Commander Says (NYT)

By John F. Burns

DOJ_NMG_0112991

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 — The new American operational commander in Iraq said Sunday that even with the additional American troops likely to be deployed in Baghdad under President Bush's new war strategy it might take another "two or three years" for American and Iraqi forces to gain the upper hand in the war.

The commander, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, assumed day-to-day control of war operations last month in the first step of a makeover of the American military hierarchy here. In his first lengthy meeting with reporters, General Odierno, 52, struck a cautious note about American prospects, saying much will depend on whether commanders can show enough progress to stem eroding support in the United States for the war.

"I believe the American people, if they feel we are making progress, they will have the patience," he said. But right now, he added, "I think the frustration is that they think we are not making progress."

The general laid out a plan to make an impact in Baghdad with the additional troops. Several other military plans since the fall of Baghdad in 2003 have faltered. He said he wanted the new American units, working with three additional Iraqi combat brigades that Iraqi officials say will be deployed in the capital, to move back into the city's toughest neighborhoods and show that they can "protect the people," which he said coalition forces had previously failed to do.

General Odierno contrasted his approach with the last effort to secure Baghdad, effectively abandoned for lack of enough Iraqi troops last fall.

Then, American troops conducted house-to-house clearing operations before moving on to other neighborhoods, leaving the holding phase of the operation to Iraqi troops, who failed to control the areas and forced Americans to return. This time, the general said, American troops would remain in the cleared areas "24/7," to stiffen Iraqi resolve and build confidence among residents that they would be treated evenhandedly.

Equally important, he said, coalition troops would move into both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods. That, too, would break with the pattern set last fall, when American troops concentrated on known Sunni insurgent strongholds, especially Dora, in southwest Baghdad. This time, the general said, it was crucial the security plan be evenhanded. "We have to have a believable approach, of going after Sunni and Shia extremists," he said.

Going into Shiite neighborhoods, particularly the sprawling working-class district of Sadr City, the base for the powerful Mahdi Army militia that has spawned Shiite death squads, will risk new strains in the relationship between American commanders and the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Sunni leaders and, increasingly, American commanders here have accused Mr. Maliki of a strong Shiite bias. The criticism has intensified since the sectarian taunting by Shiite guards at the hanging nine days ago of Iraq's ousted dictator, Saddam Hussein, an event personally planned by Mr. Maliki.

General Odierno said he envisaged making enough of a difference within three or four months of the new deployments to move to a second phase of the new plan, pulling American troops back to the periphery of Baghdad and leaving Iraqi forces to carry on the fight in the capital. He said he hoped to be able to do that by August or September, but with American troops prepared to move back into the capital rapidly if commanders conclude that the pullback was "a miscalculation."

Meeting American reporters over lunch at a villa in the grounds of one of Mr. Hussein's former palaces, General Odierno was careful not to divulge details of Mr. Bush's new war plan, which the president is expected to make public in coming days, perhaps on Wednesday.

But much of the Bush plan has been leaked, including an influx of as many as 20,000 additional combat troops to Baghdad. Their arrival would be staged over coming months as American commanders watch to see whether the Iraqis, who made troop commitments before that they have not fulfilled, meet their part of the deal.

Sending up to five additional combat brigades, as suggested by administration officials in Washington who have discussed the plan with reporters, would push the American force in Iraq to at least 160,000 troops, close to the levels involved in the invasion nearly four years ago.

This so-called surge would constitute an abrupt about-face in American strategy, which has aimed in the past two years for a drawdown of American troops as Iraqi forces take on greater responsibility for the war.

General Odierno, the second-ranking American commander here, will be joined in Baghdad in coming weeks by the new overall commander chosen by Mr. Bush, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will be promoted to full general when he succeeds

DOJ_NMG_0112992

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., top commander in Iraq for the past two-and-a-half years. The recasting of the war command will also include a new top officer at the Central Command, with overall responsibility for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. That post will go to Adm. William J. Fallon, a Navy officer who is now the American commander in the Pacific. The appointments of Admiral Fallon and General Petraeus are expected to be approved by the Senate.

Generals Petraeus and Odierno will assume control in Iraq at a critical juncture, with additional American troops — assuming Mr. Bush's plan is not blocked by Democratic opponents in Congress — and the burden of showing they can find ways of turning the worsening situation around that escaped General Casey and Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the operational commander who preceded General Odierno. General Casey and General Chiarelli have been wary of American troop increases, saying the key to prevailing here is to have Iraqis take over, not to encourage them to shelter behind enhanced American combat power.

The plans laid out by General Odierno appeared aimed at meeting several goals in what American commanders here say has become a highly complex interplay of American and Iraqi politics, in addition to stabilizing a situation that has threatened to spiral out of control as Iraqi Shiites and Sunnis move ever closer to all-out civil war.

The commanders have acknowledged privately that the new Bush plan is almost certain to represent a last-chance option for persuading Americans that it is worth persisting with the heavy burdens of the war, with more than 3,000 American troops dead and overall costs that are nearing $450 billion.

General Odierno said one American goal would be to satisfy Iraqi leaders' insistence that American commanders transfer to them as quickly as possible overall responsibility for the war.

One thorny issue for the Bush administration has been that Iraqi leaders, facing the highest levels of violence in the war and struggling with weaknesses in their forces, have been wary of increasing American troop levels because of the impediment that might pose to the Iraqis taking fuller control of events here.

General Odierno spoke of the mood in the United States as another crucial factor. He served a year here in 2003 and 2004 as commander of the Fourth Infantry Division, during which his troops took credit for capturing Mr. Hussein. But he spent the last two years in Washington, the most recent 12 months as military adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

He said he understood the failing confidence among Americans, including some of those who had lost sons and daughters here, that the war was worthwhile. The general's own son, Capt. Anthony Odierno, a 28-year-old West Point graduate, lost an arm when a bomb detonated during a patrol in Baghdad in 2004.

As a father as well as a commander, the general said, he did not doubt the sacrifices had been justified. "I believe it's worth it," he said.

Baghdad Needs Iraqi Troops, General Says (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 -- A top U.S. commander in Iraq said Sunday that previous attempts to halt sectarian killings in Baghdad had failed in part because of a shortage of Iraqi troops and a tight focus on Sunni Arab neighborhoods, and that those lessons would be incorporated into a new strategy to slow the violence in the capital.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the number two commander in Iraq, declined to discuss a proposed surge of thousands of additional U.S. and Iraqi troops in Baghdad, saying he preferred to wait for President Bush to outline the policy. But he said he wanted his forces to begin with a push against both Sunni and Shiite fighters and "three or four months from now" retreat to the outskirts of the capital in a supporting role.

Sectarian violence has escalated in Baghdad despite repeated efforts to control it, including last summer's Operation Together Forward, which moved more than 10,000 additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers into the city. At that time, "we were able to clear areas. We were not able to hold the areas," Odierno said. "We were not able to get security forces in there for an extended period of time that protected the people."

DOJ_NMG_0112993

"I think what happened was, is, we overestimated the availability of Iraqi security forces initially; we didn't have enough here," Odierno told reporters at his lakeside residence in Camp Victory, near Baghdad's international airport. "So we have to be able to make sure we have enough forces, Iraqi and coalition, in order to do it this time."

Odierno said the new approach would be "balanced," targeting insurgents and other fighters regardless of their religious affiliation.

"You have to go after both Sunni and Shia neighborhoods," he said. "Together Forward was mostly focused on Sunni neighborhoods, and we've got to do both."

The fighting in Iraq took the lives of five U.S. service members in recent days, the military said. A car bomb Sunday in Baghdad killed three U.S. airmen assigned to a bomb disposal unit of the 447th Expeditionary Civil Engineer Squadron. A fourth airman was injured in the incident.

A U.S. soldier was killed by small-arms fire in southwestern Baghdad on Saturday, and another soldier assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters Group died from combat wounds in Anbar province in western Iraq.

None of the service members' names was released until their families could be notified.

Also Sunday, the radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who leads a powerful militia, and Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, an influential Shiite religious leader, met briefly in the holy city of Najaf, according to a Sadr spokesman. During the meeting, Sistani asked Sadr to support the Iraqi government and its security forces, according to the spokesman, Aysam al-Musawi.

Sadr and his increasingly powerful militiamen, accused of hunting down and killing Sunnis, have fought the Americans on several occasions and are a primary American concern. Odierno said Sadr was currently "working within the political system."

"I'm not sure we take him down," he said. "There are some extreme elements . . . that are conducting operations that we don't agree with, and we will go after that."

U.S. and Iraqi leaders say they intend to put Iraqi soldiers in charge of the Baghdad plan, with U.S. forces playing a supporting role. An aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said that 20,000 troops would operate in the capital, including additional brigades of Kurdish soldiers from northern Iraq.

The Defense Ministry spokesman, Mohammed al-Askari, said that no Kurdish militiamen, known as pesh merga, would be included in the plan. Hasan Suneid, a Shiite lawmaker, said Kurdish soldiers who are part of the Iraqi army would participate.

Suneid said that Iraqi commanders would be able to operate with greater autonomy and that U.S. soldiers would provide air support and logistics.

"We will start from central Baghdad and move out to the suburbs," Suneid said.

Odierno, 52, said that the U.S. military could provide only a partial solution to Iraq's problems, and that more jobs and provincial elections were key components in regaining the people's trust in the government. He called on Americans to have more patience during the difficult counterinsurgency effort that remains.

"I know how we are, we like number one. We want to win 77 to 7. This is hard to win 77 to 7, militarily. It ain't going to happen," he said, adding: "There is going to be no victory parade when we leave here. There never was going to be."

Military `surge' Not Enough To Save Iraq, U.S. Commander Says (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq - In his first wide-ranging interview, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq conceded Sunday that a military "surge" escalation would not be enough to rescue Iraq, advocating economic and political changes as well, as top Democratic lawmakers in Washington stiffened their opposition to any escalation of U.S. troop strength.

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno said he believed that a combination of jobs, provincial elections, anti-militia legislation and stronger Iraqi security forces could stop the nation's plunge toward all-out civil war. Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, his predecessor, spelled out the same approach before his departure one month ago.

By echoing his predecessor, Odierno's comments raised concerns in both Washington and Iraq that the U.S. war effort is exhausting old tactics that haven't worked. Indeed, many Iraqis do not trust that a new Baghdad security plan can change their circumstances because the U.S. and Iraqi government have touted at least five such plans before, all of which failed to stop the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0112994

The commander's statements came days before President Bush is to announce a new course for U.S. policy in Iraq, probably Wednesday. It's expected to include an escalation "surge" of between 9,000 and 30,000 U.S. troops, an increase in civilian advisers to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and perhaps $1 billion in new aid for reconstruction efforts.

In Washington Sunday, top Democratic lawmakers emphasized that they oppose any plan to escalate U.S. troop strength in Iraq, but made clear that they are not ready to cut off funds for troops there now. However, Speaker of the House of Representatives Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said that Congress would scrutinize any Bush request to fund an escalated U.S. presence in Iraq.

"The American people and the Congress support those troops. We will not abandon them. But if the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it. And this is new for him, because up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions, and we've gotten into this situation which is a war without end, which the American people have rejected," Pelosi said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

On Friday, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent Bush a public letter opposing any increase in U.S. troops in Iraq and calling for a phased redeployment of U.S. troops out of Iraq starting in four to six months.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Sunday that Bush's expected plan to escalate U.S. troop strength in Iraq "is a prescription for another tragedy." Biden also announced that he will seek the presidency in 2008.

"There is now a civil war. You need a political solution," said Biden, speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press." His committee plans extensive hearings on Iraq in coming weeks.

Taking the opposite view was Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I support a surge with a purpose - co-joining with the Iraqi political and military leadership to control this country," Graham said, also on "Meet the Press." "We cannot let this country go into the abyss.

"Now is the last chance, and the only chance, to get this right."

Graham said many Republican lawmakers are prepared to back Bush's call for an escalation of U.S. forces in Iraq.

In Baghdad, Odierno said he proposed several approaches to Defense Secretary Robert Gates during his visit here last month, including a surge.

"What I will tell you is when Secretary Gates was here with General (Peter) Pace, we offered several different courses of action. Some included surge of troops, some included a surge in economic capabilities." Others, he said, included boosting other Iraqi capabilities in the treasury, justice, and rule of law fields, "and some didn't include a troop surge."

Odierno arrived in Baghdad less than a month ago, replacing Chiarelli. During his tenure, Chiarelli repeatedly said that if more Iraqis had jobs, fewer would join a rogue group or shoot at American soldiers. The unemployment rate here is at least 25 percent, government officials estimate.

Both commanders said they believed that Iraqi forces should take the lead in enforcing security, while conceding that, while they are improving, Iraqis have faltered when given the lead. Some forces have been overtly sectarian. Others lost control of their communities, forcing U.S. troops to intervene. Both commanders said that U.S. troops should be on the periphery of areas handed over to Iraqi forces in case violence erupts.

Both said that U.S. forces must tackle not only Sunni insurgents but Shiite militias - yet both stopped short of advocating that U.S. forces go after firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who leads Iraq's largest militia, the Mahdi Army, and supports the Iraqi government.

"I'm not sure we take him down," Odierno said. "There are some extreme elements (of the Mahdi Army) ... and we will go after them. I will allow the government to decide whether (Sadr) is part of it or not. He is currently working within the political system."

Both Odierno and Chiarelli said that the military could not do everything and that Iraq needs a political solution. Both also said that everyone should be patient with Iraq's nascent government, noting that it has been in power less than a year.

DOJ_NMG_0112995

US Twists Civilian Arms To Fill Fortress Baghdad (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

At the heart of George W. Bush's "new way forward" – which the president is expected to announce on Wednesday and involve substantial troop reinforcements – is the plan already under way to expand the US civilian presence across Iraq and complete the world's largest embassy in Baghdad.

Construction of what critics call "Fortress Baghdad" has led to arguments inside the State Department amid fears that the overwhelming diplomatic presence will perpetuate a sense of US occupation and become a focus of local anger.

US diplomats say that just as the armed forces are being stretched to breaking point, the US foreign service is suffering from low morale and operations in the rest of the world are being damaged by the diversion of resources to Iraq.

Officials are also questioning why the Bush administration is sending more civilians into a deteriorating war zone, and the effectiveness of the work they can do.

The embassy compound being built inside Baghdad's Green Zone covers 104 acres, making it six times larger than the United Nations compound in New York. A city within a city for more than 1,000 people, it will have its own water, sewers and electricity, six apartment buildings, a Marine barracks, swimming pool, shops and some walls 15 feet thick.

The State Department has told the Financial Times that the US civilian presence in Iraq has "grown considerably beyond the numbers projected for the new embassy compound", which is scheduled for completion by September 1 at a cost of $592m (€455m, £307m).

The department and other agencies, such as the Pentagon and Treasury which also supply staff, are working out how to accommodate the extra numbers that Mr Bush is expected to announce this week. Recruits are being attracted to one-year posts by a mix of cajoling and inducement – an almost doubling of their salary, four trips outside Iraq and guarantees of favourable postings afterwards.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, and other officials have repeatedly sent cables to personnel around the world saying diplomats have a patriotic duty to volunteer for Baghdad and the expanding "provincial reconstruction teams", where diplomats work out of military bases.

"Baghdad dwarfs everything else. It is becoming a monster that has to be fed every year with a new crop of volunteers," says one diplomat.

So far the State Department has not resorted to compulsory or "directed" assignments, a practice last used during the Vietnam war. But it has warned it would put assignments elsewhere on hold "if Iraq and Afghanistan and other priority posts are not staffed".

Among the many recommendations of the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton report on Iraq, issued in December, was that diplomats and other US personnel should be obliged to serve in Iraq if there were not enough volunteers.

Steve Kashkett, vice-president of the American Foreign Service Association, the professional body representing US foreign service officers, questions their logic.

"It makes no sense for the Iraq report authors simultaneously to propose scaling back the US military presence and beefing up the presence of unarmed US diplomats in a combat zone," he writes this month in the association's journal.

John Brown, who resigned as a US diplomat in protest against the 2003 invasion and now teaches public diplomacy, says the embassy "will be a symbol of the US occupation and the near-total separation of US embassy staff members from the society with which they are supposed to interact".

"Indeed, the planned embassy reminds me of the huge, cavernous buildings that housed Soviet missions in eastern Europe during the cold war. They were hated by the local population for all they stood for: secrecy, arrogance and domination."

Of the 1,000 or so US civilians staffing Baghdad at present – not including large numbers of private-sector bodyguards – there are about 200 career diplomats, plus some 70 in the provincial reconstruction teams that are set to expand.

Many other staffers are so-called "3161s" – recruited ad hoc and, according to the State Department, "fully qualified for their highly technical jobs". Diplomats question this, saying many are incompetent and have been hired for their loyalty to the Republican effort.

DOJ_NMG_0112996

Asked why the US was sending more diplomats into a war zone when such conditions elsewhere in the world would lead to closure or drawdown of embassies, the State Department said such comparisons were “inappropriate”, noting the embassy had suffered “minimal casualties”.

A Heavier Iraq 'Footprint' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

President Bush is set to announce his new strategy for Iraq this week, and the early signs are that it will include both more American and Iraqi troops to improve security, especially in Baghdad. We think the American people will support the effort, as long as Mr. Bush treats this like the all-in proposition it deserves to be.

If the stakes in Iraq are as great as Mr. Bush says -- and we believe they are -- then he should commit whatever forces are needed to achieve success. The public's support for the Iraq campaign is waning, in major part because the casualties and expense have been producing no visible progress. Even with Democrats running Congress, Mr. Bush has a political window to pursue a more robust security strategy. The paradox is that the fastest way home from Iraq is a bolder commitment now. * * *

On that score, it is appropriate that Mr. Bush is replacing his Iraq military team. Centcom Commander John Abizaid, who is retiring, can point to successful campaigns to topple the Taliban in Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein in Iraq. His oft-derided "light footprint" strategy for securing Iraq has also been right for much of the country, with Kurdistan able to handle its own security and southern Iraq now transitioning to Iraqi control.

But General Abizaid and ground commander George Casey -- who is leaving for a Pentagon post -- never found the formula for the insurgent-troubled Sunni areas, and in recent months for Shiite death squads in Baghdad. Beginning in 2005, Mr. Bush began talking of a counterinsurgency strategy modeled on the successful "clear, hold and build" operation that drove insurgents from the northern city of Tal Afar.

However, it is now clear his two most important generals failed to muster the forces to make it work. The final straw was the failure of Operation Forward Together to secure Baghdad last year. Although many neighborhoods did improve during the "clear" phase, there were too few troops deployed for the "hold" process to work.

One rap on Mr. Bush as a war leader is that he is supposedly too willful and stubborn. But if anything, in Iraq it now appears he has been too deferential. He was telling the truth when he said his generals, and former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, told him they had enough troops to do the job. Especially as Army and Marine tours lengthened, General Casey seemed focused more on training Iraqis with an eye to drawing down U.S. forces, rather than on improving security. Whatever chance of success this approach had probably vanished with last year's terrorist attack on the Golden Shrine that ended Shiite forbearance.

In appointing David Petraeus, who will replace General Casey, Mr. Bush has chosen a general with impeccable credentials in this theater. He governed Mosul in 2003 with enlightened engagement, marred by a Baathist spy who somehow managed to become police chief. He also built, essentially from scratch, the current Iraqi Army starting in 2004. One of his chief virtues is that he is a good listener who works well with Iraqis, which is crucial to implementing any new plan. Along with Lieutenant General Ray Odierno, who will be General Petraeus's chief deputy, the President will have generals who understand the priority of security.

The main objections to this new push in Iraq seem to be two: First, that military victory is no longer possible amid a "civil war" in Iraq; and second, that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government is sectarian and thus will not compromise enough to achieve the political ends that must accompany improved security.

We aren't generals, but on the first point there are many serious people who believe success is still achievable in Iraq. They include retired four-star General Jack Keane and military historian Fred Kagan, who recently worked with some of the military's brightest officers to suggest a plan to secure Baghdad under the auspices of the American Enterprise Institute. Among those officers is Colonel H.R. McMaster, the mastermind of the Tal Afar campaign. The President's two most important political allies on Iraq, Senators John McCain and Joe Lieberman, also both believe more troops will make a difference.

As for Mr. Maliki, no one is suggesting that Iraqis be given a blank check. His political alliance with radical Shiite Moqtada al-Sadr is a problem and is one reason we advised the Administration against deposing Ibrahim al-Jaafari. But al-Sadr's influence has risen along with the sense that the Iraqi Army couldn't provide security and that the U.S. was headed out the door. One goal of any larger deployment would be precisely to bolster the forces of Shiite moderation against al-Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0112997

Despite its faults, the Maliki government has shown it is still willing to play by democratic rules. Saddam's hanging was handled ineptly, but the dictator received a fair trial. Mr. Maliki presented his own plan for Baghdad security to Mr. Bush on their recent meeting in Jordan, and he has pledged to protect against both Shiite and Sunni killings. We disagree with Bing West and Eliot Cohen nearby that Mr. Maliki should be presented with some kind of ultimatum to do our bidding or else we'll leave; he is far more likely to make these necessary decisions if he sees the U.S. as a reliable partner.

What is sure to radicalize the Shiites is an early U.S. departure. They would then have little choice but to call on Iran and Hezbollah and anyone else for the military aid to defeat the Sunni terrorists. The forces of Shiite democracy, led by Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, would be swamped. Then there really could be a Shiite dictatorship in Iraq, along with ethnic cleansing on a scale unseen since the India-Pakistan diaspora. * * *

For all of these reasons, we hope Mr. Bush also refrains from using the words "surge" or "temporary" to describe his plans this week. A better message is that he will do whatever it takes to reinforce the forces of moderation and democracy in Iraq to prevent a defeat that would empower American enemies in Iraq and in the war on terror. And his strategy is best framed as providing the forces necessary to protect the population that most military experts believe is the key to successful counterinsurgency.

The tragedy nearly four years after the fall of Saddam is that such a strategy has never been tried. The consequences of failure in Iraq are too great not to try it now, before it really is too late.

'Our Only Hope' (WSJ)

By Bing West And Eliot Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

President Bush has appointed a new Iraq team, including one of our best counterinsurgency generals, David Petraeus, to take command in Iraq; he is also about to unveil a new Iraq strategy. The apparent problem is uncontrolled sectarian violence in Baghdad and the apparent solution is to send more American soldiers to restore order. The actual problem is a dysfunctional, sectarian Iraqi political system. Here at home, the imminent debate between the Congress and the administration about the number of American forces is a diversion. We may need more resources, but first we need a strategy.

President Bush faces a difficult strategic choice. First, he can continue to play defense and send in more troops to undertake tasks approved by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The intent is to buy another year during which a nonsectarian Iraqi government will pull itself together. It is difficult to see how it will. Alternatively, he can adopt an offensive strategy with clear benchmarks, strengthening Iraqi security forces while imprisoning Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads. The risk is that Mr. Maliki may refuse to cooperate, forcing us to walk away. In sum, what lies before the administration is a final strategic choice, after a series of large and consequential failures.

The campaign began brilliantly with the swift rush to Baghdad in May 2003. Stripped of their dominance but otherwise untouched by the war, the Sunnis supported an insurgency led by Saddam loyalists and fueled by xenophobic religiosity. The American military stubbornly responded for 18 months with conventional sweeps and raids that fueled resentment and raised recruits for the insurgents. It was not until late 2004 that our military seriously began training a new Iraqi army. That same year, the White House endorsed a counterinsurgency strategy of "clear, hold and build" inside Sunni cities, despite Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's reservations that this thrust American soldiers into an occupying role without addressing how they would get out.

For a brief period, it appeared that "clear and hold" was working. Then, in February 2006, the Sunni extremists destroyed the Shiite mosque at Samara. This ignited the civil war they had sought to provoke for three years. As with the initial Sunni insurgency, our military was caught a second time without a counterstrategy.

Since the summer of 2006 we have fought a full-fledged, two-front war, waging one against the Sunni insurgents north and particularly west of Baghdad, and the other in Baghdad, where both Sunni and Shiite killers murdered the innocents. The Sunni tool was the massive car bomb. The Shiite militias were more systematic, employing death squads in a slow, methodical ethnic cleansing of neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0112998

The war seesaws back and forth. Unlike in Vietnam, these enemies do not dare to fight even small American military units. Our casualties come from roadside bombs and sniper attacks. In Anbar province, where the fighting is heaviest, our Marines are having unappreciated success in splitting local tribes from al Qaeda in Iraq. The under-strength Iraqi Army has performed well, despite grossly inadequate support from Mr. Maliki's government. The Iraqi police in Baghdad, though, remain penetrated by political militias. The spectacle of Saddam Hussein's guards chanting the name of Moqtada al Sadr as the despot swung from the gallows was revealing and disturbing.

So where do we go from here? The much-debated "surge" would only modify our current strategy, if Americans continue to focus chiefly on destroying the insurgents in Sunni neighborhoods. Fewer Sunni car bombs will supposedly result in less retaliation by death squads and end the ethnic cleansing. The Shiite population would turn away from militias because they wouldn't need them, given more security by more Americans. Because Mr. Maliki values Mr. Sadr's political support, Sadr City will remain what it is today: a sanctuary for the Mahdi Army militia.

This is a problematic approach. The Sunnis initiated the violence, no doubt about it. But now the Shiite militias are doing the majority of the killing in Baghdad -- yet less than 10% of those in prison are Shiites. There are 75 murders a day in Baghdad, and most killers walk free. The militias are gradually succeeding in the ethnic cleansing of much of Baghdad. To persist in this strategy is equivalent to a mayor telling his police chief that the mafia who live on the east side of town cannot be touched. It dooms the chance, however frail, of creating a nonsectarian Iraqi government.

Coupled with defensive patrolling is a proposed program of job creation (removing trash, for example). But handouts in a culture accustomed to handouts gain little. The return for this effort is hard to predict. In Anbar province, the only successful projects have been repayable loans to those Iraqis resolute enough to step forward and accept responsibility for building their own businesses.

Providing our advisers and battalion commanders with discretionary funds is a sound investment, but is ancillary to establishing security. It's unproven how many 16-year-old foot soldiers will be diverted by low-paying jobs. If you went to a member of the mafia and offered a low-paying job in return for renouncing crime, he would laugh at you. Most of the thugs won't be bought off; extortion and robbery are more lucrative and enjoyable.

President Bush recently agreed with the assessment of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, that "we're not winning in Iraq . . . but we're not losing." But in counterinsurgency, if you do not win, you lose. What, then, is another option the president can choose?

Instead of a defensive surge strategy satisfying to Mr. Maliki, the president can opt for an offensive, nonsectarian strategy. Its core operational concepts must be neutralizing criminals -- which include the Sunni insurgents, the Shiite death squads and the criminal gangs -- by imprisonment, deterrence, or death; and constructing Iraqi security institutions as free as possible of sectarian taint.

Iraq is now a police war and we need to treat it as such. Former Secretary of State Colin Powell a few weeks ago said, "We should not use our troops as policemen." But that's exactly how they are being used today in Baghdad and are, in fact, used in most counterinsurgencies. Our weakest links are leaving the Mahdi Army off-limits, not selecting Iraqi security leaders and refusing to arrest and incarcerate the criminals (insurgents, death squads and thugs). If the president's new strategy does not aggressively rectify these three defects, then surging more American troops will buy time but not alter a war we are losing because we are not winning.

Sadr City cannot remain off limits. When the death squads know they are hunted, many will flee the city. Others will fight back. Intense violence, however, cannot sustain itself. American forces fought Mr. Sadr's militia in April and August of 2004. In both cases, all-out war by the Mahdi Army petered out due to lack of logistics. In both cases, the Shiite population stood to one side. We created a monster by letting Mr. Sadr go free twice. We cannot make that mistake a third time. * * *

To change the dynamic in Iraq, the president has to insist on arrests and incarceration rates equivalent or greater than those for violent crime in New York City. This would set benchmarks and shift our forces from defense to offense. New York City averages over 27,000 arrests a year for violent crimes. If a similar number of arrests were made in Baghdad, which is roughly the same population size as New York City, the jail population in Iraq would double in a year. One in 75 American males is in jail, compared to one in 450 Iraqi males. Iraq is not six times safer than the U.S. Instead, Iraq has a judicial system, abetted by American military legalisms, that works in favor of the killers. The president has to change that.

DOJ_NMG_0112999

Our troops in Iraq complain, with justice, that they often capture insurgents, only to find them on the street a few months later. As a result of the abuses of Abu Ghraib, the U.S. military instituted four layers of review for each Iraqi detained. The result is that most detainees are released. As for the Iraqi system, it is simply absurd, insisting on habeas corpus rules of evidence in a corrupt and overwhelmed judicial system that incarcerates a few dozen each week, compared to over a thousand a week in New York City alone. Eight of 10 detainees are set free. Releasing killers undercuts troop morale, while the residents lose trust. Texas has 170,000 in jail; Iraq, with a larger population and 50 times the violence rate, has 28,000 in jail. This "catch and release system," as the troops call it, is the single weakest link in the U.S. strategy.

Technology can help. We could, for example, equip Iraqi and American forces with mobile devices to fingerprint the military-age males in Baghdad and the Sunni Triangle. Anyone stopped can be checked in two minutes, just as the Border Police and the Chicago Police do today. This would deprive the killers of mobility and is the key to radically increasing arrests. In this, as in many other respects, the American failure in Iraq reflects not our preference for high technology -- as facile critics claim -- but our inability to bring appropriate technologies to bear. * * *

This is an Iraqi war, and success depends on the creation of a larger Iraqi Army (perhaps twice its current size of under 140,000) and a neutral police force. So we must increase our advisers from 3,500 to 15,000 or more. This is a small-unit police war, with the insurgents hiding and dodging. We do not need 40 or 50 conventional American battalions trained and equipped for full-scale conventional war, if the Iraqi security forces are strengthened by bulked-up American advisory teams.

But Iraqi security forces will fall apart if political parties use appointments and promotions for sectarian purposes. We must therefore insist on a joint U.S.-Iraqi board to appoint all Iraqi battalion commanders and police chiefs and above. American control over senior personnel is the single most important aspect of our effort to develop Iraqi institutions. Without it, additional resources, to include more advisers, will be wasted.

Quite possibly, Prime Minister Maliki will refuse, on the grounds of sovereignty and national pride, to allow Americans equal control over Iraqi personnel policy. We should respond that when Iraq is truly sovereign and standing on its own, we withdraw our advisers and the joint board ceases to operate. In the meantime, we're not potted plants. It is our advisers that force the ministries in Baghdad to pay the Iraqi soldiers. It is our advisers on patrol risking their lives and dying to reassure the Iraqi forces that they can prevail. As long as we run equal risk, we deserve equal say in the selection of competent leaders.

There is some chance that a strategy dependent on Mr. Maliki's sectarian instincts may succeed. He may, despite his poor track record, pull himself and his government together. Prudence, however, suggests that the president design a strategy that is independent of Mr. Maliki's fortunes and strengthens the only institution capable of holding the country together -- the Iraqi army.

We prefer an offensive strategy based on three ironclad principles: take the offense immediately against the death squads in Sadr City, who are now unsettled; arrest and imprison on a scale equal to the horrific situation (or at least equal to New York City!); and insist on a joint say in the appointment of army and police leaders. If the Iraqi government refuses, we should be willing to disengage completely, and soon.

The paradox of American strategy in Iraq is this: President Bush can achieve success only by threatening to do something he is morally opposed to doing -- leaving swiftly and risking chaotic civil strife. If the president showed the same iron will toward Mr. Maliki that he does toward Congress and public opinion, Mr. Maliki would blink first.

